PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES

(HANSARD)

SIXTH SERIES—VOLUME 89

HOUSE OF COMMONS

OFFICIAL REPORT

THIRD SESSION OF THE FORTY-NINTH PARLIAMENT
OF THE UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND NORTHERN IRELAND
THIRTY-FOURTH YEAR OF THE REIGN OF
HER MAJESTY QUEEN ELIZABETH II

SESSION 1985-86

COMPRISING PERIOD
16 DECEMBER 1985—17 JANUARY 1986

LONDON
HER MAJESTY'S STATIONERY OFFICE
£52·50 net

HER MAJESTY'S GOVERNMENT

MEMBERS OF THE CABINET

(FORMED BY RIGHT HON. MARGARET THATCHER, MP, SEPTEMBER 1985)

PRIME MINISTER, FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY AND MINISTER FOR THE CIVIL SERVICE—
The Rt. Hon. Margaret Thatcher, MP
LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL AND LEADER OF THE HOUSE OF LORDS—The Rt. Hon. Viscount Whitelaw, CH, MC
LORD CHANCELLOR—The Rt. Hon. The Lord Hailsham of St. Marylebone, CH
SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS—The Rt. Hon. Sir Geoffrey Howe, QC, MP
SECRETARY OF STATE FOR TRADE AND INDUSTRY AND PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE—The Rt. Hon. Leon Brittan, QC, MP
CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER—The Rt. Hon. Nigel Lawson, MP
SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT—The Rt. Hon. Douglas Hurd, CBE, MP
SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EDUCATION AND SCIENCE—The Rt. Hon. Sir Keith Joseph, Bt, MP
SECRETARY OF STATE FOR ENERGY—The Rt. Hon. Peter Walker, MBE, MP
SECRETARY OF STATE FOR DEFENCE—The Rt. Hon. Michael Heseltine, MP
SECRETARY OF STATE FOR SCOTLAND—The Rt. Hon. George Younger, TD, MP
SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WALES—The Rt. Hon. Nicholas Edwards, MP
LORD PRIVY SEAL AND LEADER OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS—The Rt. Hon. John Biffen, MP
SECRETARY OF STATE FOR SOCIAL SERVICES—The Rt. Hon. Norman Fowler, MP
CHANCELLOR OF THE DUCHY OF LANCASTER—The Rt. Hon. Norman Tebbit, MP
SECRETARY OF STATE FOR NORTHERN IRELAND—The Rt. Hon. Tom King, MP
MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD—The Rt. Hon. Michael Jopling, MP
SECRETARY OF STATE FOR TRANSPORT—The Rt. Hon. Nicholas Ridley, MP
SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EMPLOYMENT—The Rt. Hon. The Lord Young of Graffham
SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE ENVIRONMENT—The Rt. Hon. Kenneth Baker, MP
PAYMASTER GENERAL AND MINISTER FOR EMPLOYMENT—The Rt. Hon. Kenneth Clarke, QC, MP
CHIEF SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY—The Rt. Hon. John MacGregor, OBE, MP

LAW OFFICERS

ATTORNEY-GENERAL—The Rt. Hon. Sir Michael Havers, QC, MP
LORD ADVOCATE—The Rt. Hon. The Lord Cameron of Lochbroom, QC
SOLICITOR-GENERAL—Sir Patrick Mayhew, QC, MP
SOLICITOR-GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND—Peter Fraser, Esq, QC, MP

MINISTERS NOT IN THE CABINET

PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY—The Rt. Hon. John Wakeham, MP
MINISTER OF STATE, PRIVY COUNCIL OFFICE, (MINISTER FOR THE ARTS)—Richard Luce, Esq, MP
MINISTERS OF STATE, FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH OFFICE—
The Rt. Hon. The Baroness Young
Minister for Overseas Development—The Rt. Hon. Timothy Raison, MP
Malcolm Rifkind, Esq, QC, MP
Timothy Renton, Esq, MP
MINISTERS OF STATE, DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND INDUSTRY—
Minister for Trade—The Rt. Hon. Paul Channon, MP
Minister for Information Technology—Geoffrey Pattie, Esq, MP
Minister of State—The Hon. Peter Morrison, MP
FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY—John Moore, Esq, MP
ECONOMIC SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY—Ian Stewart, Esq, RD, MP
MINISTER OF STATE, TREASURY—The Hon. Peter Brooke, MP
MINISTERS OF STATE, HOME OFFICE—
David Waddington, Esq, QC, MP
Giles Shaw, Esq, MP
MINISTER OF STATE, DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION AND SCIENCE—Christopher Patten, Esq, MP
MINISTER OF STATE, DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY—The Rt. Hon. Alick Buchanan-Smith, MP
MINISTERS OF STATE, MINISTRY OF DEFENCE—
Minister of State for the Armed Forces—The Rt. Hon. John Stanley, MP
Minister of State for Defence Procurement—Norman Lamont, Esq, MP
Minister of State for Defence Support—The Lord Trefgarne
MINISTER OF STATE, SCOTTISH OFFICE—The Rt. Hon. The Lord Gray of Contin
MINISTERS OF STATE, DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH AND SOCIAL SECURITY—
Minister for Health—The Rt. Hon. Barney Hayhoe, MP
Minister for Social Security—Antony Newton, Esq, MP

MINISTER OF STATE, NORTHERN IRELAND OFFICE—Dr. Rhodes Boyson, MP
MINISTERS OF STATE, MINISTRY OF AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD—
The Rt. Hon. John Gummer, MP
The Rt. Hon. The Lord Belstead
MINISTER OF STATE, DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT—Mrs. Lynda Chalker, MP
MINISTERS OF STATE, DEPARTMENT OF THE ENVIRONMENT—
Minister of State—The Lord Elton, TD
Minister for Environment, Countryside and Local Government—The Hon. William Waldegrave, MP
Minister for Housing, Urban Affairs and Construction—John Patten, Esq, MP

DEPARTMENTS OF STATE AND MINISTERS

Agriculture, Fisheries and Food—
MINISTER—The Rt. Hon. Michael Jopling, MP
MINISTERS OF STATE—
The Rt. Hon. The Lord Belstead
The Rt. Hon. John Gummer, MP
PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY—Mrs. Peggy Fenner, MP

Arts and Libraries, Office of—MINISTER FOR THE ARTS—Richard Luce, Esq, MP

Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster—
The Rt. Hon. Norman Tebbit, MP

Defence—
SECRETARY OF STATE—The Rt. Hon. Michael Heseltine, MP
MINISTER OF STATE FOR THE ARMED FORCES—The Rt. Hon. John Stanley, MP
MINISTER OF STATE FOR DEFENCE PROCUREMENT—Norman Lamont, Esq, MP
MINISTER OF STATE FOR DEFENCE SUPPORT—The Lord Trefgarne
PARLIAMENTARY UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR DEFENCE PROCUREMENT—John Lee, Esq, MP

Education and Science—
SECRETARY OF STATE—The Rt. Hon. Sir Keith Joseph, Bt, MP
MINISTER OF STATE—Christopher Patten, Esq, MP
PARLIAMENTARY UNDER-SECRETARIES OF STATE—
Robert Dunn, Esq, MP
George Walden, Esq, MP

Employment—
SECRETARY OF STATE—The Rt. Hon. The Lord Young of Graffham
PAYMASTER GENERAL AND MINISTER FOR EMPLOYMENT—The Rt. Hon. Kenneth Clarke, QC, MP
PARLIAMENTARY UNDER-SECRETARIES OF STATE—
The Hon. Alan Clark, MP
Peter Bottomley, Esq, MP
David Trippier, Esq, MP

Energy—
SECRETARY OF STATE—The Rt. Hon. Peter Walker, MBE, MP
MINISTER OF STATE—The Rt. Hon. Alick Buchanan-Smith, MP
PARLIAMENTARY UNDER-SECRETARIES OF STATE—
Alastair Goodlad, Esq, MP
David Hunt, Esq, MP

Environment—
SECRETARY OF STATE—The Rt. Hon. Kenneth Baker, MP
MINISTERS OF STATE—
Minister for Environment, Countryside and Local Government—The Hon. William Waldegrave, MP
Minister for Housing, Urban Affairs and Construction—John Patten, Esq, MP
Minister of State—The Lord Elton, TD
PARLIAMENTARY UNDER-SECRETARIES OF STATE—
Sir George Young, Bt, MP
Mrs. Angela Rumbold, CBE, MP
Richard Tracey, Esq, MP

Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs—
SECRETARY OF STATE—The Rt. Hon. Sir Geoffrey Howe, QC, MP
MINISTERS OF STATE—
The Rt. Hon. The Baroness Young
Minister for Overseas Development—The Rt. Hon. Timothy Raison, MP
Malcolm Rifkind, Esq, QC, MP
Timothy Renton, Esq, MP
PARLIAMENTARY UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE—Timothy Eggar, Esq, MP

Health and Social Security—
SECRETARY OF STATE FOR SOCIAL SERVICES—The Rt. Hon. Norman Fowler, MP
MINISTERS OF STATE—
Minister for Health—The Rt. Hon. Barney Hayhoe, MP
Minister for Social Security—Antony Newton, Esq, MP
PARLIAMENTARY UNDER-SECRETARIES OF STATE—
Ray Whitney, Esq, MP
The Baroness Trumpington
John Major, Esq, MP

Home Office—
SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT—The Rt. Hon. Douglas Hurd, CBE, MP
MINISTERS OF STATE—
David Waddington, Esq, QC, MP
Giles Shaw Esq, MP
PARLIAMENTARY UNDER-SECRETARIES OF STATE—
David Mellor, Esq, MP
The Lord Glenarthur

Law Officers' Department—
ATTORNEY-GENERAL—The Rt. Hon. Sir Michael Havers, QC, MP
SOLICITOR-GENERAL—Sir Patrick Mayhew, QC, MP

Lord Advocate's Department—
LORD-ADVOCATE—The Rt. Hon. The Lord Cameron of Lochbroom, QC
SOLICITOR-GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND—Peter Fraser, Esq, QC, MP

Lord Chancellor—
The Rt. Hon. The Lord Hailsham of Saint Marylebone, CH

Management and Personnel Office—
PRIME MINISTER AND MINISTER FOR THE CIVIL SERVICE—The Rt. Hon. Margaret Thatcher, MP
MINISTER OF STATE, PRIVY COUNCIL OFFICE—Richard Luce, Esq, MP

Northern Ireland Office—
SECRETARY OF STATE FOR NORTHERN IRELAND—The Rt. Hon. Tom King, MP
MINISTER OF STATE—Dr. Rhodes Boyson, MP
PARLIAMENTARY UNDER-SECRETARIES OF STATE—
Nicholas Scott, Esq, MBE, MP
The Lord Lyell
Richard Needham, Esq, MP

Paymaster General and Minister for Employment—The Rt. Hon. Kenneth Clarke, QC, MP

Privy Council Office—
LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL AND LEADER OF THE HOUSE OF LORDS—The Rt. Hon. Viscount Whitelaw, CH, MC
LORD PRIVY SEAL AND LEADER OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS—The Rt. Hon. John Biffen, MP
MINISTER OF STATE—Richard Luce, Esq, MP

Scottish Office—
SECRETARY OF STATE FOR SCOTLAND—The Rt. Hon. George Younger, TD, MP
MINISTER OF STATE—The Rt. Hon. The Lord Gray of Contin
PARLIAMENTARY UNDER-SECRETARIES OF STATE—
Allan Stewart, Esq, MP
John MacKay, Esq, MP
Michael Ancram, Esq, MP

Trade and Industry—
SECRETARY OF STATE FOR TRADE AND INDUSTRY AND PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE—The Rt. Hon. Leon Brittan, QC, MP
MINISTERS OF STATE—
Minister for Trade—The Rt. Hon. Paul Channon, MP
Minister for Information Technology—Geoffrey Pattie, Esq, MP
Minister of State—The Hon. Peter Morrison, MP
PARLIAMENTARY UNDER-SECRETARIES OF STATE—
John Butcher, Esq, MP
Lord Lucas of Chilworth
Michael Howard, Esq, QC, MP

Transport—
SECRETARY OF STATE FOR TRANSPORT—The Rt. Hon. Nicholas Ridley, MP
MINISTER OF STATE—Mrs. Lynda Chalker, MP
PARLIAMENTARY UNDER-SECRETARIES OF STATE—
David Mitchell, Esq, MP
Michael Spicer, Esq, MP
The Earl of Caithness

Treasury—

PRIME MINISTER, FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY AND MINISTER FOR THE CIVIL SERVICE—
The Rt. Hon. Margaret Thatcher, MP
CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER—The Rt. Hon. Nigel Lawson, MP
CHIEF SECRETARY—The Rt. Hon. John MacGregor, OBE, MP
FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY—John Moore, Esq, MP
ECONOMIC SECRETARY—Ian Stewart, Esq, RD, MP
MINISTER OF STATE—The Hon. Peter Brooke, MP
PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY—The Rt. Hon. John Wakeham, MP
LORDS COMMISSIONERS—
Donald Thompson, Esq, MP
Ian Lang, Esq, MP
Tristan Garel-Jones, Esq, MP
The Hon. Archibald Hamilton, MP
The Hon. Timothy Sainsbury, MP
ASSISTANT WHIPS—
Michael Neubert, Esq, MP
Tony Durant, Esq, MP
Peter Lloyd, Esq, MP
The Hon. Mark Lennox-Boyd, MP
The Hon. Francis Maude, Esq, MP

Welsh Office—

SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WALES—The Rt. Hon. Nicholas Edwards, MP
PARLIAMENTARY UNDER-SECRETARIES OF STATE—
Wyn Roberts, Esq, MP
Mark Robinson, Esq, MP

Her Majesty's Household—

LORD CHAMBERLAIN—The Rt. Hon. The Earl of Airlie, GCVO
LORD STEWARD—The Rt. Hon. The Duke of Northumberland, KG, TD
MASTER OF THE HORSE—The Rt. Hon. The Earl of Westmorland, KCVO
TREASURER—John Cope, Esq, MP
COMPTROLLER—Carol Mather, Esq, MC, MP
VICE-CHAMBERLAIN—The Hon. Robert Boscawen, MC, MP
CAPTAIN OF THE HONOURABLE CORPS OF GENTLEMEN-AT-ARMS—The Rt. Hon. The Lord Denham
CAPTAIN OF THE QUEEN'S BODYGUARD OF THE YEOMEN OF THE GUARD—The Earl of Swinton
LORDS IN WAITING— The Viscount Long, The Lord Skelmersdale, The Lord Brabazon of Tara, Viscount Davidson
BARONESS IN WAITING—The Baroness Hooper

SECOND CHURCH ESTATES COMMISSIONER, REPRESENTING CHURCH COMMISSIONERS—Sir William van Straubenzee, MBE, MP

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRINCIPAL OFFICERS AND OFFICIALS

THE SPEAKER—Rt. Hon. Bernard Weatherill, MP
CHAIRMAN OF WAYS AND MEANS—Rt. Hon. Harold Walker, MP
FIRST DEPUTY CHAIRMAN OF WAYS AND MEANS—Rt. Hon. Ernest Armstrong, MP
SECOND DEPUTY CHAIRMAN OF WAYS AND MEANS—Sir Paul Dean, MP

CHAIRMEN'S PANEL—
Miss Betty Boothroyd, MP, Ian Campbell, Esq, MP, Donald Coleman, Esq, MP, Patrick Cormack, Esq, MP, David Crouch, Esq, MP, Stan Crowther, Esq, MP, Miss Janet Fookes, MP, John Forrester, Esq, MP, Harry Gourlay, Esq, MP, Sir Philip Holland, MP, John Hunt, Esq, MP, David Knox, Esq, MP, James Lamond, Esq, MP, Ted Leadbitter, Esq, MP, Hugh McCartney, Esq, MP, Sir Anthony Meyer, MP, Michael Morris, Esq, MP, Sir Michael Shaw, MP, Michael Shersby, Esq, MP, John Spence, Esq, MP, Sir John Wells, MP

HOUSE OF COMMONS COMMISSION—
Rt. Hon. The Speaker (Chairman), Alan Beith, Esq, MP, Rt. Hon. John Biffen, MP, Miss Betty Boothroyd, MP, Sir Paul Bryan, DSO, MC, MP, Rt. Hon. Peter Shore, MP

SECRETARY TO THE COMMISSION—R. B. Sands

OFFICE OF THE SPEAKER

SPEAKER'S SECRETARY—W. A. Beaumont, OBE, AE
SPEAKER'S COUNSEL— G. E. Gammie, CB, H. Knorpel, CB
SPEAKER'S CHAPLAIN—Rev. Canon T. Beeson
STAFF INSPECTOR—H. W. Bunkell
TRAINBEARER (PARLIAMENTARY)—D. J. Lord
DEPUTY TRAINBEARER (ADMINISTRATION)—P. L. Warwick
ASSISTANT TO SPEAKER'S COUNSEL—T. D. Salmon

OFFICE OF THE CHAIRMAN OF WAYS AND MEANS

SECRETARY TO THE CHAIRMAN OF WAYS AND MEANS—D. W. Robson

DEPARTMENT OF THE CLERK OF THE HOUSE

CLERK OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS—K. A. Bradshaw, CB
CLERK ASSISTANT—C. J. Boulton, CB
CLERK OF COMMITTEES—D. A. M. Pring, CB, MC
PRINCIPAL CLERKS—
J. H. Willcox (Public Bills)
R. S. Lankester (Select Committees)
D. W. Limon (Table Office)
H. M. Barclay (Private Bills)
M. T. Ryle (Journal Office)
J. F. Sweetman, TD (Overseas Office)
A. A. Barrett (Standing Committees)
C. B. Winnifrith (Select Committees)
W. R. McKay (Financial Committees)
DEPUTY PRINCIPAL CLERKS—J. R. Rose, A. J. Hastings, R. J. Willoughby, S. A. L. Panton, R. B. Sands, G. Cubie, M. R. Jack, PhD, D. G. Millar, Mrs. J. Sharpe, Ms. A. Milner-Barry, R. W. G. Wilson, W. A. Proctor, F. A. Cranmer, C. R. M. Ward, PhD, Ms. H. E. Irwin, D. W. N. Doig
SENIOR CLERKS—R. J. Rogers, A. Sandall, MLitt, M. H. Cooper, PhD, D. L. Natzler, D. J. Cairncross, E. P. Silk, Mrs. S. A. de Ste. Croix, A. R. Kennon, D. W. Robson, L. C. Laurence Smyth, A. R. Gren, S. J. Patrick, D. J. Gerhold, C. J. Poyser, D. F. Harrison, S. J. Priestley, C. P. R. Bennett, A. H. Doherty, P. A. Evans, R. I. S. Phillips, P. D. Brittain (acting), C. A. Larsen (acting), J. Hallowell (acting), J. B. Ingram (acting), P. D. Austwick (acting)
ASSISTANT CLERKS—R. G. James, Miss E. J. Baker, C. M. H. Wookey, Miss P. A. Helme, D. R. Lloyd, R. A. Lambert, B. M. Hutton
SENIOR EXECUTIVE OFFICER—E. F. Riddles
HIGHER EXECUTIVE OFFICERS—C. L. Watson, K. J. Brown, G. E. Clayton, L. L. Kaye, I. C. Bryan, Miss R. J. Challis, A. P. Hubner, Miss S. J. Fox
SPECIALIST ASSISTANTS—I. S. Orton, Miss H. C. Beaumont, Miss J. Ward, R. A. Wilkins, P. R. Daley
EDITORIAL SUPERVISOR OF THE VOTE—G. H. Bright DEPUTY—B. Tidball ASSISTANTS—Miss B. Balcomb, Miss L. Lewis, J. Puricelli, Mrs. L. M. Nugent, K. B. Wood
EXAMINERS OF PETITIONS FOR PRIVATE BILLS—H. M. Barclay, J. M. Davies
REGISTRAR OF MEMBERS' INTERESTS—R. S. Lankester
TAXING OFFICER—H. M. Barclay
CHIEF OFFICE CLERKS—R. A. Broomfield, P. G. Moon, Mrs. P. Fisher, F. McShane, Mrs. J. Pickett, J. D. Whatley, S. D. Barrett, M. Clark, Miss A. M. Loader, Miss J. Stevens (Temp.)

DEPARTMENT OF THE SERJEANT AT ARMS

SERJEANT AT ARMS—Major G. V. S. Le Fanu
DEPUTY SERJEANT AT ARMS—Major P. N. W. Jennings
ASSISTANT SERJEANT AT ARMS—M. J. A. Cummins
DEPUTY ASSISTANT SERJEANT AT ARMS—P. A. J. Wright
CLERK IN CHARGE—Miss M. Frampton, MBE
ASSISTANT CLERK IN CHARGE—D. W. Snell
ADMISSION ORDER OFFICE—E. D. Palfrey, A. Chipperfield, BEM, Mrs. S. J. Warren
PRINCIPAL DOORKEEPER—J. Blood
SECOND PRINCIPAL DOORKEEPER—G. H. Sargeant
THIRD PRINCIPAL DOORKEEPER—S. E. R. Skinner
HEAD OFFICE KEEPER—W. H. Hazard, MBE SECOND OFFICE KEEPER—M. Bryant NURSING SISTER—Miss E. Needham

DEPARTMENT OF THE LIBRARY

LIBRARIAN—D. Menhennet, DPhil
DEPUTY LIBRARIAN—D. J. T. Englefield
LIBRARY—
ASSISTANT LIBRARIANS—H. J. Palmer, G. F. Lock
DEPUTY ASSISTANT LIBRARIANS—J. B. Poole, PhD, Miss J. B. Tanfield, S. Z. Young, Mrs. H. R. Coates, Miss P. J. Baines, BLitt, K. G. Cuninghame, Mrs. J. M. Wainwright, MI InfSc, Mrs. C. B. Andrews
SENIOR LIBRARY CLERKS—Miss E. K. Andrews, DPhil, Mrs. B. L. Miller, Mrs. J. M. Lourie, Ms. F. Poole, Mrs. J. M. Fiddick, C. C. Pond, PhD, C. R. Barclay, Mrs. C. M. Gillie, Miss C. E. Nield, R. C. Clements, R. J. Ware, DPhil, Ms. D. Gore, PhD, R. J. Twigger, B. K. Winetrobe, T. N. Edmonds, R. J. Cracknell, Miss O. M. Gay, Miss E. M. McInnes, Mrs. G. Allen (Temp.)
ASSISTANT LIBRARY CLERKS—Miss C. J. Gilmour, PhD, Miss M. Baber, C. M. Bowlby, Mrs. P. Carling (Temp.)
SENIOR LIBRARY EXECUTIVES—Miss M. R. O'Reilly, MBE, Miss R. Wheatman, ALA, Mrs. S. M. Withers, ALA
SENIOR INFORMATION CLERKS—Miss E. Osborn, Mrs. D. W. Clark, ALA, Mrs. E. R. Stones (Education Officer)
HIGHER LIBRARY EXECUTIVES—Mrs. H. V. Holden, ALA, J. A. Prince, MLS, ALA, Mrs. P. V. Wiles, ALA, M. Southgate, Miss C. E. Fretten, ALA, Miss M. H. Fletcher, ALA, Miss J. Seaton, FLA, Miss G. C. Howarth, ALA, K. N. H. Parry, ALA, Miss A. Siswell, Mrs. E. A. Houghton, ALA, Ms. V. R. Cattell, Mrs. S. M. Hingley, ALA, Ms. A. Muir, Mrs. P. E. Cook, ALA
LIBRARY EXECUTIVES—Mrs. M. A. Azim, ALA, Mrs. I. O. Stockton, ALA, Miss E. J. Jones, ALA, G. Haig, Ms. H. Armstrong, ALA, Mrs. J. A. P. Skipworth, Miss B. Mee, Miss G. L. Cooper, Miss S. Holland, LLA, B. Donnelly, Mrs. F. M. Ward
SUPERINTENDING CLERK—J. R. Hutson
CHIEF OFFICE CLERK—T. H. Haclin, D. J. Plowright
EXECUTIVE OFFICERS—J. F. Youle, P. R. Davis, J. S. Came, S. A. Wise, Mrs. P. A. Bozdan, Miss B. A. Rowlands, ALA

VOTE OFFICE—
DELIVERER OF THE VOTE—G. R. Russell
DEPUTY DELIVERER OF THE VOTE—H. C. Foster
ASSISTANT DELIVERER OF THE VOTE—O. B. T. Sweeney
SUPERINTENDING CLERKS—C. J. Montgomery, C. D. Lister

SALE OFFICE—CHIEF OFFICE CLERK—C. C. Clarke, MBE

ADMINISTRATION DEPARTMENT

HEAD OF DEPARTMENT—A. C. J. Poole
FEES OFFICE—
ACCOUNTANT—J. L. G. Dobson
DEPUTY ACCOUNTANT—A. J. Lewis
SENIOR ASSISTANT ACCOUNTANT—G. P. Brown (Temp.)
ASSISTANT ACCOUNTANTS—F. W. Brewer, A. R. Marskell, M. J. Barram, A. C. Langford, MBE (Temp.) Miss M. M. McColl (Temp.)
DEPUTY ASSISTANT ACCOUNTANT—
SENIOR EXECUTIVE OFFICER—
HIGHER EXECUTIVE OFFICERS—K. E. Johnson, R. Gunn, M. J. H. Caswell, Mrs. P. D. Page, Mrs. J. Yexley, R. S. Young (Temp.), Mrs. N. Norman (Temp.), Mrs. G. Crowther (Temp.), D. A. Tucker (Temp.)
CHIEF OFFICE CLERKS—Miss D. E. Johnson, Miss T. D. Ruewell (Temp.), Mrs. D. K. P. Simons (Temp.), Mrs. D. Hill, Miss P. Hurford (Temp.), Mrs. J. C. Ponting (Temp.), B. W. Palmer (Temp.), Miss J. Bell (Temp.)

ESTABLISHMENTS OFFICE—
HEAD OF OFFICE—G. A. Roberts
DEPUTY HEAD OF OFFICE—J. A. Robb
ASSISTANT HEAD OF OFFICE—D. J. Mouat
SENIOR EXECUTIVE OFFICER—Mrs. S. Caird-Lawrence
HIGHER EXECUTIVE OFFICER—Miss R. A. Cole
SUPERINTENDING CLERK—P. C. Kingsley
EXECUTIVE OFFICERS—R. S. Harrison, Miss J. Bremner

COMPUTER DEVELOPMENT OFFICER—R. S. Morgan, FBCS, FIInfSc
ASSISTANT COMPUTER DEVELOPMENT OFFICER—Mrs. G. S. P. Smith

INTERNAL AUDITOR—Miss C. D. Stone, FCCA

DEPARTMENT OF THE OFFICIAL REPORT

EDITOR—K. S. Morgan
DEPUTY EDITOR—L. R. Johns
PRINCIPAL ASSISTANT EDITORS—R. V. Hadlow, J. Gourley
SENIOR ASSISTANT EDITORS—F. G. Brotherston, C. R. G. Watson, OBE
ASSISTANT EDITOR—P. Walker
DEPUTY ASSISTANT EDITORS—E. Holland, I. D. Church, J. Withers
COMMITTEE SUB-EDITORS—W. G. Garland, F. I. Williams, Miss V. Grainger, J. Ledgerwood, D. Crosswell, Miss C. Ritchie, Miss V. A. A. Clarke, Mrs. A. Roberts, Miss H. A. Hales, Miss L. Sutherland
REPORTERS—Mrs. E. J. Gregory, Mrs. P. Pratt, Miss V. A. Widgery, S. M. Hutchinson, J. Robinson, Miss C. Fogarty, Mrs. J. Ballard, Miss H. Thompson, Miss M. Babington, Miss C. G. Black, P. Oglethorpe, Miss C. Hanly, Miss A. Harris, J. Bonner, Miss J. K. Belcher, Miss J. A. Bradshaw
FIRST PRINCIPAL TRANSCRIBER—D. N. Harrington
SECOND PRINCIPAL TRANSCRIBER—Mrs. E. M. Bangay
DEPUTY PRINCIPAL TRANSCRIBER—Mrs. H. Stollery
CHIEF HANSARD ASSISTANT—D. J. Lawler
HANSARD ASSISTANT—Miss R. Washington
ANNUNCIATOR SUPERINTENDENT—H. J. Wellings

REFRESHMENT DEPARTMENT

GENERAL MANAGER—W. J. J. Smillie, FHCIMA, FCFA, ACF
DEPUTY GENERAL MANAGER—E. J. Nash, MCFA
PERSONNEL OFFICER—
PERSONAL ASSISTANT TO GENERAL MANAGER—Mrs. A. G. Lunn
BANQUETING SUPERVISOR—C. J. Griffiths
CATERING ACCOUNTANT—D. R. W. Wood, FCA
ASSISTANT CATERING ACCOUNTANT—Mrs. B. A. Langley
EXECUTIVE CHEF—I. Gabay
HEAD CELLARMAN—D. Balcombe
HEAD STOREMAN—A. E. Edmond

SHORTHAND WRITER TO THE HOUSE—Mrs. E. M. C. Holland
PARLIAMENTARY WORKS OFFICER (PSA)—W. H. Lewis, OBE
HEAD OF SECURITY—Chief Superintendent I. K. Slessor
COMMUNICATIONS MANAGER—D. Todd
POSTMASTER—C. E. Tomkins
TRANSPORT MANAGER—Miss M. F. Ward

THE PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES

OFFICIAL REPORT

IN THE THIRD SESSION OF THE FORTY-NINTH PARLIAMENT OF THE UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND NORTHERN IRELAND

THIRTY-FOURTH YEAR OF THE REIGN OF HER MAJESTY QUEEN ELIZABETH II

SIXTH SERIES VOLUME 89

FOURTH VOLUME OF SESSION 1985-86

House of Commons

Monday 16 December 1985

The House met at half-past Two o'clock

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

Oral Answers to Questions

ENERGY

Scottish Coalfield

1. Mr. Douglas asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on visits by Ministers in his Department to pits in the Scottish coalfield.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Energy (Mr. David Hunt): I was extremely impressed during my recent visit to the Scottish coalfield to hear of the measures being taken to reduce costs and improve productivity.

Mr. Douglas: Does the Minister accept that to a large extent those measures are related to providing good industrial relations? Will he note that while some improvements have been made by reinstating some of the miners sacked during the strike, more that 130 men face this Christmas having been out of work for two years? Is he aware that there is increasing suspicion, indeed evidence, that some of those out of work are unemployed because of their trade union associations? Will the Minister take steps to approach the coal board again in Scotland to ensure that those men who have been unjustifiably treated receive fair treatment?

Mr. Hunt: The reinstatement of sacked Scottish miners is a matter for the Scottish area. Comparisons vary between different cases, and are neither useful nor valid I understand that most of the dismissed miners in the Scottish area have been reinterviewed for reinstatement, and that more than 70 have been offered employment. Decisions following such reviews must be for area management, and those who have not been reinstated may take their case to an industrial tribunal.

Mr. Hannam: Will my hon. Friend confirm that investment in the Scottish fields has increased from £61 million during the five years before 1979 to £160 million in the five years since then? Does that not confirm that the Government may claim credit for the growth of the coal industry?

Mr. Hunt: My hon. Friend is absolutely right, and it is a pleasure to respond to such a positive question. Investment in the Scottish coalfield has increased over the period my hon. Friend mentioned by 43 per cent. in real terms.

Mr. Home Robertson: Is the Minister aware that there is considerable public anxiety that so many victimised Scottish miners will face another new year out of work? When the Minister visited Monktonhall—I think he was beneath my constituency briefly — was his attention drawn to the fact that Monktonhall is the gateway to the Musselburgh bay coalfield, which is as big as any new coalfield which may be available in England or elsewhere? When will the Government make it possible to develop that new coalfield?

Mr. Hunt: Individual investment decisions are for local management. I wish that more Labour Members would pay tribute to what has been a remarkable turn round in the Scottish coalfield since the end of the sad political strike led by Mr. Scargill, which resulted in the number of producing faces in Scotland decreasing from 31 to 19. Last week output had returned to its pre-strike level of 95,000 tonnes a week. That is a creditable achievement.

Mr. Eadie: Is the Minister aware that no Labour Member will be reluctant to pay tribute to the activities of miners, whether in the Scottish or any other coalfield? Does he realise that he seems to move the goalposts every time he is asked a question about victimised miners? To start with it was said that none had to be reinstated. Is he aware that it is time for a public inquiry into the management and administration of the NCB? Many victimised miners have not been reinstated because of victimisation or another reason? Is the Minister further aware that when he went beneath Monktonhall, he issued a press release and said how cynical Labour Members were about the future of Monktonhall? I hope that he was properly briefed, because if the peacock seam had never been developed, Monktonhall would have been in jeopardy.

Mr. Hunt: The hon. Member will be aware that the new face on which so much hope is being placed is to be started at the beginning of January and is in the Stairhead seam. Much is hoped of that development. No Conservative Member has said that no dismissed miner should get his job back. That is a matter on which individual management should decide. However, we should pay more attention to the real victimised miners. Fortunately, there are few now left, but there are still outrageous examples of intimidation of those men who, by their courage and determination, so impressed the country at the time.

Polkemmet Bing (Ministerial Visit)

2. Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Energy what action he has taken as a result of the Under-Secretary of State's visit on Tuesday 26 November to Polkemmet Bing, West Lothian.

Mr. David Hunt: Following my visit to Polkemmet Bing, I was assured by the NCB Scottish area officials and the environmental health officers from West Lothian district council, who attended with me, that everything possible was being done to overcome the serious situation.

Mr. Dalyell: I thank the Minister publicly, as I have privately, for making the detour there. Will he give this copper piping that I am holding, which I was given yesterday by a constituent, Mr. Alec Gibson, to his analysts, because if the sulphur emissions do that to copper, what do they do to the guts and intestines of my constituents? Will he provide resources for continuous 24-hour work to rectify this desperate problem? I saw the Bing yet again yesterday, and it is a serious health hazard.

Mr. Hunt: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for the thanks that he has given so publicly. I checked with the local district council officials who attended with me whether the fumes were being carefully monitored so as to avoid any noxious fumes causing a deleterious impact on the local environment and people. I was assured that monitoring is taking place and is being carefully checked. As to 24-hour working, I understand that work cannot go any faster because of the safety considerations for the men who are trying to alleviate the problem. Naturally, I shall raise the hon. Gentleman's points with the coal board's chief scientist for Scotland.

Electricity Generation

3. Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Energy what proportion of United Kingdom electricity generation comes from (a) nuclear, (b) oil, (c) coal and (d) hydro sources; and if he will make a statement.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Energy (Mr. Alastair Goodlad): For 1983 the proportions were 17·6 per cent. for nuclear, 7·3 per cent. for oil, 72·9 per cent. for coal and 2·2 per cent. for hydro. The proportions in 1984, which were distorted by the strike in the coal industry, were 18·6 per cent. for nuclear, 32·4 per cent. for oil, 46·5 per cent. for coal and 2·5 per cent. for hydro.

Mr. Proctor: In view of the need to get a better balance in electricity generation, and of the need to increase its nuclear proportion, and in the light of the disturbing comments in the newspapers this morning, will my hon. Friend assure the House that the nuclear industry has a proven, successful and safe track record?

Mr. Goodlad: I cannot comment on the reports in the newspapers, but I am delighted to confirm that the safety record of the nuclear industry is, as my hon. Friend says, excellent.

Mr. Donald Stewart: Is the Minister aware of the disappointment and anger in Scotland at the Government's half-hearted support for alternative sources of energy such as peat and wind, wave and hydro power, most of which have no adverse effects on the environment? Are the Government prepared to do something to investigate such alternative sources?

Mr. Goodlad: The right hon. Gentleman is right to say that there is an important role for alternative sources of energy, which is why substantial amounts of money have been committed by the Government to research into these matters, which the advisory committee on research and development under the chairmanship of Sir Sam Edwards said were properly directed in the circumstances, and of the right amount.

Dr. Michael Clark: As many countries are pressing ahead strongly with nuclear energy, and as our neighbours across the Channel are already producing about 60 per cent. of their electricity from nuclear sources, does my hon. Friend agree that our proportion of electricity produced from nuclear energy, at about 17 or 18 per cent., is very disappointing? What measures has my hon. Friend in hand to increase the percentages?

Mr. Goodlad: The level of nuclear generation is as my hon. Friend stated it. When the first and second generations of AGRs are fully operational, the proportion of electricity generated by nuclear stations should be about 25 per cent. I welcome that development. After that, the outcome of the Sizewell inquiry is important, and upon that I cannot predict or comment.

Mrs. Clwyd: The Minister cannot shelter behind his earlier statement that he cannot comment upon newspaper reports. Surely it is in the interests of all that nuclear power should not be developed further until we can be assured that the nuclear industry can dispose safely of its waste. The Select Committee on the Environment, whose leaked report is referred to in The Times today, has made this point. It is completely irresponsible of the Government to go ahead with any such development until they can give that assurance to the public.

Mr. Goodlad: I cannot comment in advance upon a Select Committee report which I understand is expected in the new year. The decision to continue reprocessing was taken by Parliament in 1978 when the hon. Lady's party was in government. Having regard to the national interest and the total fuel cycle, no insuperable environmental problems have subsequently arisen which might lead to a reconsideration of this decision.

Mr. Sackville: I recognise the potential benefits of cheaper coal through opencast mining, but will my hon. Friend say something about his Department's environmental policy on opencast mining, particularly in the context of my constituency where three separate operations are being applied for, which potentially could cause very severe damage to the environment?

Mr. Goodlad: I know that my hon. Friend has taken a very close interest in this subject as it affects his constituency. Environmental problems are primarily a matter for the Department of the Environment, but I know that the National Coal Board has them very much in mind.

Mr. Eadie: Is the hon. Gentleman not being a little too optimistic about thermo-nuclear power generation? America, for example, will not commission any more nuclear power stations this century. As we always seem to fall in line with America on other matters, it is possible that we shall fall into line there? As for the hon. Gentleman's answer about alternative sources of energy, is he not being too optimistic about the spending on alternative sources of energy? It is about £14 million. We learnt on Friday from Hansard that we are spending, through Rubican and Young, £10·5 million on energy conservation advertising.

Mr. Goodlad: The Government attach great importance to energy conservation, as we do to alternative sources of energy. I said earlier that the advisory committee on research and development had said that the division of research funds for investigating alternative energy sources was appropriate. I am not responsible for what happens in the United States of America, but I have every confidence that the nuclear power programme will be as successful under this Government as it was under the hon. Gentleman's Government.

British Gas

4. Mr. Dykes asked the Secretary of State for Energy what representations he has received regarding the reaction to the detailed proposals for the privatisation of British Gas and the proposed regulation of the corporation in future.

13. Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Energy what further representations he has received on the proposed privatisation of British Gas.

The Secretary of State for Energy (Mr. Peter Walker): I continue to receive representations from various organisations and individuals regarding our proposals for the privatisation of British Gas.

Mr. Dykes: In a sense, is not the word "privatisation" wrong? Does my right hon. Friend agree that when this corporation is truly publicly owned by members of the public owning shares in it, they will have a greater sense of ownership than they do with a remote state corporation that is run by faceless bureaucrats? They will be able to identify with the corporation, which has provided a better and better service in recent years and does not need to be oppressed by an excessive regulatory system.

Mr. Walker: I very much look forward to the employees, managers and customers of British Gas having a direct participation in this industry.

Mr. Pike: Will the Secretary of State recognise that many people are concerned about the future of gas showrooms after privatisation, particularly about the future of showrooms such as Padiham in my constituency? They provide an essential service by selling goods and providing a point at which to pay bills and report faults. Will the right hon. Gentleman ensure that these showrooms are kept open after privatisation?

Mr. Walker: The hon. Gentleman knows that the existing management of British Gas has pursued a positive policy towards gas showrooms. The present management of British Gas will carry out the management of this industry after privatisation.

Sir Peter Emery: Will my right hon. Friend accept that since the publication of the Bill and the Second Reading debate a number of people who are very much concerned with the electricity industry are worried about the very considerable freedom that the gas industry will obtain after the Bill becomes law? They feel that it will work adversely against some of the controls which will still apply to the electricity industry. Has my right hon. Friend received such representations, and if so will he bear the matter in mind?

Mr. Walker: We shall certainly bear the matter in mind, but my hon. Friend has illustrated the fact that in certain markets where there has been fierce competition between gas, electricity and oil, that competition will continue, as it should in the interests of commerce and industry.

Mr. Mason: In view of the rumours that are rife in the coalfields about the privatisation of the coal industry, will the Secretary of State assure the House that he has no plans whatever of privatising any parts of that industry——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question is about gas.

Mr. Rowlands: In view of the widespread observations and criticism of the draft British Gas licence that the Secretary of State issued last week, will the right hon. Gentleman assure the House that this is a tentative first draft, that he has not entered into any firm understanding or agreements with British Gas, and consequently that the licence can be the subject of substantial change?

Mr Walker: The joy of a parliamentary democracy and of entering a Committee stage is that everything is debatable. All I can say is that it is a very good draft, given that I drafted it myself.

Mr. Bruce: Will the Secretary of State acknowledge that there is genuine concern about the Government's proposals for dealing with a monopoly, promoting competition and ensuring protection for the consumer? Will he make it clear that the Standing Committee, which meets tomorrow, will discuss these issues with a genuinely open mind and will be prepared to accept serious, constructive and even major suggestions to amend the Bill in order to achieve the kind of safeguard which at present it appears to lack?

Mr. Walker: I very much hope that the Standing Committee will be very open minded to all the arguments that are put. I am sure the Opposition are hoping that the same will happen to their arguments. As for competition, I doubt whether anyone can say that this Bill is not far better than anything that has existed previously.

Coal Industry

8. Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he has any proposals to change the pattern of working hours or to make any changes in legislation concerning health, safety and working conditions in the coal industry.

Mr. Peter Walker: No, Sir.

Mr. Hardy: Will the Secretary of State check with the NCB on the current state of play of the board's preparations to press for changes in the working structure of the industry, such as a 10-hour production shift? Does he accept that in the coalfield areas, such as my own, where unemployment is now rising to 30 per cent., the idea of a 10-hour shift will not receive an ecstatic welcome?

Mr. Walker: As I clearly said in my reply, I have received no proposals for change, and if I do I shall consider them carefully. If there were to be such proposals, I would expect the unions concerned fully to put their representations and viewpoints, which I would consider carefully.

Mr. Woodall: The right hon. Gentleman has already changed the pattern of working hours for my constituents, particularly at the Kinsley drift mine, which is threatened with closure even though it was opened only in 1979. If that pit is closed, that will change working hours. What does the right hon. Gentleman intend to do about that?

Mr. Walker: We have agreed to modified procedures to consider any closures, which will be considered in the normal way.

Mr. Eadie: Although we welcome the right hon. Gentleman's statement on proposed safety legislation or regulations, does he accept that some hon. Members have associations with the unions and that they have heard disturbing rumours? We take the view that safety in the mining industry is something about which we cannot be complacent and that constant vigilance is required. I hope that the Secretary of State will keep his eye firmly fixed on any proposal to amend regulations or legislation that could result in hazards for miners working underground.

Mr. Walker: I fully share the hon. Gentleman's appreciation of the fact that in an industry such as mining the safety requirement provisions are vital, and I shall look at this in that light.

Energy Efficiency Programme

9. Mr. Nicholls asked the Secretary of State for Energy how many industrial and commercial schemes under the Government's energy efficiency programme are now approved or under way.

Mr. Peter Walker: The Energy Efficiency Office runs the energy efficiency demonstration scheme, the monitoring and targeting programme and the energy efficency survey scheme, and there are many other initiatives aimed at helping industry and commerce. I am delighted to say that all these schemes have reached record levels during the past year and the Government aim to build on this success during Energy Efficiency Year.

Mr. Nicholls: I thank my right hon. Friend for that clearly encouraging reply, but does he agree that there is a continuing need for private investment and practical involvement in Energy Efficiency Year if the aims of the campaign are to be achieved?

Mr. Walker: Yes, I very much share that view. I know of no other area of the British economy where it is possible for us to improve our economic performance by £7 billion a year. We are way behind in the international league, and I hope that as a result of next year's activities, the preparations for which have been encouraging, we shall substantially improve our position.

Mr. Douglas: As one of the criteria for assessing the benefits of the energy efficiency scheme is the price of fuels, what view does the right hon. Gentleman take of the oil price over the next two to three months?

Mr. Walker: I should be foolish if I took any view, but I shall always be interested in the speculation and views of the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Rowlands: One of the most important ways of improving energy efficiency is to improve insulation standards. Have the right hon. Gentleman and the Secretary of State for the Environment any proposals to put to the House about improving building regulations to cover insulation?

Mr. Walker: Building regulations can be examined, but existing insulation provisions ensure that it is very much to the benefit of any family to install basic draught proofing and insulation. I am delighted to say that we are doing much more to encourage a widespread voluntary movement to help those on lower incomes.

Coal Imports

10. Mr. Eadie asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he has been informed of the likely level of coal imports until the end of 1985 by the chairman of the National Coal Board.

Mr. Peter Walker: The chairman of the NCB is not responsible for coal imports. The increase in imports which has taken place this year has been influenced by contracts placed during the strike and by loss of confidence in the security of indigenous supplies. I hope that by improved performance we can return to the 1983 position, when Britain was a net exporter.

Mr. Eadie: We would expect the Secretary of State to be worried about coal imports, even this year, because of their effect on the prospects of the mining industry. Baron Marshall has made veiled threats today about coal imports in 1986, and is the right hon. Gentleman aware that there still persists, in circles of which we are both aware, the allegation that the NCB refused an order for £3 million of exports to Denmark? Can the right hon. Gentleman enlighten us about that allegation?

Mr. Walker: I have no details of anybody refusing an order at any sensible price. I am sure that the NCB would be eager to take advantage of such an opportunity, and the present chairman of the board has shown more interest than perhaps any of his predecessors in the possibilities for exports.

The main encouraging sign that we shall not need imports is that, for the first time in the history of the coal industry, productivity last week totalled more than 3 tonnes per man shift. That encouraging trend and the improved efficiency of the industry will prevent the need for imports.

Mr. Rost: Now that the board needs to waste fewer of its resources on subsidising hopelessly high-cost coal production and can instead reallocate those resources to opening new, low-cost coalfields, will it not be a question of re-establishing our export orders, rather than having to import? British coal will be competitive again.

Mr. Walker: There is no doubt that in the next few years, with the high investment and improved productivity that are taking place, Britain can have the most efficient and successful coal industry in western Europe by a long way. That will open a range of new opportunities, including export opportunities.

Mr. Ryman: Is not the right hon. Gentleman far too complacent about the present state of the coal industry? Bearing in mind the high level of imports and the new colliery review procedure, which has not got under way and is not understood by the Department of Energy, the NCB or the NUM, it would be helpful if the right hon. Gentleman would tell the House when the new colliery review procedure, in so far as he knows anything about it, will begin its proceedings.

Mr. Walker: I hope that that will be done very soon. The finer points of detail were settled last week. I remind the hon. Gentleman of what I said in my original reply, namely that in 1983 Britain was a net exporter of coal. The effects of the strike and the insecurity and loss of supplies created the need for increased imports of coal. I hope that the performance of the industry will ensure that that need is eliminated.

Mr. Skinner: How can it make sense to read reports during the past few days of ships loaded with 110,000 tonnes of coal coming into the north-east at a time when Britain's non-oil trade deficit is well over £4,000 million?

Mr. Walker: I repeat that the strike, which was so enthusiastically supported by the hon. Gentleman, was the main reason for the large increase in imports.

British Gas

11. Mr. Spencer asked the Secretary of State for Energy what arrangements will be made for the pension fund of British Gas when it is privatised.

The Minister of State, Department of Energy (Mr. Alick Buchanan-Smith): I understand from the corporation that there will be no change in the management of the funds or the benefits they provide.

Mr. Spencer: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the time has come for trade union leaders to stop indulging in scandalous scaremongering about this subject? Does he believe that that is in direct proportion to their fear that the privatisation of gas will be a roaring success?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: My hon. and learned Friend is absolutely right. Such talk about the pension fund is complete scaremongering. Those who indulge in it are trying to detract from the real benefits to the consumer, the employees and the management of that industry.

Mr. Eastham: If, as the Minister suggests, there will be real benefits after privatisation, can he tell the House whether gas will become cheaper?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman was unable to attend last week's debate. With the greater spur for efficiency that a privatised industry will undoubtedly create, there are no grounds for thinking that the price of gas will be higher than it would otherwise be.

Alternative Energy Sources

14. Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Energy when he next proposes to have discussions with the European Community Council of Ministers about alternative sources of energy.

Mr. Goodlad: I am pleased to say that the Council of Ministers has, in recent months, agreed substantial new Community programmes on research and development and on the demonstration of new technologies in non-nuclear energy. A considerable proportion of the funds allocated to both programmes will be devoted to renewable energy sources, and my Department intends to encourage strong British participation.

Mr. Knox: Does my hon. Friend believe that the balance between Community and national research into alternative sources of energy is right? Should a larger proportion of it be undertaken on a Community basis?

Mr. Goodlad: The proportion is about right. Each member state has specific needs for which nationality funded research, development and demonstration is appropriate. Other matters of concern to the entire Community are suitable for Community action.

British Gas

15. Mr. Portillo asked the Secretary of State for Energy when he expects to publish a draft licence under which British Gas will operate after privatisation.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: As my hon. Friend will now be aware, the draft licence was made available to the House on Monday 9 December.

Mr. Portillo: I thank my right hon. Friend for making available the draft licence before the Second Reading debate last week. Has he had an opportunity to consider whether a specific duty in the Bill on the regulator to promote competition would help to strengthen the licence that he has produced?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: My hon. Friend must recognise that, unlike other industries that supply services or materials in the domestic market, there is no scope for providing two separate pipelines to two houses in the same street. It was in recognition of that fact that we drafted the Bill and licence in the way that we did. However, we shall have an opportunity to discuss the matter in Committee.

Mr. Hardy: Does the Minister accept that the draft licence hardly enlightens the House, since it is almost incomprehensible? Does he also accept that although those who will serve on the Committee might be pleased that the licence was published last week, they will still wish to know how much the Government expect to make from the sale of the British Gas Corporation.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman does not understand those simple mathematics. I look forward to debating the matter with him in the weeks ahead.

Mr. Rowlands: May we take it from the reply that the Secretary of State gave a few moments ago to our questions that this draft licence is a firm deal between the Secretary of State and Sir Denis Rooke and is not subject to any substantial change?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: It is a draft licence, which was put before the house to give hon. Members the opportunity to debate it. The House will have full opportunities to consider this important mater.

NCB (Enterprise) Ltd.

16. Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on his monitoring of the funds available to National Coal Board (Enterprise) Limited.

Mr. Peter Walker: The Government will continue to monitor closely the funds available to NCB (Enterprise). By the end of November £4·4 million had been committed in support of 222 projects, and £600,000 had been committed to help more than 40 enterprise agencies to start up or to expand.

Mr. Boyes: Does the right hon. Gentleman approve of money from NCB (Enterprise) Ltd. being used to study why industry does or does not go to former coal mining areas? If infrastructure problems were found, for example, would the right hon. Gentleman approve of road links with motorways being developed by NCB (Enterprise) money so that industries could see former mining villages as more attractive places in which to invest?

Mr. Walker: I understand that point. Obviously, expenditure on a road link would come from the designated programme of local authority and Government expenditure. There is nothing to stop NCB (Enterprise) Ltd. putting the importance of that development to those authorities. I know from my experience in the 1970s of the enormous benefit that was brought to the north-east by improvements in road communications.

Mr. Haynes: Why does the Secretary of State keep bragging at the Dispatch Box about the amount of money available for NCB (Enterprise) Ltd. with respect to pit closures? Is he aware that in my area, where there have been a number of pit closures, the people think that the right hon. Gentleman put the money in the safe, locked it up and purposely lost the key?

Mr. Walker: I am sorry that the Opposition are not delighted that, unlike what happened during the closures made by the Labour Government, a great deal of activity is now taking place.

Coal Industry

17. Mrs. Currie asked the Secretary of State for Energy what improvements there have been in the last year in productivity in the coal industry.

Mr. Peter Walker: Overall deep-mined revenue output reached an all-time record high of over 3 tonnes per man shift in the week ending 30 November. This was the fourth successive week in which the industry's overall productivity record had been broken.

Mrs. Currie: I congratulate my right hon. Friend and all the Front-Bench team on this astonishing record-breaking activity in the coal industry. Is it not due substantially to the new incentive schemes and to much improved industrial relations in the industry, which gives the lie to everything that Arthur Scargill has been saying about the coal industry since he became president of the NUM?

Mr. Walker: Gratitude is certainly due to the men and management who have produced the coal. It is remarkable that in the last five years of the Labour Government the highest output figure was 2·28 tonnes per man shift. It is now 3 tonnes per man shift.

18. Mr. Lofthouse asked the Secretary of State for Energy if, when he next meets the chairman of the National Coal Board, he will discuss industrial relations in the industry.

Mr. David Hunt: My right hon. Friend and I meet the chairman of the National Coal Board regularly to discuss all aspects of the coal industry.

Mr. Lofthouse: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that this increased production will not continue unless industrial relations are improved? Whatever the hon. Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie) may have said, I do not recollect the industrial relations record being so low since nationalisation of the mining industry. Recently, the NCB chairman informed me that the position of sacked men differs from area to area, whether or not they have been made redundant. Men may have committed similar offences, but those who work in one area will get their jobs back, while those who work in another will not. Is that justice?

Mr. Hunt: I have been underground seven times in the past few months and been impressed by the way in which the men have come together after the strike. Continual talk of perpetuating divisions only damages a great industry that is shrugging off a disastrous political strike.

Mr. Dixon: Did the hon. Gentleman speak to the NCB chairman about the redundant mineworkers' payments scheme? I wrote to the Secretary of State on 23 August. The reply, on 11 September, said that the right hon. Gentleman was dealing urgently with the matter. Many miners in my constituency are worried about their future payments being jeopardised because of problems relating to national insurance contributions during the strike. When will the hon. Gentleman or the Secretary of State make a statement?

Mr. Hunt: The Government are carefully and urgently considering whether changes to the present legislation governing the redundant mineworkers' payments scheme would be appropriate given the failure of some mineworkers to make sufficient national insurance contributions during the strike to qualify for unemployment benefit during the benefit year 1986.

Mr. Eadie: The Minister has talked about the industry returning to normality in relation to consultation and conciliation. None of us would disagree about that. Does he think that it is helpful to return to consultation and conciliation when the chairman of the National Coal Board was responsible for holding up the new modified coal procedure closure agreement, as the NCB demanded that the unions should pay the full cost of any hearing relating to that procedure? Does the hon. Gentleman realise that that is a departure from the history of the industry and that it will not help to restore good industrial relations if the chairman of the NCB continues to conduct his business in that aggressive way?

Mr. Hunt: The hon. Gentleman should not put such a one-sided view. It is true that at a meeting on 10 December between the National Coal Board and the unions the costs of the final stage of the review procedure were allocated. The board will meet the cost of the secretariat and administrative services and pay half the cost of the fees payable to the members of the new body. That is a good result. I understand that it has been agreed that the new body will consider the proposed closure of Horden at its first inquiry in January, probably in the second week, with Bates' being considered in the next week.

Industrial Energy Prices

20. Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make it his policy that industrial energy prices reflect variations in mean temperature.

Mr. Goodlad: No, Sir. Prices are a matter for the industries concerned.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Has not industrial space heating grown into a major cost for industry? In so far as there is a clear variation in mean temperature levels between, for example, the north of England and Scotland and the south, is there not a justification for the Government to introduce an energy premium to help manufacturers in the north of England and Scotland who have to pay higher energy prices and who are now at a competitive disadvantage?

Mr. Goodlad: As I said, tariff structures and prices are a matter for the industries concerned. Tariffs for gas and electricity are structured to reflect the cost of supply, including, where appropriate, the main variations in costs caused by patterns of demand. It is unlikely that relating prices to temperatures would result in more accurate representation of costs, but I shall draw the hon. Gentleman's remarks to the attention of the chairmen of the Electricity Council and of the British Gas Corporation.

Mr. Bruce: Does the Minister acknowledge that, as the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) said, although industrial costs are not directly related to mean temperature, there is a component, and that in Scotland and the north of England there is real concern that there is not a fair opportunity even to compete on energy prices, given that the Scottish electricity boards do not negotiate industrial prices with their customers because the base price is less than that of the electricity boards in England and Wales? Does the Minister accept that all electricity boards should negotiate fair prices with their industrial customers, and that it should not be confined to the industries operating in England and Wales?

Mr. Goodlad: I shall draw the hon. Gentleman's remarks to the attention of the chairmen of the utilities concerned.

Oil Reserves

21. Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for Energy what is his latest estimate of total recoverable reserves of oil in the United Kingdom land and waters; how much of this was discovered in the last five years; and how much oil has been recovered in the same period.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: The latest estimate of total recoverable reserves of oil on the United Kingdom continental shelf is 2,000 million tonnes, of which 80 million tonnes were discovered in the past five years. Five hundred and fourteen million tonnes of oil were recovered over the same period.

Mr. Chapman: Is my right hon. Friend disappointed that only 80 million tonnes have been discovered in the past five years? In view of that, do the Government accept that our reserves will now fast run out, or is it still hoped that there are plenty of other reserves waiting to be discovered under our land or in our waters?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: Our reserves will not fast run out because the reserve figure is based on reserves that are proven and probable. It excludes possible reserves, of which there are large quantities, and also much greater reserves that are still to be found. It is significant that in the past year, as in the first year of exploration for oil and gas, we are still making one discovery for every five wells drilled.

Coal Miners (National Insurance)

23. Mr. Allen McKay asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement regarding the position of mineworkers who did not pay national insurance contributions during the last mining dispute.

Mr. Peter Walker: As I told the House on 25 November, I will make a statement as soon as conclusions have been reached on the details of any new scheme to cover the financial year 1986-87. In the meantime, I emphasise that the board is maintaining its policy of not making compulsorily redundant any man who wishes to stay in the industry.

Mr. McKay: It is disgraceful that the Government have not yet made a statement about the plight of miners who did not pay national insurance contributions during the dispute. Does the right hon. Gentleman realise that the safety net under which those miners have been working will end on 6 January, before the House returns after Christmas, and that if they continue working and suffer serious injury or illness they will not receive welfare benefit?

Mr. Walker: I recognise the importance of the point raised by the hon. Gentleman. It is a complicated and difficult situation, but I hope that a statement will be made shortly.

Margam Mine

24. Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Energy if, when he next meets the chairman of the National Coal Board, he will discuss the current position regarding the proposed Margam deep mine project in south Wales.

Mr. David Hunt: At my right hon. Friend's meetings with the chairman of the NCB, all aspects of the coal industry are discussed, including proposals for new mines. My right hon. Friend has not yet received proposals for approval of the Margam project.

Mrs. Clwyd: Is the Minister aware that 11,000 jobs have been lost in the coal industry in south Wales since 1979 and that only 700 alternative jobs have been offered by NCB (Enterprise) Ltd.? Does he agree that there has been a great deal of misinformation about the Margam project? During the strike the NCB said that investment would go ahead, but that statement was totally untrue. Can the right hon. Gentleman explain how that deception occurred?

Mr. Hunt: No such deception has occurred. Planning permission has been granted by West Glamorgan county council for the Margam mine. However, as the hon. Lady will appreciate, decisions on the development of new mines and the extension of existing mines are matters for the National Coal Board. I have not yet received proposals for approval of the project at Margam or for the development at Carway Fawr, and I understand that it has not yet been decided whether it will be financially viable to proceed with them.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Research and Secretarial Allowances

37. Mrs. Clwyd asked the Lord Privy Seal what representations he has had from hon. Members on research and secretarial allowances.

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): I have answered a number of parliamentary questions and have discussed the matter with an all-party delegation.

Mrs. Clwyd: Does the Leader of the House agree that if there were improved secretarial and research allowances, some of his hon. Friends might not need to supplement their incomes by becoming consultants to companies such as those involved in the Channel tunnel development?

Mr. Biffen: I see no relationship between the two points. The hon. Lady often makes a reasonable point, but she is spoiling that this afternoon.

Members' Interests

38. Mr. Winnick asked the Lord Privy Seal what recent representations he has received about the extent of the requirement for hon. Members to disclose their interests; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Biffen: I have answered a number of parliamentary questions on this subject. As the hon. Gentleman will know, there is to be a debate tomorrow on the recent report by the Select Committee on Members' Interests.

Mr. Winnick: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that what was shown on the television programme "Newsnight" last week is bound to strengthen the view that the Register of Members' Interests should contain at least some details of the outside financial sources of hon. Members? Should not the register be strengthened by making it an obligation for all hon. Members to fill in the details? I am sure that the Leader of the House will recognise that there is also the question whether hon. Members who have financial links should be able to vote?

Mr. Biffen: The hon. Gentleman raises many points that are either in the substantive motion or in the amendments to it for tomorrow's debate. I do not think that I should anticipate what might be said tomorrow.

Mr. Marlow: Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is not unreasonable for hon. Members to be sponsored by trade unions? Has he any idea how many hon. Members are sponsored by trade unions? If it were necessary to oblige Members not to vote because they were sponsored by a business interest, would that not also apply to those sponsored by trade unions?

Mr. Biffen: Again, my hon. Friend is enticing me to anticipate what I might say tomorrow evening. Wherever an interest exists, I hope that it will be registered.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: May we have an absolute assurance that there will be a free vote tomorrow night?

Mr. Biffen: That is not my responsibility, but I expect that the House will behave as it always does on such occasions.

Computers

39. Mr. Boyes asked the Lord Privy Seal if he will report on the progress in providing computer facilities for hon. Members in the House.

Mr. Biffen: Since 1983 hon. Members have been able to claim the costs of computers and word processors against the office, secretarial and research allowance. I understand that about a hundred Members have already taken advantage of that facility in order to purchase such equipment.

Mr. Boyes: Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that that is not a sufficiently satisfactory approach to the matter? Should not all hon. Members who wish to have computers be issued with computers linked to a central resource mechanism, such as the Library? Is not the Government's attitude to modern technology so backward and sloppy that if the Leader of the House and his right hon. Friends were running a secondhand shop it would go bust in a fortnight?

Mr. Biffen: The principle of an office allowance being available for the purchase of such equipment is important. It is reviewed every four years. It would be unwise to suppose that just because some hon. Members find that facility of use, all hon. Members must or should.

Mr. Skinner: If computers are brought in, will the Leader of the House guarantee that they will not be linked to the telephones, because we have enough trouble as it is?

Mr. Biffen: I cannot give a categorical answer this afternoon, but I shall view the matter with the same sympathy as I extend to most of the suggestions that the hon. Gentleman makes.

CIVIL SERVICE

Scientific Civil Service

42. Mr. Dalyell asked the Minister for the Civil Service what assessment he makes of current morale in the scientific Civic Service.

The Minister of State, Privy Council Office (Mr. Richard Luce): The scientific Civil Service is undergoing profound changes which we believe are essential, and some anxieties have arisen from this, but I should like to commend the positive way in which scientists—and all civil servants — have responded to change and to acknowledge the valuable and increasingly efficient service that they provide.

Mr. Dalyell: Is the Minister aware that members of the Standing Committee on the Agriculture Bill—his own colleagues as much as mine—have had a great deal of contact with staff at agricultural research stations and with the Institution of Professional Civil Servants and others who represent them? Is he further aware that the picture that we have, if not one of chaos, is one of great and demoralising uncertainty? Are those people to be left to the MAFF accountants, or has the Minister some role in protecting people who have been good and imaginative servants of this country?

Mr. Luce: I appreciate the hon. Gentleman's comments about the standard of service provided by those scientists. This is principally a matter for my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, but rationalisation is currently taking place in the Agricultural Development and Advisory Service, which I believe affects the hon. Gentleman's constituency. I assure the hon. Gentleman that everything possible is being done at this stage to find alternative jobs for all the people working at Lasswade.

Mr. Latham: Is my hon. Friend aware of the low morale among the distinguished scientists of the British Geological Survey at Keyworth, many of whom are my constituents? Will he consider whether they should remain under the control of the Natural Environment Research Council, as they believe that in that body science is decreasing but administration is increasing?

Mr. Luce: I believe that the Civil Service has been losing some good scientists. For that reason, we have introduced a number of changes, including an additional pay allowance for some civil servants of that type so as to give priority to recruitment and retention.

Mr. Robert Sheldon: I appreciate the Minister's respect for the civil servants in his charge. Will he ensure that they receive the same respect from other members of the Government, notably the Prime Minister, who does not have a very high regard for civil servants? Does he agree that he has a great responsibility to ensure that the demoralisation of the Civil Service that has occurred in the past few years is ended with respect to pay as well as to other matters?

Mr. Luce: The right hon. Gentleman fails to acknowledge the extent of the change in the Civil Service that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has led and with which all Ministers have co-operated — indeed, advocated — fully. The change has led to vastly improved efficiency through the financial management initiative and various other improvements and efficiency schemes, the results of which are acknowledged by all of my colleagues.

Work Loads

43. Dr. Michael Clark asked the Minister for the Civil Service if he will indicate the change in work load for civil servants between June 1983 and June 1985 and the corresponding increase in productivity between the same two dates.

Mr. Luce: The annual reports by the Treasury to the Treasury and Civil Service Committee on Civil Service manpower reductions, copies of which are in the Library, provide some indication of the effects on Civil Service manpower levels of changes in work load. These show a saving of nearly 20,000 posts between 1 April 1983 and 1 April 1985 from improved efficiency and more streamlined working.

Dr. Clark: I welcome the increased productivity of Civil Servants. Is it due in part to performance appraisal? Do civil servants in the Department of Education and Science participate in such performance appraisals? Is that not an example to teachers who reject appraisal?

Mr. Luce: I cannot answer for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science about the appraisal of teachers, but in the Civil Service we are putting ever more emphasis on performance assessment and on individuals' achievement in the job. The result is much more effective management, and it provides a good example.

Mr. Home Robertson: Further to what my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) said about the work load of civil servants in agricultural research and development, does the Minister agree that there has been a 41 per cent. cut in funding of the service in Scotland at the very time when there is an unprecedented need for research into alternative techniques, and that the result is impossible strain on people working in the Department?

Mr. Luce: The details of that matter are for my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, but there is careful monitoring of the work load on civil servants in all Departments. When a special case is made out—as, for example, with Customs and Excise or the Inland Revenue—adjustments can be made.

Mr. Hardy: Is the Minister aware that the burden on DHSS and Department of Employment staff, especially in the coalfields, leads one to the view that the Government might be asking too much from conscientious officials?

Mr. Luce: I have no doubt about the remarkable job being done by a pared down Civil Service under considerable pressures because of the efficiency changes. There is constant monitoring of the efforts made by civil servants and their work load, and adjustments can be made.

Mr. Skinner: Can the Minister explain this bizarre contradiction? He mentioned a reduction of 20,000 in Civil Service manpower. It cost £1·2 million to run 10 Downing street when the Labour Prime Minister left, but it costs £3·8 million in 1984-85? Does he agree that there are more civil servants in 10 Downing street now—some with beards and some probably economists—in direct contradiction of everything for which the Prime Minister stands for everybody else? There is no rate capping at 10 Downing street.

Mr. Luce: There are civil servants at 10 Downing street, just as there are everywhere else, and they are of the highest calibre. We have rightly reduced Civil Service manpower by 20 per cent. in the past six years. We have asked the Civil Service to become more efficient and more streamlined. It has become more professional.

Mr. Viggers: Does my hon. Friend agree that if DHSS staff are under pressure — as they are — we need a simpler system? We look forward to hearing a statement on a simpler system later today.

Mr. Luce: That is why we emphasised the need for more efficient systems and a more streamlined service. That is what we are working towards.

Dr. McDonald: The Minister's reply to that last question will not do. Is he aware that the Chief Auditor's report shows that one in three supplementary benefit claims is mistakenly administered because of enormous pressures on DHSS staff? Is he further aware that the White Paper, which is shortly to be announced, will put enormous pressure on DHSS staff? It will not reduce their work load it will increase it, partly because of administration of what was called the social fund.

Will the Minister consult his colleagues to ensure that more DHSS staff are recruited to cope with the enormous increase in their work? Will he also ensure that the gap is not made up by increasing temporary staff, in the light of the forthcoming White Paper?

Mr. Luce: All those questions should be put to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services. We continually monitor the work load of the Civil Service and take that into account when examining the size of each Department.

Social Security White Paper

3.30 pm

The Secretary of State for Social Services (Mr. Norman Fowler): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I shall make a statement on the Social Security White Paper which I am publishing today.

In June the Government published a Green Paper which set out in detail the case for change, the Government's objectives for social security and our proposals for achieving them. That Green Paper marked a further stage in the process of review and public consultation which began two years ago in the autumn of 1983.

The Government have four main aims. We want to see a simpler system of social security which provides a better service to the public. By common consent, social security at present is too complex. There are some 30 benefits, each with separate and frequently conflicting rules of entitlement, and supplementary benefit alone requires almost 40,000 staff to administer it.

We want to see more people looking forward to greater independence in retirement. Only half the work force currently have occupational pensions of their own. Our plans extend not only to occupational pensions but, for the first time, provide a new right to personal pensions.

We want a system which is financially secure. As the Government Actuary's report, published with the White Paper, demonstrates, the future cost of the state earnings-related pension scheme will grow substantially—at the same time as the ratio of contributors to pensioners worsens. The Government believe that this problem must be tackled now.

Above all, we want to see more effective help going to those who most need it. More than half of those living on the lowest incomes today are in families with children. This includes both families where the parents are unemployed and low-income working families. Added to this people can still find themselves with less income in work than if they were unemployed. Others can find that a pay rise in work can actually make them worse off. The Government believe that urgent action is necessary to tackle these problems.

One of the major priorities of the Government's proposals is to make better provision for low-income working families with children. Accordingly, we propose to abolish the present family income supplement and to introduce a new benefit, family credit.

Family credit is designed to ensure that families with children will be better off in work. It will be based on take-home or net pay—rather than gross earnings, as with family income supplement—so that the worst effects of the poverty trap are eliminated.

We expect that, compared with family income supplement, family credit will give help to an extra 200,000 families. In other words, twice as many low income families with children will benefit from the new scheme. Family credit will be paid through the pay packet, but it should be emphasised that child benefit will be paid in addition and that that payment will go, as now, direct to the mothers.

We also intend to bring extra support to families who are not in work. This will be achieved through the new income support scheme. A family premium—a special higher level of benefit—will be paid on top of the basic income support rate and on top of the rates for individual children. One of the groups who will most gain from this change will be unemployed families with children.

The income support scheme will replace supplementary benefit. The regular extra payments now made on the basis of detailed individual assessment will be absorbed into the main rates of benefit. As well as a premium for families with children, there will be an additional premium for lone parents and premiums for pensioners and the long-term sick and disabled. At the same time, the capital rule, which at present is an inflexible £3,000 cut off, will be substantiall eased, and we will also ease the earnings rules for lone parents, disabled people and long-term unemployed families.

While the broad pattern of income support will remain as set out in the Green Paper, we have modified our proposals in the light of consultations in two significant ways.

First, the income support rate will still be based on age divisions at 18 and 25 for single people. However, in order to help young families with children in particular, we now intend to have the same rate for all couples over 18.

Secondly, we intend to increase the help for families with more than one disabled child. The Green Paper proposed a double family premium where there was one disabled child or more. We have now decided to pay the extra premium for each disabled child in a household.

This last change will reinforce the special attention which we give to disabled people in our proposals. They will benefit from the premium in income support and from a higher earnings disregard. Overall, disabled people on low incomes will benefit significantly from the proposals.

However well designed the income support scheme may be, it cannot anticipate every special or emergency need. These needs will be dealt with by the social fund.

Instead of the present small universal maternity and death grants—which have both remained at the same value for over 15 years—proper help will be available from the fund to all low income families, not just those on supplementary benefit. The grant for funeral expenses will ensure that the full cost of the funeral can be met, and it is planned that the maternity grant should be set at about £75. Grants will also be given for community care purposes; for example, to help someone leaving a long-stay hospital. In addition, the fund will provide loans to help claimants cope with items other than normal weekly needs.

The main structure of our housing benefit proposals has been acknowledged as an important simplification of the scheme. Treating employed and unemployed people alike, and so getting rid of two separate systems in housing benefit, has been particularly welcomed.

We shall go ahead with this, but I intend, in response to consultations, to make two significant changes to the Green Paper proposals. First, I recognise the anxieties expressed about the effect of a single taper for rent and rates on owner-occupiers, particularly pensioners. I also recognise the concern of local authorities that a single taper would create administrative difficulties for them. We shall therefore keep separate tapers for rent and rates, and this will still be a substantial simplification compared with the six tapers in the present system.

Secondly, although the general power to run local housing benefit schemes will be ended, local authorities will retain their power to grant extra benefit to individual claimants in exceptional circumstances. I have also decided that they should retain their power to give special treatment to war pensioners.

[Mr. Norman Fowler]

As we made clear in the Green Paper, we believe that the basis on which help is provided with rates needs to be changed. At present, around 7 million householders receive help with some or all of their rates bill, and up to 3 million householders pay no rates. We stand by the principle that everyone should make a contribution towards the cost of his local services. The White Paper therefore reaffirms the proposal that everyone should pay at least 20 per cent. of his rates, but the proposals which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment will be bringing forward shortly on the reform of local taxation may affect the way this contribution is made.

The Government will be carrying forward the proposals for directing widows' benefits to those who need them most and for making maternity allowance more flexible and more closely related to recent work. The new lump sum payment of £1,000 to widows will be tax-free and will be ignored when considering help with funeral expenses. The White Paper also proposes that maternity allowances, like statutory sick pay, should be paid through employers, and a consultation document will be published shortly on this.

On timing, we shall move to the first April uprating in 1987 and at that time we shall introduce other changes like statutory maternity allowance and the new system of help with maternity and funeral costs. The main structural changes to income-related benefits and the other elements of the social fund will be introduced in April 1988. This recognises the arguments of employers and local authorities that the timetable must allow them to make proper preparations.

As far as income-related benefits are concerned, a technical annex is published with the White Paper. The figures show the possible distributional effects of the changes, but these can be no more than illustrative. The actual position at the time of change will depend, among other things, on the exact benefit rates decided for April 1988, and the illustrative figures take no account of any changes resulting from the reform of rates.

As far as pensions policy is concerned, the Government Actuary's report, published with the White Paper, shows that if no action is taken, total pension costs will increase from under £15·5 billion to nearly £49 billion a year provided that the basic pension is uprated by prices. If, as some urge, the basic pension is uprated in line with earnings, the total pension cost increases to nearly £73 billion, which would require a national insurance contribution of 27·5 per cent. The cost of SERPS alone will increase from barely £200 million today to £25·5 billion.

The Government cannot ignore the vast pension bill which is being handed down to our children. In the consultation a number of important organisations recognised that case but argued that, rather than completely replacing SERPS, the costs could be reduced by modifying its provisions. In testing whether a policy of modifying SERPS would be acceptable, the Government have two major objectives. First, we want to see the future cost of SERPS substantially reduced. Secondly, and even more fundamentally, we want to see many more people with their own pension. It is on the basis that both of those objectives can be achieved that the Government are prepared to change the proposals from those put forward in the Green Paper.

The Government propose to modify the scheme so that costs in the next century can be afforded. As with the Green Paper proposals, the Government recognise the particular needs of those nearest retirement. The SERPS changes will not affect anyone retiring this century, nor anyone widowed this century. There will also be a transitional period as the new scheme comes into effect fully in 2010. The basic pension is entirely unaffected by the proposals, and we will continue fully to protect its value.

The changes to SERPS are that occupational schemes contracted out of the state scheme should be responsible for inflation-proofing guaranteed minimum pensions in payment up to 3 per cent. a year; SERPS pensions should be based on a lifetime's earnings, not on the best 20 years as now, but special protection will be built in for women who have breaks in work to bring up families and for those who become disabled and people looking after them; SERPS pensions should be calculated on 20 per cent. of earnings rather than 25 per cent.; and widows and widowers over 65 should be allowed to inherit half their spouse's SERPS rights, rather than the full amount as now.

However, policy on SERPS is only part of the Government's pensions strategy. Our central aim is to provide many more people with their own pension. The White Paper puts forward a six point plan to achieve that. First, a special incentive will be given to encourage the setting up a new occupational pension schemes. That will consist of a reduction, or rebate, on national insurance contributions. An extra 2 per cent. rebate will be added to the existing rebate, making a total incentive of almost 8 per cent. That special rebate will last for five years.

Secondly, for the first time, every employee will be able to take a personal pension, whether or not his employer runs an occupational scheme. The holder of a personal pension will also receive the special national insurance incentive and his contributions will qualify for tax relief.

Thirdly, for the first time, employers will be able to contract out of the state scheme by guaranteeing a level of contribution to an occupational scheme — rather than accept the unlimited liability of promising a "final salary" pension. Those new arrangements will also open the way for more industry-wide schemes.

Fourthly, building societies, banks and unit trusts will be able to provide personal pension savings schemes, as well as group schemes.

Fifthly, all members of occupational pension schemes will in future have the right to pay additional voluntary contributions in order to boost their income in retirement.

Sixthly, people with personal pensions will be fully covered by the new investor protection arrangements to be made for all financial services.

The changes build on top of the reforms introduced by the Social Security Act 1985 which protect the rights of early leavers. The White Paper proposes that that protection will be extended to all members of schemes leaving after two years rather than five years, as now. Anyone changing jobs will be able to transfer all his rights into a personal pension.

The effect of the White Paper proposals will be to direct substantially more help to low income families with children, and to provide more help for disabled people on low incomes. We will take new steps to increase the spread of occupational pensions and give everyone the right to have a personal pension. We will provide a simpler and more effective benefit structure, and have now embarked on the biggest computer project of its kind in Western Europe.

Following the White Paper, the Government will introduce comprehensive legislation early in the new year. The aim will be to achieve a modern social security system directing help where that help is needed.

Mr. Michael Meacher (Oldham, West): Is the Secretary of State aware that, following the humiliating rebuff that he received from the Green Paper consultation, we welcome the fact that the Government have been forced, by near unanimous opposition, to back off from a few of their most damaging original proposals? Is he also aware that 1·75 million more people will lose from this revised package than will gain and that it is much less about reform than about cuts totalling around £750 million? Is he aware that the changes proposed today can be expected to have little impact on the unprecedented 80 to 90 per cent. opposition registered during the consultation period and the near-unanimous hostility of the CBI, the pension and insurance industries, the churches, the women's institutes, the poverty lobby and the Law Society?

Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that, after six months of fudging on the figures and denial of information we know is available, the nation is still not being told in this White Paper the total size of the cuts in this package, or even the actual new benefit rates? Is he aware that to supply illustrative benefit rates only is wholly unacceptable when the Government have no commitment to maintain them, and when all the new benefit levels could, and should, have been set out at 1985 cash levels for the purposes of genuine comparison with the present position? Is he aware that even on his own illustrative figures, 3,800,000 households will lose benefit under these proposals, including 2·25 million pensioners? I do not know why the Secretary of State is shaking his head, because this is shown by his figures.

Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that nearly 500,000 will lose more than £5 a week and that 1·25 million households, including nearly 500,000 pensioners, will lose more than £3 a week? Is he aware that while we welcome the fact that the Government have been forced to back down from abolishing SERPS by the implacable hostility of everyone except the Institute of Directors and the Monday Club, who are the Secretary of State's sole admirers, we utterly condemn the proposed emasculation of SERPS? That will chop £12 billion, which is almost 50 per cent., off the value of pensions in the year 2033, with accumulative figures in the years up to that date. It will throw millions of elderly people back into means-tested poverty, and it is wholly unnecessary when the Government's pensions Actuary has pronounced that the funding of the existing SERPS scheme is perfectly sound.

Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the abolition of the best-20-years rule will gravely disadvantage all those who are prevented from achieving a full working life—the long-term unemployed, mothers, the disabled, and the millions who care for the long-term sick and elderly? Is he further aware that his proposal to calculate SERPS pensions as only 20 per cent. of earnings will leave millions of low-paid workers with inadequate pensions? Is he aware that his proposal to cut widow's benefit in half is harsh and unfair, when in a few months' time, the Chancellor will be handing out far bigger sums in tax reliefs to much richer sections of the population?

On housing benefit, while the Secretary of State has been only too anxious to make expedient concessions to pensioner owner occupiers who are Tory voters, is it not sheer political prejudice that he has at the same time actually worsened, compared with the Green Paper, the position of occupational pensioners who rent accommodation, by raising the rent taper from 50 per cent. to 60 per cent.? How can he possibly justify requiring all households, including pensioners and the poorest on supplementary benefit, to pay 20 per cent. towards their rates bills? Is he aware that this is the first time ever that any Government, by their own intervention, have forced millions of claimants below the poverty line? Is he aware that this makes nonsense of his claim to be targeting more help on the very poorest? It shows that he is targeting cuts on the very poorest.

On the new so-called income support scheme, will the Secretary of State confirm that the Government still intend to refuse to cover mortgage interest payments for families on the dole, which means that there will be much less money for food and other essentials and which in many cases will almost certainly lead to eviction and homelessness.

On the so-called social fund — one of the most objectionable elements of the whole package—why has the Secretary of State, who claims to listen to public opinion, taken no notice of the intense and unanimous opposition to the replacement of grants by means tests and to the halving of the budget for essential household items, which will mean that hundreds of thousands of pensioners and poor families will go without? Why is he insisting upon pushing families below the poverty line—that is what will happen—by recovering social fund payments through deductions from future supplementary benefit?

On family credit, why has the Secretary of State actually increased the taper to 70 per cent. compared with only 50 per cent. for family income supplement, which was bad enough, when this will greatly worsen the poverty trap? Why has he taken no account of the unanimous opposition to paying this new benefit to the man and not the woman with the main responsibility for family care?

Does it not expose the politics of this Government when their much trumpeted review of the welfare state ends with benefit cuts of £750 million for the most needy, when at the same time this same Government have handed out £2 billion to the richest 2 per cent. of the population on over £30,000 a year? Indeed, what justification is there for cuts in national insurance benefits when people have earned their entitlement to full benefit and have a right to it and when any private insurance company which reneged on its obligations—as the Secretary of State is doing—would be taken to court and charged with bad faith and breach of contract?

There is no political mandate for this package. Not one of the Secretary of State's proposals commands national majority support. When this is put to the British people, as it now must be at the next general election, it will be one of the central reasons why this Government are swept from power.

Mr. Fowler: That is a typically foolish response from the hon. Gentleman. It shows that he has mostly not even listened to the statement, and when he has listened to it he has not understood it. The hon. Gentleman has made a series of assertions, most of which are completely inaccurate. Let me try to take the hon. Gentleman through his proposals. I make absolutely no apology for taking consultation seriously. That is why we embarked upon the consultation exercise in 1983 and published a Green Paper. As for cost, the purpose of the exercise is to make better use of resources.

The hon. Gentleman said that the figures are only illustrative. They can, of course, be only illustrative. It is impossible to work out the effect of changes following the uprating in April 1988. One cannot work out the changes. For example, without rates reform one is unable to show the effect upon single pensioners. [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) may find that amusing, but rates reform clearly has an effect and impact upon single pensioners. The Green Paper on that will be issued next month, so the hon. Gentleman has only to wait.

As for benefit areas, these proposals will provide more help—not less—for 200,000 low-income families with children and for disabled people. They provide an extension of occupational pensions, a right to personal pensions and a simplification of the system. In the benefit areas themselves, the support for low-income working families with children will increase family credit by an estimated additional £200 million a year at this stage. Changes from supplementary benefit to income support are not intended to reduce help, and there will be no cash losers as a result of that change. the White Paper makes it clear that we expect spending on housing benefits to be reduced by about £450 million, as I said previously, but that must be compared with the areas where increases will take place.

As to modification of SERPS, the hon. Member must look at the Government Actuary's figures at the end of the White Paper. They show that there will be a very substantial increase in the cost of SERPS. On the basis of the hon. Gentleman's own policies—with an earnings uprating in basic pensions—the cost will go up to £73 billion, and that will mean a national insurance contribution of 27·5 per cent. The hon. Gentleman says that he wants to fight the election on issues of this kind. I welcome that challenge, but he will have to produce a policy, and at present the Labour party has none.

Dame Jill Knight (Birmingham, Edgbaston): Will my right hon. Friend assure the House and the country that this scheme will meet the four-point "window test"—first, that all genuinely needy people will be helped; secondly, that the scheme will not actively discourage persons from standing on their own feet or taking jobs where and when they may be available; thirdly, that the scheme will neither bankrupt the country nor be the despair of future taxpayers; and, forthly, that the desperately needed streamlining of the social security system is being accomplished?

Mr. Fowler: I can satisfy my hon. Friend on those points. The proposals themselves will provide more help, particularly for low-income families and the disabled. If the Leader of the Opposition understood my point, I am sure he would also support the fact that we are tackling not only the unemployment trap but the poverty trap. That is precisely the point that my hon. Friend made. Above all, we are seeking to introduce a modern social security system, which means that the system itself must be simplified.

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): Is the Secretary of State aware that the alliance believes that this White Paper contains the same intrinsic flaws as the Green Paper? It does nothing constructive to integrate the taxation system with the benefits system; it does nothing to establish modern, minimum standards-of-living requirements for those on benefit; and it does nothing to remedy the financial plight of elderly pensioners who are relying on supplementary pensions. The White Paper raises the additional spectre of the nightmare of constitutional clashes with the courts by investing in the Secretary of State massive devolved powers that he will arrogate to himself in the way that made Mr. Corton a household name in recent weeks.

Secondly, the lack of an independent tribunal system for the social fund is guaranteed to bring the right hon. Gentleman into conflict with the courts.

I appeal to the Secretary of State: he has announced that some of the changes are not to be introduced until 1988, so he has time. Why does he not use that time to have all-party talks to try to get a consensus on tax, pensions and benefits? I warn him that if the mechanism for paying benefits is not agreed and is not likely to survive an election, we are on course for financial uncertainty and administrative chaos.

Mr. Fowler: I am always an optimist, but, with the best will in the world, it seems to me that all-party talks involving the hon. Member for Oldham, West are unlikely to provide a consensus on social security policy.

I share the aspirations of the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) on tax and social security. Family credit is an important step in that direction and it will provide more support for the families about which he and I are concerned.

There will be full and comprehensive legislation on our proposals. No previous Government have spent more time consulting the public and seeking to involve the public and organisations in the making of policy. This exercise started in 1983. It is now time not for more consultation, but for action.

Sir William Clark (Croydon, South): Is my right hon. Friend aware that many people throughout the country will welcome the assistance to be given to low-income families and that any a fair-minded person must agree that that as SERPS is not funded—it is a pay-as-you-go scheme—it is ludicrous to think that future taxpayers could suffer the burden if SERPS were not altered. By what amount does my right hon. Friend think that the projected £25 billion cost of SERPS will be reduced by his proposals?

With personal pensions for employees, will there be any change in the national insurance contributions of self-employed people who take out pensions?

Mr. Fowler: There will be no change for the self-employed.

My hon. Friend is right to say that SERPS is a pay-as-you-go scheme and not a funded insurance scheme. The result of the changes that I am proposing will be that by the year 2033 the cost will have come down from a projected £25 billion to about £13 billion. We shall have reduced the emerging costs by about half. We shall also have protected fully the interests of those who are nearer retirement. That is why I said that those who are retiring in this century will not be affected by our changes.

Mrs. Renée Short (Wolverhampton, North-East): The Secretary of State will recall that the Select Committee on Social Services examined the proposals in his Green paper. It is usual for the Chairman of the Select Committee to have a note from the Secretary of State before statements are made, but I have not had such a note.

The right hon. Gentleman referred to the number of staff involved in operating the present system. What changes will be made? Will the number of staff be increased or reduced?

Housing benefit and supplementary benefit were introduced by this Government; they are now to be changed radically. What guarantee do we have that the right hon. Gentleman has got it right this time? In view of the criticisms made by many of the witnesses who appeared before the Select Committee, I think that there will be great anxiety about the Government's proposals.

The right hon. Gentleman said that family credit will be provided for the very poor, and he referred to 200,000 families. What about the rest of the very poor? There are more than 3 million unemployed people, many of whom have families. What will be done to help them?

The Secretary of State said that local authorities will be able to give extra housing benefit in certain circumstances. Will he provide the resources for local authorities to give that help? If so, how much will he provide?

I remind the Secretary of State——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I know that the hon. Lady is the Chairman of the Select Committee, but it is unfair to treat this as a debate.

Mrs. Short: I have only one more sentence, Mr. Speaker. I remind the Secretary of State that whatever consensus about pensions, housing benefits and the rest existed previously, he has now destroyed it.

Mr. Fowler: Local authorities have always had to provide the resources for local schemes, and that will continue to be the case.

I apologise if no note has reached the hon. Lady as Chairman of the Select Committee. It is on its way to her and I hope that it will arrive in due course.

With the simplification of the system and the computer strategy, there will ultimately be a substantial reduction in staff requirements.

I remind the hon. Lady that the Government have examined an income support scheme in more detail than have any previous Government. The last major review of this sort, back in the 1940s, left that area to one side. We have tried to distinguish between income support, which is the overwhelming support, and the residual support for special needs and such matters, which will be taken up through the social fund.

Mr. Robert McCrindle (Brentwood and Ongar): As an erstwhile critic of the abolition of SERPS, perhaps I may be forgiven for expressing particular pleasure at the content of one part of my right hon. Friend's statement. Is it not clear from what he has said that, by the various inducements that are to be built up to persuade people to move to occupational pension schemes or individual personal pensions, the time will come in the not-too-distant future when the need for SERPS will have receded to the point where it is no more than a residual scheme? In retrospect, is that not far better than abolition?

As my right hon. Friend has a highly saleable proposition, will he undertake, with, I hope, the support of all his ministerial colleagues, the marketing of the scheme? Some of us feel that it is a step forward in our aim of achieving a property-owning democracy which could be equal to the sale of council houses—and we all know how successful that policy has been.

Mr. Fowler: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, whose knowledge and independence on pensions policy I very much respect. My hon. Friend is right. Our proposals will, I hope, mean that it will be the exception for those reaching retirement age not to have a pension of their own. The Government and I are entirely in favour of extending occupational and personal pensions to the maximum number of people. That is what the public want and that is what the Government are about.

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead): Does the right hon. Gentleman recall that when I questioned him on his Green Paper, I asked him about the effects of his proposals on the number of poor. I return to that question: if the White Paper is implemented, will there be more poor people or fewer?

Will the right hon. Gentleman give the House his estimate of the savings or, as we would say, the cuts in public expenditure over the next two years leading up to the general election?

Mr. Fowler: The straight answer to the hon. Gentleman is that there will be fewer in terms of the poor, and that is the whole purpose behind the proposals that we are setting out. The hon. Gentleman will see from the White Paper that we seek to direct extra help to low-income families — a subject on which the hon. Gentleman has special expertise and knowledge — as well as to disabled people on low incomes. Regarding public spending, as I have said before, the purpose of the exercise is to make better use of resources. The major savings on SERPS are not immediate but will come in the next century. In the immediate future, I repeat that there will be increases in public spending for family credit. There will be equality for income support and supplementary benefit and spending on housing benefit will be reduced.

Mr. Roy Galley (Halifax): The flexibility that my right hon. Friend showed during the consultation process will be appreciated and welcomed throughout the country. Despite the rumblings from Opposition Members, will he confirm that the majority of low-income families with children will benefit from the proposals? Will he give more details about the modifications to the family credit proposals and will he tell us the facts on which is based the calculation that 200,000 more families will benefit under family credit?

Mr. Fowler: I confirm what my hon. Friend has said. In the inquiry leading up to the Green Paper the problems of the poorest—those with the lowest incomes—were clearly defined. During the past 20 years the number of low-income families with children has increased. On the basis of that diagnosis we sought to develop a new policy. Family income supplement was an attempt to deal with the circumstances of the early 1970s, but it did not work and led to the unemployment and poverty traps. That is why we have developed family credit. We have made several changes to family credit such as the change from 13 weeks to five weeks, which will ease the administration of the scheme.

[Mr. Fowler]

Mr. Lewis Carter-Jones (Eccles): In view of the difficulties experienced by the disabled housewife and mother, will the Secretary of State reconsider his position on the treatment of the old HNCIB?

Mr. Fowler: I believe that that is dealt with by the severe disablement allowance. However, in addition to our proposals we are carrying out a survey on the needs of disabled people to help Governments to form realistic and new policies for the disabled. I believe that that will be welcomed.

Dr. Brian Mawhinney (Peterborough): Will my right hon. Friend confirm that the help with funeral costs available to the low-paid will be in the form of grants rather than loans? Will he also confirm that in setting the premiums for elderly people the personal heating allowance will be taken into account?

Mr. Fowler: I give assurances on both points. The financial resources for heating additions will be in the income support rates. Funeral expenses will be in the form of grants, not loans.

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): Why does the hon. Gentleman not come clean and admit that the damaging implications of these changes, without proper disclosure of figures, are not likely to be appreciable until after the next general election, which is now nearly certain to happen before April 1987?

Mr. Fowler: I have produced a technical annex that is full of illustrative figures. However, I repeat to the hon. Gentleman that with the best will in the world it is impossible to show with those figures what the exact benefits will be in April 1987.

Sir Dudley Smith (Warwick and Leamington): Is my right hon. Friend aware that on BBC radio this morning the Opposition spokesman alleged categorically that the longer-term funding of the present system was no problem, even without increased taxation? Will my right hon. Friend give the lie to that allegation?

Mr. Fowler: The hon. Member for Oldham, West constantly quotes the Government Actuary in support of his case. The hon. Gentleman should read with more care what the Government Actuary said, not only in the current report attached to the White Paper, which I accept the hon. Gentleman did not have the benefit of seeing before he spoke this morning, but in several reports. As the hon. Gentleman knows, SERPS will increase the value of pensions. There will be an increase of about £4 million for pensioners, and the hon. Gentleman should know that the ratio of contributors to the pensions will worsen. The public should understand that under Labour's policy, with the earnings uprating, the total cost of pensions would rise to £73 billion which would mean a national insurance contribution of 27·5 per cent. That is what the Labour party propose.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must take into account the fact that this is a Private Member's day and that there is a further statement to follow. I will allow questions to continue for another 10 minutes, and if hon. Members put their questions briefly, I hope that most will be able to contribute.

Mr. Gordon Brown (Dunfermline, East): Does the right hon. Gentleman accept that, even on his inadequate illustrative figures, 7 million mothers and 12 million children will be worse off because of changes in child benefit, 3·8 million people, including 2 million pensioners, will be worse off because of changes in housing and supplementary benefit, and half the population will be worse off because because of his scheme? Will he tell us the truth? As a result of the White Paper, which brings a black Christmas for claimants, by how much does he intend to cut supplementary benefit before 1988 and by how much does he plan to cut the social security budget after 1988?

Mr. Fowler: The hon. Member knows that that is not the case. His questions show all the signs of a supplementary question rehearsed before he had the opportunity to read the White Paper.

Mr. Roger Freeman (Kettering): Is my right hon. Friend aware that his proposals on personal pensions will be warmly welcomed by many people who wish to stay in occupational pension schemes but who wish to make additional provision through personal pensions? Will he confirm that the Government will consider the revenue restrictions on additional voluntary contributions so that the full amount—up to 15 per cent. of salary—will apply to personal pensions contributions.

Mr. Fowler: Yes. In the legislation to follow we seek to provide everyone with the right to a personal pension irrespective of whether they are in a scheme at present. That is an important step forward. Those people will benefit from the special national insurance incentive that I have announced and they will benefit from tax relief. Those points will be welcomed by industry and the public.

Mr. Peter Viggers (Gosport): I thank my right hon. Friend for responding to representations to preserve the special position of war widows.

Mr. Fowler: We listened to representations, and we believe that it is right to make an exception in the case of war pensions.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett (Denton and Reddish): Will the Secretary of State say whether it is the Government's intention to remove the right of students to claim supplementary benefit during the long vacation and their right to claim housing benefit? Does he agree that that would cause them considerable hardship? Will he confirm that it is not the Government's intention to enact the proposals through secondary legislation but that the Government will wait for statutory powers?

Mr. Fowler: As the Green Paper made clear, we want a change in the supplementary benefit arrangements for students. We would prefer a system whereby the support for students goes through grants, not supplementary benefit and housing benefit. We shall try to develop that principle. The hon. Gentleman will see when it is introduced that the legislation is comprehensive and that many of the fears that have been whipped up about it are unfounded.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley (Surrey, South-West): Does my right hon. Friend agree that all those who genuinely seek to meet real need effectively with resources will welcome his announcement that maternity and death grants will be made available at realistic levels to those in need, whether in or out of work?

Mr. Fowler: That is right. The maternity grant and the death grant have been unchanged for between 15 and 20 years. That position cannot remotely be defended. We are trying to give realistic and proper help to those who need it for funeral expenses and maternity expenses.

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Cromarty and Skye): Will the Secretary of State concede that the sort of social security system that will result from his announcement will not be essentially fairer but will be essentially meaner? Does he accept that that will happen because he is trying to redistribute income in our society within definitions of income bands that have been drawn tightly between what he regards as the deserving and the undeserving poor? Do his illustrative figures not show that 2 million pensioners will lose at least £1 a week and that more than 10 per cent. of them will lose more than £5 a week?

Mr. Fowler: The hon. Gentleman is probably quoting from the second set of tables. The basis for those tables is the position before the reform has any effect. It requires a little imagination to understand that there will be an impact on single pensioners. I do not agree with the hon. Gentleman that the system will be less fair. When he has had more time to study the White Paper, he will accept that it will direct help more effectively to those people, notably low-income families, who by any definition are most in need.

Mr. Peter Thurnham (Bolton, North-East): In welcoming extra help for the disabled, may I ask my right hon. Friend to clarify when families with more than one disabled child can expect to benefit from the proposals?

Mr. Fowler: That part of the proposals will come into effect in April 1988, with the majority of the proposals that we shall introduce and with the new pension arrangements.

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley): Does the Secretary of State accept that the changes that he has proposed for SERPS and the guaranteed occupational pension schemes will mean a turning back of the clock for manual workers and a reduction in pension rights? Is not his estimate of a 27·5 per cent. contribution rate blatant scaremongering?

Mr. Fowler: I do not accept that it is blatant scaremongering. I have tried to quote the estimate put forward by the Government Actuary, as the hon. Member for Oldham, West did on the radio this morning. I have not simply pulled the figure out of the air. Does the hon. Gentleman share the aspirations of the Government to extend pensions for individuals through occupational schemes and through personal pensions? The inquiry showed clearly that the majority of people want their own pensions, and that is what we shall try to provide.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): Will my right hon. Friend and my hon. Friend the Minister of State accept that the Select Committee on Social Services, of which I am the longest-serving Conservative Member, is grateful for the fact that he has listened to the views expressed by the thousands of people who communicated with him and to the views of the Select Committee? Will he also accept that his views on SERPS are welcome and the fact that he has amended his original views is widely appreciated? Although I do not wish to be controversial in what I say now, will he tell the House whether he is intending to be a Scrooge or a Father Christmas in his announcement? I believe that he intends to be a Father Christmas.

Mr. Fowler: I cannot win with a comparison of that sort. I am trying to be fair. I pay tribute to the work of the Select Committee on Social Services, which we took fully into account.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): However hard the chairman of the Conservative party tries to dress up the White Paper, will not the British people soon come to see it for what it is: a charter for more cuts, more means testing and more misery? Does the Secretary of State understand that the absence of the Prime Minister and most of his Cabinet colleagues this afternoon shows that they do not regard the White Paper as a new Beveridge plan, but are ashamed of it and do not wish to be associated with it publicly?

Mr. Fowler: I do not see many prominent figures on the Opposition Front Bench. For example, I have no idea who the man with the beard is. The hon. Gentleman had better be a little more cautious in his statements. I am content to allow the public to judge the proposals. They will judge them side by side with the proposals put forward by the hon. Member for Oldham, West on the abolition of mortgage tax relief. We look forward to the further development of those proposals.

Mrs. Edwina Currie (Derbyshire, South): Will my right hon. Friend remind us of who is paying for all this? In contrast to the comments made by the Opposition about losers, does he agree that since everyone is a taxpayer —whether through income tax, tax on savings, or VAT — we shall all gain from an improved, streamlined social security system?

Mr. Fowler: My hon. Friend is right. It is also worth remembering that we are talking about a budget of more than £41 billion a year. That is an increase of about 30 per cent. in real terms since 1979. More than half of the increase represents a real increase in benefits.

Westland

4.28 pm

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Leon Brittan): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement.

For some months now Westland plc has been in serious financial difficulties and has been seeking an association with an external partner or partners. Negotiations with United Technologies commenced in September 1985 and led to a proposal from Fiat and United Technologies.

At the suggestion of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence, the Government agreed that my right hon. Friend should explore the possibility of an alternative association with Aerospatiale, MBB and Agusta becoming available to Westland. An initial proposal emerged and, while it was being produced, the national armaments directors of the United Kingdom, France, Germany and Italy made a recommendation that certain helicopter requirements should in future be met solely from aircraft designed and built in Europe. For the United Kingdom, this recommendation represented a substantial extension to the Government's policy agreed with our European allies in 1978 and of our general approach to defence procurement as set out in the "Statement on the Defence Estimates 1985".

The existence of the national armaments directors' recommendation was regarded by Westland as a major obstacle to the United Technologies-Fiat option, which it at all times preferred. In view of the urgent necessity for a deal to be concluded quickly, the Government decided that from 13 December they would not be bound by the national armaments directors' recommendation unless Westland had by then received a firm offer from the three European companies, which the board would recommend to its shareholders. The Government's intention was to give time for the completion of a firm offer by the European companies to Westland, but to remove any politically imposed obstacle facing Westland if such an offer were not made in time or was unacceptable to Westland.

At the end of last week British Aerospace announced that it was prepared to provide a quarter of the funds offered by the European consortium. The Governments of the United Kingdom, France, Germany and Italy also agreed, but on an entirely provisional basis, that if the European offer were accepted they would meet their requirements in each of the three main helicopter classes by a single collaborative solution.

Westland plc announced on Friday evening that agreement had been reached in principle whereby United Technologies and Fiat will between them take a minority shareholding in Westland. The view of the board of Westland was that the European offer which was finally received was neither firm enough nor attractive enough for the board to be able to recommend it to its shareholders. Accordingly, Her Majesty's Government are not bound by the national armaments directors' recommendation. Full details of the United Technologies-Fiat agreement and of a capital reorganisation of Westland will be announced by the company shortly. As part of the proposed arrangements, Westland will take a licence from the Sikorsky division of United Technologies to manufacture, develop and sell the Blackhawk helicopter.

United Technologies was at all times fully aware that there was currently no Ministry of Defence requirement and no provision in the defence budget to buy the Blackhawk helicopter or any other comparable helicopter. Westland has welcomed the agreement as a private sector solution to its present financial difficulties which offers firm prospects of long-term viability and continues the close co-operation between Westland and Sikorsky, which has existed for several decades, and which led to the production under licence of the successful Wessex, Whirlwind and Sea King helicopters. Westland intends to continue with the Anglo-Italian EH101 programme, and to continue to take part in feasibility studies on a developed version of the A129 and on the NH90. United Technologies has assured Westland that it will continue to maintain a helicopter design and development capability in the United Kingdom.

The Government have ensured that Westland had an alternative European-based offer to consider, but, as a private sector company, it is for Westland to decide the best route to follow to secure its future and that of its employees.

Mr. Speaker: Mr. John Smith.

Mr. John Smith (Monklands, East) rose——

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Afterwards.

Mr. Skinner: It is very important.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure it is.

Mr. Skinner: Will the Secretary of State for Defence make his statment, because there are two conflicting views?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Mr. John Smith.

Mr. John Smith: Surely the Secretary of State is not seeking to pretend that there have not been fundamental disagreements, going right to the heart of Government policy, between himself and the Secretary of State for Defence, which have been advertised in the extraordinary public wrangling in recent days? Is there still any concept of collective responsibility in the Government?

Why did the Government refuse to help Westland many months ago when it asked for help? Would it not have been wise to support Britain's only helicopter manufacturer to keep a vital stake in the markets for our industry? Is the right hon. and learned Gentleman telling the House that Britain accepted a recommendation by the national armaments directors only a short time ago, only to have that undertaking unilaterally withdrawn today, apparently only because Westland's board wants to accept the United States' offer? Should our defence policy be decided by the interests of a private sector company?

Is it not revealing that the Secretary of State for Defence —perhaps belatedly, but certainly vigorously—has been fighting for the concept of national interest, while the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry has been defending the ideologically motivated non-interventionist stance of his party? Is it not the case that, as usually happens when the Prime Minister intervenes, party ideology has once again triumphed over the national interest?

Can the Secretary of State say why we should not believe the Secretary of State for Defence when he tells us that the United States deal will lead to a high-tech British company being reduced to metal bashing, and when he tells us that the deal may prejudice future European defence co-operation, especially on major helicopter projects? Is it not clear that United Technologies wants to find a way into the European market and that, instead of fighting for European industry, the Government are helping to open up American access to it? Does the research and design independence of Westland rest only on the assurance given by United Technologies? Is it not sad that the Government should assist Westland's chairman to find—I quote his recent statement—when what is desperately needed is a national solution to a national problem?

"a private sector solution to a private sector problem"

Will the Secretary of State intervene to defer a decision for at least a few weeks so that the future of a vital British industry is decided in an atmosphere of calm deliberation, with all the relevant information available, and with proper attention being paid to the national defence and manufacturing interests? Surely, when a great deal of Government money has already been invested in this company, and when thousands of jobs are possibly at stake—let alone the independence of a major British industrial interest—it is not enough for the Government to wash their hands of responsibility and leave a matter of such national consequence to a shareholders' meeting next Thursday, which will take place in the shadow of the threat of liquidation.

Mr. Brittan: On the right hon. Gentleman's first point, I assure him that my statement was made on behalf of the Government as a whole—[HON. MEMBERS: "Oh."]

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Brittan: The right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) alleged that the Government had refused help for Westland. The Government have taken the view that it would be far preferable for Westland to be able to find a solution to the problems that it faces without recourse to the taxpayer. That seems to be a reasonable position to take. It is clear that Westland has been able to do so.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman is misinformed on the question of the joint recommendation of the national armaments directors, and I am glad to be able to correct him. He was wrong in saying that Britain had accepted the recommendation. The recommendation was placed on the table and was never agreed to by the United Kingdom Government. The fact that it was on the table was, in effect, a pistol at the head of Sikorsky and Westland, preventing them from pursuing their preferred solution. None the less, the Government believed that the inquiries which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence was pursuing with a view to obtaining an offer from European countries were such that they should be pursued to the point at which a decision could be taken freely by the company.

The right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East is wholly misconceived in his suggestion that ideology is involved. It is not. There is concern for the welfare of Westland and the jobs of the people employed there. The right hon. Gentleman is also wholly misconceived and is picking up a cheap cliché in suggesting that the role of Westland, if the proposed deal goes through, is as he says. United Technologies has assured Westland that it will continue to maintain a helicopter design and development capability in the United Kingdom. What is more, Westland, which has responsibility in difficult circumstances and is under extreme pressure of time, for which the right hon. and learned Gentleman does not allow at all, believes that the maintenance of such a capability would have been less certain if it had accepted the European consortium's proposals.

Mr. Kenneth Warren (Hastings and Rye): Does my right hon. and learned Friend accept that there is a need to convey to the armaments directors of Europe an understanding that Westland is a European helicopter company? Does he also accept that nobody in Europe, particularly the chairman of Aerospatiale, has a right to say that such a company would stop Westland getting contracts in NATO? Will my right hon. and learned Friend make it clear to everybody in Europe that, with Sikorsky in the arrangement, it will be the same as it has always been, and that the content of Westland helicopters will remain 90 per cent. European?

Mr. Brittan: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. It is a gross over-simplification to present the choice as being between Europe and the United States. Westland is deeply involved, and will continue to be involved, with Europe. That has been made abundantly clear. The United States companies are also involved with Europe. As for Aerospatiale, the House will understand why Westland views the remark that has been quoted from the head of that company as having all the objectivity of a remark made by someone who had been doing his best to undermine and supplant the Westland Indian deal.

Mr. Paddy Ashdown (Yeovil): The right hon. and learned Gentleman's statement will be welcomed. Bearing in mind that the Government's indecision has been at the heart of many of Westland's long-term problems, what steps is the right hon. and learned Gentleman taking to make sure that the Cabinet is together on the issue and that Westland is not being treated as a ministerial plaything? Will he confirm that Westland's relationship with Sikorsky is not new, but stretches back over 40 years of fruitful co-operation? Will he also confirm that the EH101 participative deal is not threatened by the statement, but is perhaps enhanced by it? Will he give a clear undertaking to the House that Westland will not be penalised over the deal because it has put some individual Cabinet Ministers' noses out of joint?

Mr. Brittan: Of course the Government would not behave in the irresponsible way that the hon. Gentleman suggests. It would be the duty of all members of the Government to ensure that orders were placed for helicopters that were needed, in the right way, irrespective of any such unworthy considerations. The Government are committed to the EH101. Westland is also committed to it, and United Technologies has said that it will not interfere in any way and will assist in its promotion in north America. The president of Agusta, with which EH101 is being developed, confirmed on Saturday that his company will continue to co-operate with Westland on the programme.

The hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) is right in the general points that he made. Four of Westland's most successful projects since the war have been developments of original Sikorsky designs—Dragonfly, Wessex, Whirlwind, Sea King and its Army version, the Commando. Westland has sold over 1,200 of those aircraft. Its association with Sikorsky goes back to 1947. The three collaborative projects undertaken with Aerospatiale have been less successful.

[Mr. Brittan]

Sir Antony Buck (Colchester, North): Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that there is great admiration on both sides of the House for Sir John Cuckney, the head of the firm that is now Westland? Does my right hon. and learned Friend accept that to many of us a more European-oriented solution might have been preferable? Will he assure us that, whether or not that be so, the best helicopters, for both maritime and land use, will be available to our armed forces?

Mr. Brittan: I am sure that the latter is the case. The Government thought it right that the possibility of a European offer should be explored. That is why, at a meeting in my Department with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence, I readily agreed that he should explore that possibility. It was explored and put forward. The company took the view that it was not sufficiently firm or attractive for it to abandon its previously preferred option. It is worth pointing out that the European possibility arose late in the day, at a time when the company was under great financial pressure.

Mr. Merlyn Rees (Morley and Leeds, South): Is it not a strange constitutional position when on Sunday we hear the Secretary of State for Defence giving one view on the radio, and the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry giving a different view in the House the following day? As someone who has served in the Royal Air Force, I believe that the Secretary of State for Defence was speaking on behalf of the RAF and not on behalf of monetary or ideological considerations.

Mr. Brittan: The House will have heard what the right hon. Gentleman has said and his constitutional analysis. The statement that I am making is on behalf of the Government.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): Does my right hon. and learned Friend recall that for months many of us have been trying to remind Her Majesty's Government of the imminent problems of Westland, and in particular of the necessity of meeting air staff target 404 of the Royal Air Force for medium-lift helicopters with a Westland aeroplane? Was it not unrealistic of the Ministry of Defence to imagine that at the 11th hour it could impose a shotgun European marriage on Westland, when a European long-term helicopter strategy, though necessary, is bound to take a long time to concert?

Mr. Brittan: I shall draw my hon. Friend's remarks to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence.

Mr. Doug Hoyle (Warrington, North): Is the Secretary of State aware that while he is saying that he is speaking for the Government, the faces on the Government Front Bench show a different view? That shows the disunity of the Government on the subject. The right hon. and learned Gentleman talks about what the chairman of Westland has said, but how far have the employees and the trade unions been consulted? If that is done, I think he will find that they have a different opinion and that they would support the Secretary of State for Defence for a European solution, because that offers a better long-term future than the American proposal. Is he not aware — perhaps it is because of his lack of knowledge of industry—that the Government are once more selling out for short-term proposals, rather than guaranteeing a long-term future for the British helicopter industry?

Mr. Brittan: I do not think that the hon. Gentleman is right. I would hesitate to arbitrate between him and the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown), but I suspect that when it comes to what the people of Yeovil who work for the firm would prefer, the hon. Member for Yeovil may know more about it.

Mr. Jerry Wiggin (Weston-super-Mare): Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that the thousands of people who work for Westland in and around the west country are much less interested in which is the best solution than in the fact that the company has been saved from receivership? Will he use his influence to ensure that the otherwise friendly relations between Westland and its biggest customer, the Ministry of Defence, are restored and perpetuated?

Mr. Brittan: I agree with everything that my hon. Friend has said and wish to use my influence in that direction.

Mr. Lewis Carter-Jones (Eccles): Is the right hon. and learned Gentleman aware that his hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson) is right? For 18 months Government and Opposition Back Benchers, the all-party group, the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) and the hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Ross) have been pleading that action should be taken on the matter. If, for once, the Ministers had listened to the Back Benchers, they would not have been embarrassed, as they are today. Aviation is far too important to the economy of the country for it to be the subject of bickering and delay by Front-Bench spokesmen.

Mr. Brittan: The attempt to make a party issue of the matter by the Opposition Front Bench is also perhaps a reflection of real concern. The question of proper defence procurement is not easy, and it is unfair to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence for the hon. Gentleman to castigate him in that way, when he has made major efforts and been extremely successful in securing value for money for the armed forces over an enormous range of activities. The House and the country owe him a great debt of gratitude.

Mr. Michael Mates (Hampshire, East): In the light of the new situation, what is the position on the licence arrangements to build the Blackhawk helicopter already entered into with Shorts? Does that arrangement still exist, and if so, what will be the effect on any arrangements made with Westland in the future?

Mr. Brittan: The arrangement envisaged with Shorts was entirely dependent upon the possibility of the Blackhawk being selected by the Ministry of Defence for AST 404. That has not happened, so that arrangement does not stand.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): On 19 November I was taken round Westland at Yeovil, as many of my colleagues have been. Those of us from other parts of the country will recognise the seriousness and size of the problem. May I repeat the question asked by my right hon. and learned Friend the member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith)? What assurance is there that Sikorsky will keep the high technology and research in Britain? May we have a factual answer?

Mr. Brittan: I have already given the assurance that the hon. Gentleman has asked for, and stated clearly what United Technologies has said. That is absolutely clear. All I can say to the hon. Gentleman is that if he is talking about alternatives, he might like to ask what assurances he thinks the French, Germans and Italians, all of whom have been regarded as competitors to Westland, would give in the same direction.

Mr. Richard Page (Hertfordshire, South-West): Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that the American connection with Westland would be a way for the Rolls-Royce turbo meca 322 helicopter engine, currently being developed on the borders of my constituency, to gain access to the large and profitable north American market?

Mr. Brittan: I agree that that is a most attractive prospect.

Dr. M. S. Miller (East Kilbride): Is the right hon. and learned Gentleman not ashamed of himself? How can he conclude that the British technology will remain in this country? Does he not realise that Sikorsky could eat Westland for breakfast? That would not be the case with the other Europeans, because none of them is big enough. Surely the Government should have been pushing ahead with our European partners? An example is Agusta, with the EH101, which has been on the go for some time. Who are the patriots in this country? Do they sit on the Government side, or on the Opposition side of the House?

Mr. Brittan: I think that the hon. Gentleman must have overlooked the answer that I gave to the question on the EH101, in which I made it clear that that was going ahead, and that the president of Agusta had said that it was. The NH90 development is still at an early stage. There is no doubt that it will continue to go ahead with United Technologies.

Mr. Jim Spicer (Dorset, West): Does my right hon. and learned Friend accept that the facts about Westland were known months ago? If, at that time, the Europeans, who are now bidding so furiously to get in on the act, had been in, we might have seen a viable alternative. My constituents and Westland have a bird in the hand, and it is worth two in the bush.

Mr. Brittan: I can well understand how my hon. Friend and his constituents feel about the bird in the hand. It is difficult to speculate about what might have happened in other circumstances some months ago, but the plain fact is that the European consortium did not exist, showed no signs of existing and had no interest in the matter until a few weeks ago.

Mr. Robin Corbett (Birmingham, Erdington): Will the Secretary of State join in the congratulations of most of us on the Opposition Benches to his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence for trying to get the European option?

Mr. Brittan: I very happily join in the congratulations that the hon. Gentleman, with motives that one might suspect, invites me to confirm. As I said earlier, it was I who readily agreed that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence should see whether a European solution was possible. In a short time my right hon. Friend succeeded in bringing together to a remarkable extent an offer which, in the end, the company did not feel was sufficiently firm or attractive. The Government's desire that it should be pursued is evidenced by the fact that it was the Government's decision that my right hon. Friend should pursue it. He achieved a considerable success in a short time, in making it possible for Westland to consider that option.

Mr. Michael Marshall (Arundel): I understand the complexity of the issue and want to consider carefully what my right hon. and learned Friend has said, but does he accept that GEC, as well as British Aerospace, made an offer to bring forward the European proposal? That matter causes some of us concern, as the offer was apparently rejected within 24 hours. Does my right hon. and learned Friend think that the matter should be looked at with care?

Mr. Brittan: With regard to the speed with which the matter was considered, the broad outline of the proposals being put forward by the Europeans was clear long before last Friday, so it is not entirely accurate to regard the proposal as having been rejected within 24 hours. The proposals put forward on behalf of the European consortium last Friday did not include any participation whatsoever by GEC. The interest on the part of GEC has emerged since then. It is fair to say that although GEC is entitled, even at this late hour, to say what it wishes, at no stage during the well known and well publicised difficulties of Westland did GEC lift a finger to help.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Why does the Department of Trade and Industry assume responsibility for the company when it is so reliant on defence procurement? Most of the order book is supplied by the Secretary of State for Defence, in orders that his Department gives to the company. Surely the Ministry of Defence should have been the lead Department in taking decisions, if necessary, on the future of the company. Why did the right hon. and learned Gentleman not recognise that his was the junior role?

Mr. Brittan: The decisions that I have announced were taken collectively. As the hon. Gentleman is interested in responsibility, he will know perfectly well that whereas the Ministry of Defence is a major customer, the Department of Trade and Industry is the sponsoring Department for the aerospace industry. There is nothing new in that.

Mr. Cyril D. Townsend (Bexleyheath): Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that many with an interest in defence will feel that, for whatever reason, we have ended up with the third best solution? Is it not pretty obvious that the European defence and aviation industries must work out their common aims and co-operate to try to achieve them? I fear that my right hon. and learned Friend's statement is steaming slowly in the wrong direction.

Mr. Brittan: I share my hon. Friend's enthusiasm for European co-operation. A British company with European competitors was faced with the prospect of extinction, and it had an imperative duty to prevent that. It is because of the shared concern about the merits of European co-operation that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State examined whether an alternative was available in the time. The company has taken the view that it was not.

[Mr. Brittan]

Mr. Ian Wrigglesworth (Stockton, South): Why was it left to the Secretary of State for Defence to make the suggestion and then pursue it on behalf of the Government if the right hon. and learned Gentleman's Department is the sponsoring Department not only for the aerospace industry but for British industry as a whole? Why did his Department not come in earlier and explore the possibilities of an alternative to the present solution? What did his Department do during the months when the firm was known to be in difficulties?

Mr. Brittan: The short answer to the hon. Gentleman is that there was on the table, at an advanced stage of negotiation, a deal that would rescue the company. My Department was intimately involved in removing some of the obstacles that stood in the way of such a rescue. That is the correct role of the Department of Trade and Industry.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Cannock and Burntwood): While the European approach undoubtedly offers the best political solution to the problem, does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that the plight of Westland has been known for many months and that there have been negotiations since June this year to find a partner? The company can hardly be blamed if it has picked up a real offer from the table. It ill behoves the managing director of the company in the United Kingdom that is richest in cash to say now that the deal is not in the interests of the United Kingdom when, with all the cash at its disposal, it could have come in much earlier. At the moment, the plan is for United Technologies and Fiat to take over a 30 per cent. shareholding. What would be Her Majesty's Government's view if that shareholding were to be increased to a majority shareholding?

Mr. Brittan: That is a hypothetical question, which I cannot be expected to answer. I can well understand my hon. Friend's comments about the other matters, although I would not wish to join in them.

Mr. Ken Eastham (Manchester, Blackley): Great confusion has been caused today by the Secretary of State's statement and by many of the reports that we have been reading about his colleague, the Secretary of State for Defence. May I remind the right hon. and learned Gentleman that several months ago a deputation met the then Minister of State for Defence Procurement to talk about the serious situation in the industry. He said that there were difficulties sorting out the type of aircraft that was required, yet we learned this weekend that the Ministry of Defence was thinking about placing an order for six helicopters. Will the Secretary of State explain why the Ministry can now place an order for six helicopters? If he cannot, will he ask his colleague the Secretary of State for Defence to make a statement? What guarantees can be given to the work force, which has had little say in all the paper transactions? Will the Minister go to the trade unions and give them some assurances?

Mr. Brittan: The hon. Gentleman will know that his last points are matters for the company. He mentioned the proposal that six extra Sea Kings should be purchased by the United Kingdom Government. That order would have been financed out of savings obtained by merging the A129 mark II and PAH2 light attack helicopters. Such a rationalisation may not be achieved, but, if it can be, Westland's link with Sikorsky and Fiat would not prevent it.

Sir Peter Emery (Honiton): Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for at last calling a Member who has many constituents working at Westlands. Does my right hon. and learned Friend realise that what matters most is the future of Westlands and the jobs that will be kept there? One of the factors in favour of the Sikorsky deal is the future production of the Blackhawk helicopter. There are rumours in my constituency that Blackhawk production at Yeovil will be below 50 per cent. of total production. Will my right hon. and learned Friend confirm this rumour?

Mr. Brittan: I cannot confirm that. I can confirm, however, that it is the intention of United Technologies that there should be substantial manufacture of Blackhawk in the United Kingdom. One reason for Westland preferring the Sikorsky deal is that the company compared that firm commitment by United Technologies with an interim provision from the European companies simply for extended subcontracting work in the United Kingdom. There would be more substantial production work with Blackhawk. The possibility of a European helicopter being built in the United Kingdom in the more distant future is very doubtful.

Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark (Birmingham, Selly Oak): If there has been a great national interest at stake for the last few months, Westland is the victim, not the villain of the piece, as it has been seeking calm. Indeed, Westland was told by the Government and by other companies in this country to do what happens to turkeys at Christmas. It would have been better if two distinguished members of the Government, one involved in defence and the other in trade and industry, had got together beforehand to discover what was best for Westland. Would it not have been better to launch Westland on the free market, which I believe is an important aspect of the Government's policy?

Mr. Brittan: The matter is being left to the free market. The solution being put forward by Westland involves the private sector rescue of a private sector company, at no cost to the Exchequer. It is perfectly reasonable for the Government to explore the possibility of another offer being put to Westland and to allow the company to choose which is best. That is what the Government have done, and that is in line with the view of my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Mr. Beaumont-Dark).

Mr. Robert Jackson (Wantage): Is my right hon. and learned Friend worried about the knock-on effects of the decision, and the way in which it has been presented, on any future European defence collaboration?

Mr. Brittan: That is a matter which the Government must consider. The statement made by the president of Agusta about continued collaboration on the EH101 gives one reason to believe that some things said in the heat of the moment by certain of our European competitors might assume different proportions when matters continue in a more leisurely way.

Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory (Wells): Can my right hon. and learned Friend say whether United Technologies has agreed to limit its stake in Westlands to 29·9 per cent., or whether that might be a prelude to a full bid in due course? Does he think that it is important that Britain's only helicopter manufacturer should not come under foreign control, with a consequential loss of business in avionics and associated weapons systems?

Mr. Brittan: I am advised that the proposals of Sikorsky and Fiat — one must not forget that two companies are involved, not one—is for an initial 29·9 per cent. stake, with an option to acquire further shares to bring the holding up to 35 or 40 per cent., but not to exceed that figure. The full details for which the Opposition are thirsting will be made public by the company in a few days.

My hon. Friend will be aware that a vast amount of avionics is currently produced by United Kingdom manufacturers for American concerns, and avionics will not be put at risk in the way that my hon. Friend fears.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): Further to the point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory), will my right hon. and learned Friend confirm that the control of Westland will remain in the United Kingdom and that there have been no discussions to suggest that it should move elsewhere at a later stage?

Mr. Brittan: That is correct.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Is the right hon. and learned Gentleman aware that during all the exchanges that have taken place, it has been perfectly clear that the Secretary of State for Defence has disagreed with practically everything that he has been telling us? The Secretary of State for Defence has been more concerned with national issues than has the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, who has been willing to see British interests given over to the United States.

Mr. Brittan: I do not agree with the hon. Gentleman. I have made it clear that it is Westland's view that the proposals which it is now commending to its shareholders are in the company's best interests.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): Can my right hon. and learned Friend tell the House why the Government rejected approaches from Westland earlier this year? He has not answered the question from my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Mr. Beaumont-Dark). Why must the Government have a public debate between the Secretary of State for Defence and the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry? When a foreign power takes an interest in a vital, strategic industry in this country the opportunities for exports are reduced, and that must be against the national interests.

Mr. Brittan: I do not agree with my hon. Friend on his general proposition. Westland's view that its prospects for exports are enhanced is a reasonable one, but the House will have to wait to see what happens.

The answer to my hon. Friend's first point is perfectly clear. The Government did not favour a solution to Westland's problem which involved the taxpayer paying for the company.

Mr. John Smith: Why has the Secretary of State waited until almost the last question of the term to reveal the important information that US Technologies has an option to increase its holding to 40 per cent.?

Mr. Brittan: United Technologies.

Mr. Smith: If the Secretary of State is going to make a fuss about getting the tiny details right, perhaps he could have helped us by supplying the information at the outset. The Secretary of State tried to tell the House that there was a small minority interest being taken, but hon. Members have now extracted from him, as one would take a bad tooth from a bad mouth, the fact that the holding could increase to 40 per cent. That is a shocking disclosure, because the Secretary of State knows that 40 per cent. equals control of the company.

Mr. Brittan: The right hon. and learned Gentleman could not have made a worse point, as I did not mention any figures at all until I was asked to do so. I made it clear at that stage that there are many other details in relation to the proposal which will be disclosed by the company in a matter of days. That is an entirely reasonable course of action.

Mr. Skinner: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. You will have noticed that throughout the whole series of questions and answers the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry did not even consult the Secretary of State for Defence——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Even if that is true it is nothing to do with me.

Mr. Skinner: I know that, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: What is the point of order for me?

Mr. Skinner: I was just giving a little background, Mr. Speaker. The point of order is quite clear. It is very rare that Ministers come along giving opposite points of view, but in this case it is clear that they do not even speak to each other. As there are clearly two points of view, should not the Secretary of State for Defence have the chance to put the alternative point of view?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Private Notice Questions

5.11 pm

Mr. Paddy Ashdown (Yeovil): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I should be grateful for your advice. I had understood that a private notice question was a private matter and not for public dissemination. Was it in order for the Labour Front Bench spokesman to make it known in the press last Saturday that he intended to put down a private notice question, and for the fact and perhaps some of the text of the question to be revealed in the Press Association tapes this morning?

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): He is still wet behind the ears.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The point of order is for me, not for the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner).

I frequently read in the press at weekends that a question is to be asked about a particular matter in Parliament the following week. I think that that is perfectly in order, but it is not in order to refer to a private notice question which may or may not have been sent in.

Ministerial Statements

5.12 pm

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. May we have your advice on what seems to be a genuine constitutional predicament?

With regard to today's statement, there are two Departments with clear responsibilities. Until now, all statements on the subject in question have been made by the Secretary of State for Defence. Today, however, the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry has told the House that he has taken over responsibility at the Dispatch Box as the head of the sponsoring Department, but that any questions related to defence arising from his statement have to be referred to the Secretary of State for Defence. As the Secretary of State for Defence, who has dismissed the agreement as "metal-bashing", has had to sit beside his colleague in silence and humiliation and listen to an announcement that an agreement by national armaments directors——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Is this a point of order for me?

Mr. Williams: Yes, Mr. Speaker. We have been told that national armaments directors of the United Kingdom, France, Germany and Italy have agreed that certain helicopter requirements should in future be met solely from aircraft designed and built in Europe. The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry said that that agreement "represented a substantial extension to the Government's policy . . . and of our general approach to defence procurement as set out in the 1985 Statement on the Defence Estimates".
As that agreement has apparently been set aside purely at the request of the Westland board, would it not be appropriate now to have a statement from the Secretary of State for Defence on the defence aspects of the matter?

Mr. Speaker: It might have been more appropriate if the right hon. Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams) had been called last from the Front Bench. None of that is a matter for me.

Questions to Ministers

5.14 pm

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The matter that I wish to raise is not a matter of Members' interests, although it may at first seem to be so. It relates to the rights of Members to table questions. As a member of the Public Accounts Committee, I have an interest in defence contracts, and particularly in excess profits by defence contractors. Accordingly, I attempted to table a series of questions this morning. One of them was—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman knows that if he goes to the Table Office and seeks advice it is not in order for him to raise in the Chamber with me the questions that he raised there.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: As I understand it, Mr. Speaker—I have also taken advice on this—you have ultimate responsibility for the decisions of the Table Office.

Mr. Speaker: I do not answer for these matters in the Chamber. If the hon. Gentleman wishes to raise matters of this kind with me, he should do so in the normal way. I was not present at the discussions and I cannot possibly say what went on. As the hon. Gentleman has raised the matter, I can tell him that I now know that he spent some time in the Table Office this morning discussing whether he could put down certain questions, but that is all that I know.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: There are many precedents in the House of Members coming to the Chamber to press the case for questions which they were refused the right to table, by the Table Office. I wish to ask you, Mr. Speaker, to consider the implications of certain questions that I was not allowed to table. My point of order is not long. I wonder whether you might care——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is becoming increasingly expert in procedural matters. He should know that the matter that he raises is firmly pointed to in "Erskine May" as follows:

"When a question has been refused and the Member concerned wishes to make representations to the Speaker on the matter, the practice is for these to be made privately to the Speaker and not raised by way of a point of order in the House."

SCOTTISH AFFAIRS

Ordered,

That the matter of the recommendations of the Scottish Tertiary Education Advisory Council concerning higher education in Scotland, being a matter relating exclusively to Scotland, be referred to the Scottish Grand Committee for its consideration.—[Mr. Peter Lloyd.]

STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS, &c.

Ordered,

That the Representation of the People (Scotland) Amendment Regulations 1985 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.—[Mr. Peter Lloyd.]

Scientific Research

5.15 pm

Mr. T. H. H. Skeet (Bedfordshire, North): I beg to move,

That this House acknowledges that the prosperity of Britain in a competitive world depends upon keeping pace with technology in a variety of fields, that the achievement of this goal requires the injection of greater funds into the scientific infrastructure comprising universities, research councils, laboratories and polytechnics, that a closer interface between universities and industries is fundamental to the evolution of a future industrial strategy, and that international collaboration for major research projects is essential to further the development of expensive basic research; that, while welcoming the initiative of Her Majesty's Government in associating Britain, France and Italy in the ISIS neutron spallation source facilities, Eureka and other ventures, nevertheless would regret any steps taken to lower the United Kingdom subscription to the high energy particle physics facility CERN; acknowledges that only the maintenance of an environment for successful research in the United Kingdom will prevent the migration abroad of the ablest scientists and innovators; considers that a mechanism must be found for harnessing for civil use the fruits of defence research; and concludes that, while the private sector should be encouraged to invest more funds in research and development, there remains a continuing need for further public funds to maintain the thrust of basic, strategic and applied research in a number of fields such as microelectronics, biotechnology, information technology and robotics, because to a very large extent the employment and standard of living of tomorrow depends upon the research undertaken by the community today.

It is becoming customary for the House, even after two major statements, further to curtail the time left to debate a private Member's motion. On this occasion, the time has been cut down to one hour and 45 minutes. I hope that when the subject of this debate is discussed in the future adequate time will be provided by the Government to cover the points that Members would have liked to raise today.

Paragraph 26 of the Select Committee report on the future of the science budget shows the comparative performance of various industrial states in relation to Government funding for research and development. The performance of the United Kingdom is not encouraging. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will be able to provide clarification today. In volume II, paragraph 40, Sir David Phillips stated in evidence that he was "instituting a review of the way in which particular branches of science are funded in this country and in Germany, France, Netherlands, the United States and Japan. This review . . . is being conducted by the Science Policy Research Unit at Sussex University".

Can my hon. Friend the Minister tell us the outcome of that review?

International figures reflect not just inadequate funding but a shortage of scientific staff. I illustrate the point by giving the number of scientists and engineers in research and development in four major countries. In the United States, the figure is 660,700 or 0·62 per cent. of the labour force. In Japan it is 463,062 or 0·76 per cent. of the labour force. In West Germany it is 121,978 or 0·41 per cent. of the labour force. In the United Kingdom, it is even lower, at 86,500 or 0·33 per cent. of the labour force. Science and technology cannot possibly advance adequately if there are insufficient engineers and scientists to see that the advances are made.

The performance figures also reflect a paucity of technological management. This was highlighted by Sir Edwin Nixon, chairman of IBM (UK), in the Financial Times recently. He said:

"The country could improve its trade performance by means of better industrial management, by more appropriate education programmes, by improving work practices and a better application of technology in industry."

According to a recent report, local firms are reluctant to use information technology such as electronic mail. A recent National Economic Development Office report entitled "Strategy for construction and R and D" criticised the construction industry for its inadequate use of technical information and the inadequate funding of research and development. We should bear in mind the answer of Sir David Phillips which appears in the second volume, paragraph 31 of the report. He said:

"I . . . commend to you the over-riding importance of deciding whether or not the future of this country requires a declining investment in science, basic, strategic and applied, and science education, or whether it does not need a different approach."

To summarise the three points I have made, we fall down on an international comparison of investment in the basic sciences. We fall down on the shortage of scientists and engineers compared with some of the leading industrial states. Technological management in the United Kingdom is inadequate and this caused the chairman of IBM UK to make the cryptic remarks which appeared recently in the Financial Times.

International collaboration is essential for large research projects. I have discovered that as the European market is conterminous but not integrated, collaboration is fundamental both to smooth frontiers and to match the achievements of the United States which has formed a highly integrated collection of states within a customs union. It is surprising when the population figures are compared between the EC, the United States and Japan, the EEC represents the greatest industrial block in size but it has the least favourable performance on high technology. The EC, if one takes the 12 states, has a population of 320 million, the United States a population of 237 million and Japan 120 million, yet it would appear that the success of the world market in technology is in reverse order. Withdrawal from commitments without agreement would reduce Britain's triple A rating as a research partner in international projects. International collaboration in high energy particle physics is the only way of remaining in this branch of science thus the migration of physicists can be expected as Britain has signalled its departure from the leading role it has chosen in the centre of excellence at Geneva.

It is significant that, while the ABRC has agreed with Kendrew to a 25 per cent. cut in the CERN subscription from 1989, it has not prompted a similar response from any other member state, they have decided to go ahead in full with their subscription rates. The threatened reduction of interest in CERN, together with the abandonment of UNESCO and the belated support for the deep ocean drilling programme, are not likely to commend the foresight of the United Kingdom negotiators. It is incredible that with the new neutron spallation source in Oxfordshire and the synchrotron radiation source in Cheshire together with the impressive United Kingdom performance in CERN that this time has been chosen to diminish our subscriptions to CERN and specially considering the opportunities arising out of the strategic defence initiative. This technology includes the building and operation of particle accelerators and the production and control of high energy particle beams. Surely, with the

[Mr. T. H. H. Skeet]

SDI appearing on the horizon the Government should be prepared to go ahead with the full subscription rates beyond 1989.

Mr. Robert Jackson (Wantage): Does my hon. Friend agree that if particle physics figures too large in the present allocation for science the answer may be not to reduce the allocation for high energy particle physics but rather to increase the allocation for science in general?

Mr. Skeet: Yes, but when one has a centre of excellence where a great deal of work has been put in by the engineers and scientists of the united Kingdom, and where one has an advantage on the world stage, it is futile to throw it away.

The Department of Education and Science has recently been apprised by the ABRC of the serious brain drain of outstanding talent among chemists and biochemists. It is inconceivable that this occasion should be chosen to disrupt the operations of the best example of European co-operation and thus accelerate this brain drain. The miners' strike cost this country no less than £5 billion. It would require but a tiny fraction of that sum to support this and many other fruitful branches of science.

There are numerous examples of other collaborative efforts and these will include CERN. There are 13 European nations associated with CERN and it is financed in the United Kingdom through SERC. Eleven countries are associated with the European Space Agency, which is funded through the MOD, the DTI and SERC. The ISIS neutron spallation source in Chiltern, Oxfordshire involves the United Kingdom, France and Italy. The European incoherent scatter facility is situated in Norway and involves that country, Sweden, Finland, France, the Federal Republic of Germany and the United Kingdom. The EUREKA programme involves 18 European nations and concentrates on information technology telecommunications, robotics, materials, biotechnology, marine technology and a number of other disciplines. Finally, Esprit is funded by the Commission itself.

When one considers the state of our technology in the United Kingdom one would like to think that of the 10 projects which have been set forth in the EUREKA programme we in the United Kingdom have more than three places in consortia. That is, first, in the creation of European standards for personal educational microcomputers, secondly in high performance cutting and welding lasers and thirdly in medical diagnostic kits for certain social diseases. If the United Kingdom had the ball more at its feet it would have got more out of the EUREKA programme — although I agree that the programme is largely pushed by the French.

European collaboration is significant and important but industrial collaboration with the universities' laboratories and polytechnics — the scientific infrastructure of this country — is necessary to secure the objectives of improved living standards and fuller employment. There is a trend to encourage closer collaboration between the 45 universities of the United Kingdom and industry rather than to persist with the development of research institutions which were, and will continue to be the traditional practice of the Agriculture and Food Research Council and NERC but to a lesser extent the Medical Research Council.

The argument for this policy has been portrayed by Professor Sir John Kingman, former chairman of SERC. He said:

"We believe that research activity on the whole is best carried out in universities where it can influence the teaching activities and more generally the spirit of research can communicate itself to the younger generation."

I fully agree with that. It will involve further rationalisation of research councils. Who will pay for the restructuring which is recognised as being in the interest of universities? I agree with the report that restructuring does not represent the proper use of the science budget. The money required could be used for other branches of science.

The close interface between universities and industry is best demonstrated by the development of science parks in the United Kingdom. There are now 30 and the leading example is perhaps the science park at Cambridge. Initiatives at universities with an eye to later commercial advantage are illustrated by work on the optic computer at the Heriot-Watt university at Edinburgh. The additional revenue thus secured is not sufficient, however, to make up for the loss of grant during the past five years. We also have the Prudential-backed South Bank technopark at the South Bank polytechnic, which is designed to accommodate some 100 technology companies and is due to come into operation in 1987. The Government's innovation grants have helped in that connection.

The House has heard two statements today. One concerned the future of social security and the other concerned the future of a company which might be a key industry in the United Kingdom. These will illustrate the point I am about to make. National investment in research and development is utterly insufficient. Dr. Roberts, the independent member of the ABRC, said at paragraph 32 in the second volume of the report:

"I do not believe we will improve the economic strength of this country by spending more on social security".

Having read that part of the report with some care, I thought that it was a good idea to examine the public expenditure plans for 1985-86. Expenditure on health and personal social services works out at £16·4 billion and expenditure on social security totals £40 billion. Added together, they represent 42 per cent. of total public expenditure — £134 billion — or 47 per cent. of the revised figure. Wealth-creating expenditure amounts to only £21 billion, or 16 per cent.

Research and development for 1986-87 reaches only £4·6 billion. It is a minuscule sum, and half of that will go on defence research and development. We hope to expand the economy and provide employment for future generations. To achieve that we must spend a certain amount on social security but we are certainly not spending enough on the technological industries that will provide the jobs of tomorrow and the money to pay for them.

Civil research and development is accorded a low rating in the United Kingdom because of a paucity of funds. Expenditure on almost everything continues to expand — energy, agriculture, social services and defence — but expenditure on research has been level funded. The only tribute that I can pay to my right hon. Friend the Minister is that he made a little extra money become available in the autumn statement for science. I dare say that he gave ABRC all that it asked for. It is not asking for more, but it is obvious to anybody who studies this subject that the United Kingdom requires much more than appears to be the case. The cost of equipment has advanced ahead of the rate of inflation and commissions from Government Departments have fallen drastically.

The unfortunate repercussions have fallen on the science budget as illustrated by Sir David Phillips saying at paragraph 37 of the report that genetic engineering and protein engineering depend on the purchase of expensive materials such as enzymes and radio-isotopes. It has been reckoned that the expenses of an individual researcher used to amount to about £1,000 whereas now he requires between £7,000 and £8,000. The Government have not compensated for that increase adequately.

I strongly believe that private industry could do more. It is in industry's interests to participate, but its contribution varies from industry to industry. The Green Paper admits that no substantial part of established public funding responsibilities can be substituted by private finance. Some industries such as the pharmaceutical industry have always made a significant contribution. It is agreeable to find that the Wellcome Trust proposes to double its support for medical research in Britain from £22 million to £45 million. Other companies and enterprises may suggest what can be done, but much research is abstract and will not receive any immediate payment, so it is unlikely to be supported entirely by the private sector.

Expenditure on defence research and development is significant. Out of total research and development expenditure of £4·6 billion in 1986-87, civil research represents £2·2 billion and defence research and development £2·3 billion. The money spent on defence research and development has climbed by 22 per cent. between 1972 and 1983, but expenditure on civil research and development rose by only 2 per cent. in real terms over the same period. That is all the more extraordinary since defence activities account for only a small part of British exports — about 3 per cent. Defence research and development rarely stimulates a commercial advance. Industry's financing of research and development rose by only 0·9 per cent. in Britain between 1967 and 1982 whereas it rose by roughly 4 per cent. in the United States, 5·9 per cent. in France and the Federal Republic of Germany and by 9·8 per cent. in Japan.

Professor Sir John Kingman, who is now the Vice Chancellor of Bristol university, said:

"we ought either to shift the balance, or alternatively find a mechanism by which defence investment can have more interconnection with the civil and in particular academic research."

We have made a move in this direction in the Alvey programme, associating the Ministry of Defence, the Department of Trade and Industry and SERC. Surely more could be done in that regard. In paragraph 15 of the report, Sir David Phillips said:

"In the current round of the annual review of Government research and development . . . an attempt is made to break down the Ministry of Defence expenditure."

What is the Ministry of Defence's expenditure? Has the breakdown been done? Perhaps my hon. Friend the Minister will let me know and also say what part of the expenditure goes on "research". It will then be possible to calculate how much can be applied to civilian research. I suspect that well below 10 per cent. is spent on research and that therefore the size of the spin-offs is limited. I bend to my hon. Friend's further knowledge and hope that he will be able to give an answer.

I conclude with a few words about the structural position. I am bearing in mind that other hon. Members wish to take part in the debate, which must end at 7 o'clock. I recommend the merger of the Advisory Council for Applied Research and Development and the ABRC. There can be no justification for having two bodies. I appreciate the skills in ACARD, but all the services could be discharged by the ABRC, into which it could merge.

Better co-ordination between the research councils and the chief scientists of the Ministries is required. Although associated on the ABRC it has been the withdrawal of the departmental commissionings that has caused disruption to research councils and universities in recent years. If there were more co-ordination and if the left hand knew more about what the right hand was doing the research councils would not be in such difficulties. NERC, it seems, may be suffering administrative rather than scientific problems.

We are in an age of mergers and I recommend another — between the University Grants Committee and the National Advisory Body into a new higher education council which deals with polytechnics. There is a need for such a council, which could eradicate the difference between the two sectors. The polytechnics are making a big mark in their contribution to industry. I do not want polytechnics to be at a disadvantage compared with the universities which have that traditional role.

The Department of Education and Science has other responsibilities than education. It has to look after youth and, of course, science. Its performance in science matters has not been satisfactory in the last few years.

We should consider establishing a new structure which is accountable for science. That would give it the prominence that it deserves in a modern industrial state. It would signal a new approach by Government and ensure that firms were structured to withstand competitive forces.

Britain is only at the beginning of change. I do not go as far as to suggest that we should have a Ministry for science. However, I suggest that that should be considered. We are discussing a major subject — the future of science; the future of our exports and employment. All that is based on the technology discovered today and implemented by industry tomorrow. That technology will do much to guarantee jobs and a good standard of living, yet today's debate, crucial as it is, is crammed into such a short period. It must end in one and a quarter hours.

5.42 pm

Mr. Ian Wrigglesworth (Stockton, South): I shall make a brief intervention because this is a short, but important, debate. I congratulate the hon. Member for Bedfordshire, North (Mr. Skeet) on giving the House the opportunity to debate this subject. It is notable, but not surprising, that he chose this subject. The House and the country will be grateful to him.

I welcome the Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Walden) to the Front Bench. We are pleased to see him and look forward to great things from him, particularly in science matters.

Most hon. Members will agree with the hon. Member for Bedfordshire, North about the importance of science. We share his disappointment, and that of one committee after another, about low expenditure on basic and applied scientific research in the United Kingdom. We are particularly weak in civil research and development. Much of the public funding of research and development is on defence. There is wide agreement that something should be done about that, and I congratulate the hon. Member for Bedfordshire, North on his suggestions for tackling the problems.

[Mr. Ian Wrigglesworth]

It is a pity that the funds bandied around in takeover bids in the City and the spare cash on the capital market are not being channelled into companies' research and development programmes.

I have a suggestion that might spotlight the problem. We should make it a statutory requirement for all companies to publish the amount that they spend on research and development and the percentage of sales and turnover that it represents. That would help hon. Members and others who are interested to analyse the amount of research and development that is taking place and to put pressure on companies to spend more on scientific developments.

The Government's expenditure pattern is low compared with that of other countries in terms of percentage of gross domestic product per head of population. It is worrying that it is only one side of the analysis. Percentage of GDP is one thing, but we must also take into account the size of GDP. Our GDP is lower than that of most of our competitors, such as Japan, Germany and America. That means that in volume terms the comparison is even worse. The comparison between the United Kingdom and our major industrial competitors, such as Japan, West Germany, and other European countries is deeply disturbing.

We are particularly worried about what the Government are spending. The autumn statement gave the new science budget allocations of £614 million for 1986-87, £628 million for 1987-88 and £647 million for 1988-89. The figures represent an increase of about £15 million in 1986-87 and a further £15 million in 1987-88 and in 1988-89.

Dr. M. S. Miller (East Kilbride): Far from the amount spent on science research and development reflecting the total gross domestic product, the reverse is true. If we want to keep in the forefront of nations, we should be spending a higher proportion of our GDP on research and development instead of spending only that which seems reasonable compared with expenditure by other countries.

Mr. Wrigglesworth: I agree.

The figures that I mentioned amount to a cash increase of 7·5 per cent. which, on the basis of the Treasury's lower inflation forecasts, is designed to maintain level funding in real terms over the next few years.

The increased funding amounts only to what the Advisory Body for Research Councils calculates as the minimum required. Taking account of past erosion and future costs of the research councils, the ABRC recommends total increases of £15 million, £30 million and £40 million—a total of £85 million. That would allow for a 1 per cent. per annum real growth in the science budget over the next three years. That modest and minimal claim is substantially less than that suggested by the Education, Science and Arts Committee report, "The Future of the Science Budget", which recommends a 3 per cent. increase. Those are modest sums compared with what many hon. Members would like to see.

The only future for Britain is one in which we have highly professional, high technology-based industry and commerce with a highly educated and qualified work force, in which we have high value added, in which we are beating our competitors and in which we are carrying out research across the board on the frontiers of science.

It is palpably obvious that major countries, such as America, Japan, West Germany, France and Italy, are overtaking us substantially in one sphere after another. Unless the Government give a lead with budgets, industry will not be prepared to respond with civil research and development. Therefore, the Government have an enormous responsibility to do something about the current position.

In addition, we all want to see some of the money that the Government spend on defence research and development having a spin-off in the commercial sphere. As the hon. Member for Bedfordshire, North said, we need a much bigger spin-off than we get at present. Will the Government consider establishing a company, possibly under the British Technology Group, to promote civilian exploitation of defence research and development? It may be difficult, for official secrets reasons, to exploit some of the research and development in the defence sphere, but if there were a much better mechanism, under the umbrella of the British Technology Group, it might be possible for much more to be done.

Mr. Jackson rose——

Mr. Wrigglesworth: I have only a few minutes. I prefer to allow the hon. Gentleman to make his points during his own speech.

The Government can do a number of things, and I have mentioned some of them. I agree with the hon. Member for Bedfordshire, North about merging the ABRC and the ACARD and having a council for science policy. There is a great deal to commend that and a wide spectrum of opinion would be in favour of it. We can improve the operation of the Alvey project by increasing its size and possibly making small firms contribute only 10 per cent. towards their projects in order to give them an advantage. The Government should consider the various suggestions that have been made.

At the end of the day it comes back to a matter of political will. What vision do the Government have of the future of our industry and technology? What vision do they have for Britain's future? Do they see Britain having a low-paid, low-skilled economy, or do they see it as a country in which we carry on the professional and academic excellence of the past? Over the past few years there have been precious few signs, from the amount of money that the Government have contributed to scientific research and development, that they are intent on making Britain one of the world leaders in science and technology. I hope that the Minister will reassure not only hon. Members but the scientific community outside and industry generally that the Government will move much more strongly in that direction in future.

5.53 pm

Sir Peter Emery (Honiton): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Bedfordshire, North (Mr. Skeet) on being successful in the ballot—something that in 26 years I have never succeeded in doing—and on picking a topic of major importance which is much greater than one would believe from the 0·2 per cent. of the Back Benchers of the House of Commons who are present. That is particularly unfortunate.

As this is meant to be a debate, I should like to take up a point made by the hon. Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Wrigglesworth). He referred specifically to the need to have industry and commerce record on their annual balance sheets what they spend on research and development, either as a percentage of their turnover or the actual amount. He obviously missed a question that I put down to my hon. Friend the Minister for Information Technology the other day in which I urged that that should be legally enforceable, as it is in a number of American and European states. I am afraid that I got a pretty dusty answer, so perhaps we can unite to try to ensure that that is done. After all, it is a simple matter. It would be helpful to everybody and keep industry more on its toes.

This debate is not just an academic exercise; it is about the creation of wealth—so that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services can come to the Dispatch Box and announce the giving away of the tens of billions of pounds which are necessary in social welfare today. Unless industry can create the necessary wealth, all that falls to the ground. It is imperative that the Government understand that the future of Britain's industrial and manufacturing base can be sustained, and the base itself will grow only, if pure research and industrial research and the development of that research are not just helped but are positively assisted and encouraged by the Government so as to ensure that industry places greater emphasis on it. Research needs a lead and an incentive from the Government and from each Department in individual sectors in their sponsorship in the different areas of industry.

I wish that I could tell the House that Britain has a fine record in that area, but exactly the opposite is the case. In the financial year 1984-85 the United States spent over $110 billion on research and development—$66 billion coming from the private sector and $44 billion from Government. Europe spent only $50 billion—$25 billion coming from Governments and $25 billion from industry. Germany, France and the United Kingdom made up 83 per cent. Britain's paltry contribution was about $15·8 billion —$9·1 billion coming from the private sector. But Japan spent $24 billion—$18 billion from the private sector and $6 billion from Government. When we consider expenditure per capita, the British and European position becomes much worse. America spends $535 per head, Japan $351 per head, Europe $227 per head—and it is much less in the United Kingdom.

The trend is terrifying. Britain is getting worse. If one takes 1975 as the base of 100, Europe progresses between 1975 and 1983 from 100 to 128 and the United States from 100 to 141, and Japan nearly doubles from 100 to 183. How can we possibly expect to stay in the lead and to be able to create the industrial strength that we want for industry if the contributions of Government and industry are falling so far behind? I am not a pure monetarist. That is why I am not sitting on the Treasury Bench. But this is an area outside monetarism where Governments should be giving a lead and where there is an absolute demand.

Surely we should be able to compete with what the French are doing. However, the New Scientist on 18 October said:

"As the French government begins to prepare for a general election . . . it remains committed to a significant increase in funding for research and development . . . announced that spending by governmentt departmens on R and D will reach a total of 42·5 billion francs. With an anticipated inflation rate of 4 per cent., this translates into a planned real growth of 4·2 per cent. — and compares with the zero growth that is being imposed on public spending . . . the government is proposing that tax credits on the new research and development efforts of industrial companies be raised from 25 to 50 per cent."

Why can we not emulate that? In real terms, research and development in Britain is on a downward trend. The Government must get their priorities right. It is little use the Exchequer providing hundreds of millions of pounds to train and retrain the unemployed if industry is contracting and therefore unable to provide the jobs. Surely the need for industrial expansion is accepted by everyone, including the Government.

The Government should have industrial expansion as one of their major objectives in dealing with unemployment. That is where the new jobs can be provided. They will be provided not by attempting to regenerate old and dying industries, but by the new industries, the new technologies, the new developments and the new sciences—those areas in which, I am sorry to say, we are too often overtaken by Japan, Taiwan, Korea, Hong Kong and America. It will only be through new technology and discovery, with proper development, that jobs will be created.

The Government must not turn away from supporting basic research which, on the whole, they support quite well. We must ensure that we put our knowledge to use in industry more quickly than other countries that make use of our technology and expertise through our brain drain. We must increase our efforts in engineering research. The link between fundamental scientific research and its application in engineering and marketing is essential. Our industrial development has so often been behind our inventions.

There is a real need for the Department of Education and Science to co-operate with the Department of Trade and Industry to ensure that our tax structure provides incentives for industrial development. I do not necessarily mean providing money from the taxpayer, but allowing industry to use its money for such development through a tax policy designed to encourage such use.

In September, I was elected chairman of the science and technology committee of the North Atlantic Assembly—a group of 16 nations working in concert on science and technology. During its last meeting, resolutions were passed to attempt to deal with the problems of technological transfer and the duplication of expenditure on science and technology within the Alliance. The total amount spent within the Alliance is about $200 billion per annum. A conservative estimate is that between 18 and 30 per cent. of that expenditure is duplicated. Why can we not get together to try to cut the amount of duplication? I accept that duplication cannot be eradicated altogether because there will be competition and areas where it is impossible to co-operate. However, if we could cut duplication by just 25 per cent., the minimum we would obtain for additional expenditure on research and development would be $16 billion. Let us think what that would mean in real terms. Let us think what that would mean in advancement in research and development within industry.

Has the Minister considered the resolutions passed by the Alliance? They were:

[Sir Peter Emery]

"to consider the added expense, in terms of effort and resources, of the disagreement on technology transfer policies, and to assess the savings and benefits of reaching a compromise on these policies".

Have we done that? If not, why not? They continued:

"to consult with the United States in a reappraisal of the Military Critical Technologies List in order to decrease restrictions on technologies which are already available outside the United States"— but which, of course, are actually still restricted by the United States, which is absolute nonsense—

"to consider the creation, in each Alliance nation, of a Technology Transfer Bureau to assume overall responsibility for dealing with high-technology exports, and to report their views to the Assembly."

The Alliance wants to achieve greater co-operation between its member nations.

Those are ordinary, sensible and businesslike recommendations. Perhaps they are too ordinary and too businesslike, but they should be taken up by the Government. I hope that the Minister will assure me that that will happen.

Today saw the launching of Industry Year 1986. Five Ministers of the Crown, together with a number of Members of Parliament — some of whom are in the Chamber — spoke about the need for the creation of growth. That was an excellent and necessary thing to do. However, in pushing forward the need for Industry Year, no policy is more important than trying to move our young people towards the realisation that within industry science, technology and research are just as important as they are in universities and that they exist for the creation of wealth for the whole nation. That is the note on which I began my speech, and that is the only way that the need for research and development can be sold to the nation.

6.7 pm

Dr. M. S. Miller (East Kilbride): I congratulate the hon. Member for Bedfordshire, North (Mr. Skeet) on his choice of subject for the debate. It is a matter of extreme importance to the nation. I agree not only with the hon. Gentleman but with the hon. Members for Honiton (Sir P. Emery) and for Stockton, South (Mr. Wrigglesworth). This is a matter on which we are all united.

I have only one small quarrel with the terms of the motion which is where it states:

"a mechanism must be found for harnessing for civil use the fruits of defence research."

I would go further than that and suggest that we should spend more on civil research and allow some of that to spin off to defence. The proportion of our expenditure on research and development that is devoted to defence is far too high. Although the Secretary of State for Education and Science says that Britain compares reasonably favourably with other countries in research and development, he forgets to mention that a high proportion of that expenditure is devoted to defence.

I especially agree with the part of the motion that states:

"the employment and standard of living of tomorrow depends upon the research undertaken by the community today."

I was in Italy earlier this year — in, of all places, Palermo — and all the lamp standards carried a notice stating:

"In affare, non vincerete le battiglie di domani con la technologia di ieri."

That means

"In business matters we do not win the battles of tomorrow with the technology of yesterday."

That is exactly what the hon. Member for Bedfordshire, North said.

Many hon. Members have visited the Secretary of State for Education and Science and have received the same comment, that we are now a poor nation and cannot therefore be expected to spend so much on research and development, but it is the other way round—the poorer we become, the more we must spend to return to our past position. We should not be cheese-paring, because by spending money on scientific research we are planting the seedcorn for the future. That is important, and the Secretary of State's attitude is short-sighted.

It is not a question of undertaking research only where scientific development can be applied. The hon. Gentleman was right in saying that we should consider not only applied science but basic science. We were strong on basic science, which involves research and development which at the time does not seem to have an application. It is also excellent to undertake research and development for application, but it is necessary to do scientific research, even if one does not see the fruits of it immediately. For that reason, we must be involved in particle physics. The Germans are good at it, and we should play a bigger part in CERN. We have fallen behind the United States of America, the USSR, the Federal Republic of Germany, Japan and France, and we may even be behind South Korea, Singapore and Taiwan. I hope not.

Last week the London Standard published a large paragraph on "Medical research sacrificed". The vice chancellor of London university, Lord Flowers, talking about cuts in General Medical Council expenditure, said:

"if spending cuts continue Britain will no longer be able to maintain acceptable standards of teaching for its doctors . . . Research is being sacrificed in order to protect patient care and teaching."

By that he means that patient care and teaching cost so much that the Government do not believe that they can afford to spend any more on research and development. In other words, the necessity to treat patients is being made the enemy of more research. We should not accept that.

That is having a disastrous effect on our young academics and our universities. I have an interest, as I have a son who is a science university lecturer. He cannot obtain a permanent post, and he will undoubtedly go abroad. He could be useful to the United States, European countries and other parts of the world. That step will be emulated by many young men and women whom we cannot afford to lose. I plead with the Government to take today's debate seriously. It has not been attended by a large number of hon. Members, but there are present those who over the years have shown an interest in the matter. Again I commend the hon. Member for Bedfordshire, North for introducing the subject and asking the Government to take our comments seriously.

6.14 pm

Mr. Ian Lloyd (Havant): All hon. Members are grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Bedfordshire, North (Mr. Skeet) for introducing the debate, which is of the greatest significance. As the hon. Member for East Kilbride (Dr. Miller) said, these debates bring to the Chamber the same small, dedicated, interested and enthusiastic group of hon. Members, among whom there is a great deal of agreement.

For some time my hon. Friend and I have been propagating the idea that we need an office of technology assessment. I shall not deal with that now, but when I see that the matter again falls to us to consider, I wonder whether we need an office of indifference assessment. That would be more to the point. Scientists have a right to complain. They may complain that we do not understand, but they can remedy that, as we can. However, they have a legitimate complaint if they feel that we do not care, which is something that they cannot and should not attempt to forgive. We are a small group, and we must do our best.

My hon. Friend and I disagree about having a Minister for Science, but when the subject is discussed at national level or in the House, we experience the lack of a Minister to fight this corner with energy and determination, which it needs. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will fulfill that role and that he will rise rapidly to the Cabinet, where alone this fight can be carried out. That is where it must be fought and won.

I want to discuss the interesting contrast between two or three reports on the subject which have been published recently. The report of the Advisory Board for the Research Councils on science and public expenditure 1985 is of great significance. It is a staggering document, as most hon. Members present will appreciate. There is no time to go into it in detail, but I wish to draw attention to some phrases in it. The report states that the council is that the

"unable to fund ⅓ of the Alpha quality research proposals from higher education",

"council cannot afford the instrumentation necessary for this kind of research", and that it

"cannot meet the agreed share of the cost of collaborative research with industry in information technology."

Lord Stockton suddenly latched on to the importance of information technology in his fascinating speech in the other place recently, and we welcomed that.

Molecular biology is a subject of immense significance today. The report states that it "can only be given ½ the funds it needs to buy top priority state of the art equipment."

That shows the tremendous increase in the real cost of science.

Natural Environment Research Council projects are

"underfunded to the point of ineffectiveness."

The research councils have lost 2,000 staff since 1981-82. The Science and Engineering Research Council has lost 70 posts, and redeployed 250. "Big" science has fallen from taking up 70 per cent. to 40 per cent. of the budget, but there is no time to enter into that controversy. The Medical Research Council has lost 228 posts. The NERC has lost 450 posts to date. It will lose 300 in 1985-86, and 600 between 1986 and 1990, and so it goes on.

We hear such phrases as

"The well-found laboratory no longer exists",

and

"It is difficult for the most outstanding research scientists to secure research appointments."

Another phrase, used by the hon. Member for East Kilbride, refers to

"The exodus of outstanding young scientists from the United Kingdom."

This is dangerous and is something which no Government, of whatever party, dare neglect. We neglect it at our peril. Another phrase is:

"Parliament, the Government and the country are complacent."

That criticism is not without considerable substance. If it is true, we have cause to look to our laurels, in this place, in the Government and in the country.

The conclusions of the report are of the utmost importance. It says:

"Year by year reduction may appear to be modest, but the cumulative effect may be that by 1990 the UK's science base could be 10 per cent. smaller than in 1980."

It refers to a steady attrition that has

"squeezed out investment in many new and growing areas of science, crucial to developing the industries of tomorrow."

I think that this is now virtually common ground between every hon. Member here. I await with great interest to hear what the Government say.

In reply to the general case, we often hear that we are a poor country and that we do not have the funds, as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has said. Where do funds come from? The House gives us an unrivalled perspective from which to comment on that interesting question. We have just heard that some £5,000 million was wasted on the miners' strike. Perhaps that was unavoidable or a distribution or wasting of resources that could not have been diverted into expenditure on science. Be that as it may, we should look at some of the other points, such as the great industrial subsidy market where, as we know, we seldom look at figures with fewer than eight noughts on the end. We pass them with an aplomb that would do credit to someone who has just won the pools. We see projects such as Nimrod, with nine noughts on the end, or the De Lorean sportscar, with eight noughts on the end. We see vast sums lost in the naval dockyards year after year.

Perhaps most interesting and significant of the lot, because it is in the context of the comment made by my hon. Friend the Member for Bedfordshire, North on the balance between expenditure on the welfare state and expenditure on science and the seedcorn is the extraordinarily interesting document just issued by the Comptroller and Auditor General which disclosed that, as a result of the strike in Newcastle, some £170 million has just disappeared. No one knows where it has gone. The Comptroller and Auditor General does not know, although he can guess. However, he knows the scale of the sum.

We know that the Science and Engineering Council is asking for about £40 million to £50 million just to stabilise the situation. That is a large sum in scientific terms, but by comparison with some of the sums with the eight or nine noughts at the end, which we often pass on the Estimates on the nod, or sometimes discuss, it is, to use an old word, peanuts.

Mr. Jackson: In the catalogue of alternatives, will my hon. Friend consider the following proposition from the latest Government annual general review:

"the UK Government comes bottom or next to bottom of the R and D league of the six major European Community nations in all areas except Defence, where it is top."?

Mr. Lloyd: That is an interesting and important point. We realise that there is an imbalance between research and development on defence and that in the civil sector, and the Government have been making valiant and interesting efforts to move the results of research, wherever possible and wherever security is not involved, out of defence and into the civil sector, more of which must be done.

However, that does not address or solve the problem of the basic allocation of resources as a percentage of research and development. I share the view that has been expressed twice already, that this is where our real wealth will once again be created—if we restore the standards, quality and effectiveness of our basic science. An interesting point has been made, not only by Sir John Kingman but during the debate in the other place on the history of the ESPRIT programme and new technology. It was made by my noble Friend Lord Stockton, who said that the distinction between basic science and applied science was difficult to draw. Drawing artificial distinctions and saying that we will do this here and not that there can lead to great difficulties and destroy the standards that we are trying to achieve.

[Mr. Lloyd]

I draw attention to a point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Bedfordshire, North about Japan. We are constantly being asked to look at the Japanese example to see what we can learn from Japan. I looked at a recent United Nations report on this, and the trends are staggering. I can give figures only in billion yens, because those figures are given in the report, but in the years 1965, 1970, 1975 and 1979, the Japanese GNP, which is after all what we are trying to emulate, is where the wealth is coming from. One reads, as I did this morning, that Japan has one of the largest net overseas investments of any country, not excluding the United States.

If that is the case, how is it done? Expenditure on research and development for the same years, starting in 1965 and coming up to 1979, was 486 billion yen, 1,300 billion yen, 2,900 billion yen, 4,608 billion yen and finally, planned for the present, 2·5 to 3 per cent. of GNP. That is the background, that is the challenge that we are facing, and we have no real alternative but to look seriously again at the scale and direction of national resources that we are deploying. It is only by that redeployment that we shall achieve the swing round that is the common objective of all parties and of all hon. Members. Only by achieving that shall we create a base on which the wealth of Britain towards the end of this century and the beginning of the 21st century will be acceptable, defensible and worth achieving.

6.27 pm

Mr. Lewis Carter-Jones (Eccles): I shall add to what the hon. Member for Bedfordshire, North (Mr. Skeet) said, but say something about the use of technology for disabled people. Some 21 years ago, I had my first Adjournment debate on this subject, and the man whom I mentioned on that occasion was the oldest surviving respiratory polio victim in the world. He is still living but he is completely paralysed, unable to breathe, speaks by throat breathing but from his bed exports hospital beds, by the application of technology.

I should have been happier if the hon. Member for Bedfordshire, North had said something about the quality of life and independence for the disabled by the careful application of technology. We talk about NASA and the space age, but last July I saw a wheelchair made of carbon fibre which an old lady could pick up, easily put on a bus or in the boot of a car and help her aged husband to go all around the place. She gave him mobility and access, both of which were the product of advanced work in space.

We have an example in the House of a fallout from technology, used by my right hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Ashley), who has applied the techniques of Palantype typing, which may be in use in the Chamber today, to turn the symbols into words that are readable on a visual display unit. This means that my right hon. Friend can follow the proceedings in this House. This technology was evolved at Southampton university. It involves a substantial amount of word and language use and micro-circuitry of the highest order. That kind of technology will eventually be of value to everybody in our society.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Bedfordshire, North for moving this motion. I believe, however, that a committee ought to be formed to investigate the application of technology to the disabled. By raising the quality of life of the disabled and the frail elderly, it is possible that we should save money. I have linked this subject on many occasions with various motions. This is technically possible, economically sound and morally right.

6.30 pm

Dr. Jeremy Bray (Motherwell, South): Once again a debate on science policy has run out of time before all hon. Members have had an opportunity to speak. I am particularly sorry that my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell), who has followed science policy for many years and who failed to catch your eye last time, Mr. Deputy Speaker, has been unble to speak in this debate. It is a clear indication that we shall need to hold another debate on science policy in six months or so.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Bedfordshire, North (Mr. Skeet), as have other hon. Members, upon his selection of this topic. He has followed with enterprise and effectiveness his role as chairman of the Parliamentary and Scientific Committee, an admirable body which he is revivifying. It has an important part to play in securing for science and technology the attention of the House and the country, which science so badly needs.

I welcome to the Treasury Bench the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Walden). I am sure that there is plenty in this subject to provide ample scope for his considerable talents, particularly his diplomatic talents — much needed in a topic of burning concern to science at the present time.

In the six months since our last debate there has been little progress on science policy. The Science and Engineering Research Council's corporate plan is to be published tomorrow. It will highlight the areas of strategic research in science and engineering that are essential to the future industrial development of this country. These opportunities are being seized by other countries—the United States and Japan and also Germany and France. However, this country is still neglecting them.

The grant for the first year that was sought by the Advisory Board for the Research Councils—a minimal increase of £15 million in the science vote—was agreed by the Government. For that small mercy we give thanks. One leg of the dual support system has been jacked up by one peg, but the other leg has been jacked down several pegs by continuing cuts in the funding of higher education. There has been a 2 per cent. a year reduction in the funding of universities. That is incomprehensible in the face of the need and the opportunity to build up skilled manpower and research. No doubt in the future, as in the past, the cuts will fall disproportionately upon research activity.

On the relative decline of support for British science —therefore, of British science itself—there have been two new important sources of information since June. The ABRC approached 40 leading research groups—those most likely to attract such funds as are available. Nineteen of those groups had been selected by the University Grants Committee as potential recipients for the additional equipment funds. Yet in this privileged group the survey found grave concern about increasing losses overseas not only of their most talented students and post-doctoral research workers but of their outstanding senior scientists. The litany of complaints that they listed is familiar to all those who visit research laboratories and universities: that there are more posts overseas and better pay, prospects and facilities, and that there is aggressive recruiting by United States' universities and industry and greater receptiveness by American industry of new ideas. That is contrasted with the frustration of not getting research grants and the resistance to new ideas that is found in Government and industry in this country. The provision of research equipment, central facilities, like the nuclear structure facility, and well-funded, well-staffed research groups, like molecular biology at Cambridge, demonstrate that proper support for science works in this country, and that we should do more.

In June the Secretary of State doubted the 30 per cent. increase, in real terms, in Federal Government support for basic research in science and engineering in universities and colleges in the United States. He agreed that figure with me in correspondence, but he pointed out that it had followed a long period of decline. What has happened in Britain? There has been evidence of a brain drain, and that evidence helped with the first £15 million. At Easter there will be the results of a more thorough survey by the Royal Society into the brain drain. Its report will be available in ample time for the Secretary of State for Education and Science to raise his sights at the next public expenditure round.

There is no need to wait to see evidence of the decline. There has been a further instalment of Irvine and Martins' analysis of publications and citations, bringing the story up to 1982. Of particular interest is the record in particular sciences. I refer to one technology in which I am particularly interested. Heading the areas of decline in applied science is metallurgy, with a 34 per cent. decrease in the share of publications from the United Kingdom between 1977 and 1982. With cause and effect flowing in both directions, this is mirrored in the British Steel Corporation's cut in research and development, in real terms, of 45 per cent. since the Government took office in 1979, with the surrender of all basic research and of recruitment of new blood into the BSC laboratories. That has inevitably resulted in the loss of competitiveness of the higher grade steels that are produced by that industry.

In the light of that kind of evidence, which is accumulating, we should reappraise the targets for the science budget. Level funding makes no provision for sophistication. Sophistication is difficult to measure, but the 2 per cent. per annum put forward by the ABRC is at least a step. However, a constant share of a rising gross domestic product, growing in the long term at 3 per cent. per annum, is the least that the present Government might hope to be able to maintain. The need to catch up in science and technology however, is a factor that we must introduce into the argument. From its peak in 1972, research council expenditure, in real terms, in this country has fallen by 10 per cent., while the GDP has risen by 25 per cent. Therefore, both to match the United States' increase since 1981 and to achieve past shares of GDP in the United Kingdom, a 30 to 40 per cent. increase in research council expenditure on basic and strategic research and development seems to me to be the kind of target for which the scientific community should start to lobby.

That recovery should be followed by more modest growth, but with a big step up in the minimum number of years in which it can be achieved. The United States achieved the 30 per cent. increase in four years. We should begin to plan the phasing of the increase that can be efficiently absorbed by this country without recreating all the demographic bulges that followed the expansion of the universities in the 1960s and 1970s but that can be managed within the more modest and limited increase to which we are referring for the research councils.

The research councils and the ABRC have to lobby within the impact that can be achieved on this Government. But they also have to contribute to shaping public opinion and expectations. We are not talking about pay increases for scientists and technologists. We are talking about the science and the technology that are needed to put Britain into a competitive position among the industrial nations. There is an acute pay problem in the universities and in education generally, but that is a separate issue with which we are not dealing in this debate.

There is also mis-spending and misallocation of money and, more important, of scarce scientific manpower, of which the most horrific example is the strategic defence initiative. Star wars simply will not work technologically. The computing side, which holds it all together, is best documented, and it shows that, however fast the optical computers may be, the software problems remain and they are insoluble.

Professor David Parnas of the University of Victoria, who resigned from the SDI advisory committees, is a recognised world expert who continues to be active in naval research in the United States. He has described the difficulties clearly involved in writing and debugging a vast software system that can never be tested in operation. It is as if one were suddenly to switch on for the first time all the computers of all the airlines in the world without having given them a trial run, and expect them to work. SDI poses a comparable problem.

There has been widespread protest among computer scientists, yet the Government have ignored and overridden them. Artificial intelligence, automatic programming and other software developments pleaded in aid in the SDI will not ease the problem. To divert this vast effort into a field that cannot work is a poor way of developing techniques that are useful in systems that can work.

A much more difficult field is CERN, where the particle physicists and machines at Geneva and elsewhere work so brilliantly. It would be quite wrong to interpret the intention of the Kendrew report as cutting off Britian's interest in particle physics. However, there is a general feeling among scientists that, even with budget increases, particle physics would be getting too large a share.

There are also clear long-term problems in relation to decision making in particle physics research, on the machines, the accelerators and individual experiments. As a result, particle physicists may expect to see through only two experiments in a working lifetime.

The Kendrew report set out a negotiating position, and it is up to Ministers, particularly the hon. Member for

[Dr. Jeremy Bray]

Buckingham, to carry out the negotiations. In doing so, I hope that he will keep in close touch with working physicists.

I urge two particular directions that should be explored. The first is wider international collaboration. In the post-Geneva atmosphere, there ought to be some scope for the redrawing of national programmes and time scales between Europe, the United States and the Soviet Union. The super-powers will retain their own activities as insurance against any unexpected discoveries of fundamental military or economic importance. But they will also collaborate, and they have an interest in involving Europe in that collaboration.

The other direction in which I encourage the Minister to seek the advice of scientists is the unbundling of the vast range of experimental technique that goes into the particle accelerators and the experiments that use them. Ministers should encourage the particle physicists to seek allies in other sciences. The techniques in instrumentation, computing, pattern recognition, materials, and so on, are potentially applicable not only in industry — although that is important — but in other sciences. It will cost more than a dedicated technique, but a shared technique will cost less to any one science.

I am talking not about spin-off, but about synergy from considering with other scientists the fundamental problems of experiments and the best way of tackling them. This is a long-term development and aid, but particle physics needs to take account of horizons beyond 1990. If the Minister can hold out a perspective beyond then in the further years up to the end of the century, he may find it somewhat easier to negotiate the transition with other countries and with CERN.

The rationalisation of United Kingdom space interests is welcome, but it could become a sink for low-grade imitative technology if scientific research is not given a sufficient role within it. The continuing attrition of agricultural research is utterly deplorable in the face of the problems that we see worldwide, and the much greater problems that will arise at the end of this century and into the next when the population of the world doubles. That is the time scale in which we shall need the results of the plant genetic engineering that is now becoming possible.

The machinery of government remains as undeveloped now as it was in June, but we look forward to hearing from the Minister what use he is making of it.

6.45 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science (Mr. George Walden): My hon. Friend the Member for Bedfordshire, North (Mr. Skeet) has done us all a service by proposing the motion. The need to maintain the debate on a high level is obviously self-evident, and my hon. Friend did us another service by the serious and thoughtful quality of his contribution. I am personally grateful to my hon. Friend for giving me, as a relative newcomer to this subject, the chance to listen to the seasoned — sometimes highly seasoned — advice of experienced Members on all sides of the House. The debate also takes place against the background of the recent Select Committee report, about which I shall say more later.

The motion suggests, quite rightly, that without a sound research and development capability our economy, and all that depends on it, will suffer considerably. Some hon. Members — if I caught their drift — seemed to imply that the Government were blind to all this. Through the UGC and the research councils, the Department provides more than £1 billion every year for research, but no one is complacent about the needs of science — certainly not the Government.

It was because of this recognition of the importance of the science base to future economic prosperity and their concern about evidence of a new brain drain of British scientists that the Government injected an additional £15 million into next year's science budget, representing a 2·5 per cent. cash increase. The addition is not for one year only. It will be carried forward in the baseline. Similarly, we have increased from £7 million to £10 million the amount available to the UGC next year and in 1987-88 for its selective equipment scheme, which aims to equip the best university research groups in the country to state of the art standards. The £10 million scheme will be carried forward into 1988-89.

The general equipment grant for the universities for the 1986-87 academic year will be £95 million, representing a cash increase of 5·2 per cent. over the current academic year. Additionally, the Computer Board for the Universities is to receive an increase of £1 million in 1986-87 and £2 million in each of the following years to enhance the joint academic computing network. We have today announced our decisions on the allocation of the additional £15 million for the science budget, taking account of recommendations put forward by the Advisory Board for the Research Councils. Copies of the board's advice have been placed in the Library.

In its advice the board says that it recognises that the additional sums will make a valuable contribution to sustaining the science base. The House will note that the addition of £15 million to the science budget in 1986-87 corresponds exactly to the bid for that year which the board puts forward in its advice "Science and Public Expenditure", which was published in June. The board recommends further additions in subsequent years. Clearly it will be important to consider these carefully in next year's public expenditure survey in the light of further information which the board has promised about costs of research, international comparisons and the health of Britain's science base — and, I may add, in the light of some of the concerns voiced in today's debate.

Mr. Skeet: We heard all about this in the autumn statement, and I am grateful for that. We have heard today that we are well behind almost every other nation in civil research and development. The Government must put a strong foot forward and do something about this. Are they prepared to do so?

Mr. Walden: I was about to discuss the larger issues in the short time that is available, but I am grateful to my hon. Friend for reminding me of them.

The Government have no illusions. We recognise that the scientists regard themselves as seriously constrained within existing financial provision. The problem, in a sense, is simple. Of its nature, science grows — new fields open up and new perspectives beckon. The costs of undertaking scientific research grow, notably because advances in technology — themselves usually based on advances in fundamental knowledge — lead to increasingly sophisticated and expensive scientific equipment and materials. The growth of science has been described as "exponential" in the strict sense of the term. The growth of resources, I do not have to remind hon. Members, is not, but the Government recognise the pressures on the budgets of the research councils and the universities.

At the same time, let us not over-dramatise these pressures. The Government's provision for the 1986-87 scientific budget represents an increase in simple cash terms of more than 60 per cent. — £275 million — compared with the science budget in 1979-80. Measured against average inflation in the economy at large, this cash increase translates into a real terms increase of 8·5 per cent. — a far from ignoble record considering the competing demands in this period on the public purse.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Will extra funds be provided in coming years for the new blood scheme?

Mr. Walden: I shall cover that point in my further remarks.

No Government could afford to go on year after year underwriting a continuing real increase in the resources devoted to science. Indeed, the growth in the science budget began to level off in mid 1970s.

Mr. Jackson rose——

Mr. Walden: I am sorry, but I have very little time in which to discuss many points.

If I have any criticism of the motion of my hon. Friend the Member for Bedfordshire, North it is that it seems to suggest that we should maintain support for all existing commitments—domestic and international—and support all new areas, or perhaps I have interpreted him exponentially. I wonder whether that is really possible. All developed countries—not just the United Kingdom—are having to face the problem of the inexorably growing costs of maintaining their science and technology base. In the United Kingdom we have evidence from the ABRC and from the Education, Science and Arts Committee of this House which suggests that overall our research councils' costs are growing at 3 per cent. per annum above the rate of inflation. If we were to cover those costs and the costs of meeting all new scientific opportunities, it would imply that science took a progressively larger share of our national wealth. That could scarcely be affordable in the long term. The only serious alternative must be selectivity —identifying fields and groups of researchers that hold out particular promise and concentrating resources on them.

We know from experience that, in the past, there have been serious weaknesses in terms of organisation, management and attitudes, which are only beginning to be properly tackled under this Government. I shall give the House an example of managerial weakness. It may surprise the House to know that we still have no up-to-date information about the scale and the distribution among the various areas of research activity funded through the UGC in the universities. We have no clear picture of how much is going on already and where. The overall estimate of some £600 million, which appears in the Cabinet Office's annual review of research and development, is based on a 15-year-old survey. The Department has funded a research project to provide up-to-date figures, the findings of which should be available early next year.

It seems equally remarkable that the UGC's allocation of resources to universities for research has traditionally taken no account of the strengths and weaknesses of different institutions or of the need for greater concentration of resources as science has become more capital intensive.

In all those areas, new attitudes are now emerging. The University Grants Committee is now moving towards a more selective deployment of general research funds. The research councils are producing five-year corporate plans involving the reshaping of programmes to reflect current as opposed to historical—priorities. I am glad to note that the Science and Engineering Research Council's first corporate plan is to be published tomorrow. Much more emphasis is being put on directed or centrally co-ordinated programmes in areas identified as being of particular strategic importance. The Economic and Social Reasearch Council has recently taken action to try to improve the appalling PhD completion rates of some of the students supported on ESRC grants. Generally, the research councils are becoming more priority-conscious and rigorous in their management.

I do not pretend that the changes that some of the new attitudes involve can be effected painlessly without some sacrifices in interesting areas of research or hardship for individuals, whether scientists or laboratory cleaners, but indiscriminate scattering of resources would be worse in the long run—worse for science, worse for employment and worse for the country as a whole.

I should like to respond to the remarks made on both sides of the House about CERN. I note the constructive attitude of the hon. Member for Motherwell, South (Dr. Bray).

The Kendrew report of United Kingdom participation in high energy particle physics, which has been mentioned by several hon. Members, is a prime example of the inescapability of priorities. The review, which was jointly funded by the ABRC and the SERC, was established in early 1984 and published its report in June this year. The report made a number of recommendations, the main one being that United Kingdom expenditure on particle physics should be reduced by 25 per cent. by 1991 and that the funds thereby released should be reallocated to other areas of basic science.

That recommendation was not made because the review group considered that United Kingdom particle physics was in any way deficient; on the contrary, as hon. Members have said, it reported that the United Kingdom was making a significant contribution to what is an exciting field of research. The recommendation was not made because CERN had disappointed our expectations — in fact it is a brilliant example of what can be achieved by European collaboration in science.

What led the group to its conclusion was its judgment of the correct priority to be given to particle physics relative to other areas of science. I point out to my hon. friend the Member for Wantage (Mr. Jackson) that in the group's view 10 per cent. of the science budget was too great a proportion for any one area, no matter how excellent.

I am sure that hon. Members agree that it would not be right to make a hasty judgment. For this reason, one of the first visits that I made after assuming my present appointment was to CERN, to see the laboratory for myself. I add that no one who has had the opportunity to visit CERN could fail to be impressed with the extraordinary work being done there or the capabilities and the enthusiasm of the scientists doing it.

[Mr. Walden]

The very success of CERN, however, poses a dilemma. It shows that in this area of fundamental science Europe can lead the world, but it also shows that given the resources we could do the same in other areas. CERN is a challenge, as well as a success. It challenges us to repeat the performance in other areas. CERN is a model of what can be achieved, but only if we are willing to adapt ourselves to the needs and pressures of the time.

Perhaps some figures will illustrate the dilemma. In 1984-85, not only was the CERN subscription 6·5 per cent of the total science budget, and over 12 per cent. of the SERC expenditure, but it represented more than 60 per cent. of the international subscriptions paid by the SERC. However, other, less expensive, areas of international collaboration, involving the sharing of expensive facilities, serve a larger scientific community and a wider range of scientific research. That is the view of Sir John Kendrew and his team. It is no use cultivating the illusion that Sir John Kendrew is a Treasury Minister; he is a Nobel laureate and the Government value his report and his advice.

The Government consider that the possibility of achieving significant savings from particle physics, and hence from CERN, needs to be examined seriously. Surely any organisation of the size and complexity of CERN, which has been in existence for over a quarter of a century, could benefit from a major review. I am therefore undertaking a round of bilateral consultations with Ministers of science in CERN member states, to explore with them their reactions to our idea of a joint independent review of the organisation. I stress that the Government remain firmly attached—this matter has arisen during the debate—to European collaboration in science, as has been shown by our recent actions.

Mr. Skeet: Will my hon. Friend confirm that he will move only by consent, and not unilaterally, on CERN?

Mr. Walden: Our aim is to engage in consultations to achieve a joint independent review. I believe that that is a reasonable objective.

I should like to have said more about defence versus civilian research. I will simply note that the Government are keeping a close and critical eye on all departmental research programmes and on the balance of such programmes.

I am sorry that it will not be possible to respond to all the points made in the debate, particularly those made by my hon. Friend the Member for Bedfordshire, North, who initiated the debate. I should mention that we still await the advice of the ABRC on international comparisons, and we shall study them closely when they come. The restructuring costs of the councils, which are a heavy burden, have to some extent been alleviated by the new money that my right hon. Friend has found for them.

On the question of the——

It being Seven o'clock, the proceedings lapsed, pursuant to Standing Order No. 6 (Arrangement of public business).

Peterhead Harbours (South Bay Development) Order Confirmation Bill (By Order)

Order for Second Reading read.

7 pm

Mr. Albert McQuarrie (Banff and Buchan): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): I suggest that the motion to refer the Bill to a Joint Committee of both Houses should be debated with the motion for Second Reading.

Mr. McQuarrie: I place on record at the outset the fact that this is the first opportunity that I or any hon. Member has had to discuss the Bill. It has been said by the Scottish National party in my constituency that the Bill could have been discussed or promoted earlier. To set the record straight, I should make it clear that it has not been possible to discuss the Bill in the House until this evening. I accept that the SNP in my constituency and its prospective parliamentary candidate have shown an ignorance of parliamentary procedure in suggesting otherwise.

If the hon. Member for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Hughes)—later supported by the hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. Wilson)—had not tabled a blocking motion on 10 July this year, the order would have been passed a long time ago. The hon. Member for Dundee, East, who is not in his place, despite his opposition to the Bill, has told his party in my constituency that he supported the trustees' proposals, but his action on 29 October clearly proved that his support was certainly not for this scheme or for the Peterhead harbour trustees. It is an example of the double standards to which we have become accustomed from the SNP in Scotland. It says one thing in my constituency and the opposite in other places. I do not blame the hon. Member for Dundee, East if he wishes to support the harbour board in his constituency, but he should not mislead my constituents who wish to see the scheme approved and welcome the progress that the Peterhead harbour board has made.

This is a Bill to confirm a provisional order made by the Secretary of State under the Private Legislation Procedure (Scotland) Act 1936, after a local inquiry by commissioners, in pursuance of the Act. The order is promoted by the harbour trustees of Peterhead who are charged by statute with managing the fishing harbours at Peterhead in my constituency.

The inquiry into the provisions of the draft order was held in Peterhead from 1 to 15 May 1985 on 11 sitting days, before commissioners appointed by the Secretary of State under section 3 of the 1936 Act. The commissioners were Lord Hughes, as chairman, the Earl of Balfour, Lady Sempill and the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Leith (Mr. Brown). The commissioners heard full and lengthy arguments for and against the order and found unanimously in favour of the scheme. The procedure at the inquiry was regular, according to law and parliamentary procedure and practice. The order, as modified in accordance with the the commissioners' recommendations, forms the schedule to the Bill.

The object of the order is to authorise harbour works which will calm the water in the existing harbours and provide additional berthing spaces for the fishing vessels.

The fishing harbours at Peterhead have become the pre-eminent port in Europe for landings of white fish. I should like to illustrate the increase in trade. The number of boxes landed at Peterhead increased from 300,000 in 1970 to 2,109,000 in the year up to March 1985. In addition, Peterhead has become an important port for the export of grain and other bulk cargoes and serves its own hinterland of grain producers in the north-east of Scotland.

Unfortunately, though acceptably, the increase in trade at Peterhead harbour has led to severe congestion in the fishing vessels' area in the harbour. At weekends particularly, vessels frequently have to berth six or seven deep from the quay wall, which makes the servicing of vessels difficult and inefficient and causes a safety hazard. The harbours are too often crowded and many vessels that use Peterhead as their home port have to be turned away.

Another problem is that steel-hulled boats have to berth alongside wooden-hulled boats, which causes considerable damage to the fishing vessels. The problem is even greater because of the excessive wave motion in the existing harbour which provides inadequate shelter for fishing vessels. The trustees have had to take that fact into consideration in putting forward their proposals.

Another important factor is that the Peterhead harbour trustees do not conduct any oil-related business in the port. That has been made clear in order to allay the fears of companies and other harbour authorities which are involved in that industry and feel that there is a threat to their business. It must be said that the trustees at Peterhead also have no intention of engaging in that business when the development has been completed.

The additional berthing space is required primarily for fishing vessels and general cargo boats. The oil supply boats are served either in the adjacent Bay of Refuge, which is not under the management of the Peterhead harbour trustees, or at the harbour in Aberdeen where the oil-berthing capacity is far greater and the facilities more suitable. Therefore, it cannot be said that the scheme proposed by the Peterhead harbour trustees will result in a loss of business for Aberdeen where the oil work is being carried out.

The draft order, together with the plans and sections of the proposals, were deposited at the Scottish Office and elsewhere, pursuant to the 1936 Act, in March 1984. Ten petitions were lodged against the draft order, but three were withdrawn before the public inquiry. The remaining seven can be grouped according to the nature of their objections.

The first group could be the Peterhead bay authority, which is responsible for the management of the adjacent harbour—the Peterhead Bay of Refuge—and the north of Scotland hydro-electric board, which have both complained that the proposed works would have a detrimental effect on the safe manoeuvring of tankers in the Bay of Refuge. The commissioners, in submitting their report to the Secretary of State for Scotland, said:

"We consider that the proposed harbour extension would bring considerable benefit to the operation of the existing fishing harbour and would not prejudice the operation of the Peterhead bay harbour, and in particular the manoeuvring of tankers in the bay, especially if there is a reversion to the size of tanker which, with one exception, was used prior to the end of the coal strike."

The commissioners add, in relation to the report from the Department of Transport and the statement to the inquiry by Captain Fellingham:

"In any event, we heard a considerable amount of technical evidence addressed by both the promoters and the objectors. We were much more impressed by the evidence of the promoters and we had no hesitation in accepting it."

The second group of objectors comprised the Aberdeen harbour board, the Aberdeen Stevedoring Company, the Dundee port authority and the Forth ports authority, which appeared jointly before the inquiry to complain that the works were unnecessary and would remove trade from their ports. The commissioners said:

"We are further of the view that the ports of Aberdeen, Dundee and the Forth ports harbour authority as to what is proposed at Peterhead has limited foundation, but to allay some of the fears we propose to delete from the order lines 29 to 32 on page 4 which would have permitted the construction of the roll-on, roll-off facility. We would add that it is no part of our function to amend the dock labour scheme, and we cannot stultify beneficial development at non-dock labour scheme ports on the grounds that it might provide unfair competition to harbours which are within the scheme."

The final group of objectors comprised Mr. Thomas Chalmers and 17 others, residents of homes in Peterhead adjacent to the proposed works, who complained that the work would be detrimental to amenity and their houses. In the report to the Secretary of State the commissioners stated:

"We have paid considerable attention to the objections of those living in the near vicinity of the proposed works but consider that any loss of amenity to them is insufficient ground for preventing the proposed development from going ahead. We propose however to impose conditions to minimise the loss of amenity by restricting the height of the wall on the proposed new south breakwater to 6·2 metres above the ordnance datum; by restricting the height of any buildings on the proposed north quay to the level of the existing retaining wall; by restricting the hours during which blasting and drilling operations can be conducted to the period between 8 am and 6 pm or half an hour before sunrise to half an hour after sunset whichever period is the shorter; and by prohibiting such work during Saturdays and Sundays; by imposing measures for the control of noise and the restriction of vibration caused by blasting and drilling operations as offered by the promoters; and by providing for compensation for any physical damage caused by such operations under the Land Compensation (Scotland) Act 1973".

Although the commissioners ruled in this manner, I felt that I had an obligation to my constituents to pursue the matter, as I was aware that they were not wholly satisfied with the result of the inquiry.

I had a meeting with Mr. Stanley Anderson, the consulting engineer concerned with the Peterhead harbour trustees' proposals, to secure information on the other matters raised by those objectors. On being questioned about the grain operations, Mr. Anderson informed me that they had been occurring at Peterhead for more than 10 years—a matter of which I was aware and which I accepted as being true. He told me that the trustees had guaranteed that they would ensure the use of the most modern methods and equipment for loading grain on to the boats. He added that, in the early stages of the development, the grain would be loaded on to the new south quay, which would remove the boats from such close proximity to the houses. Mr. Anderson pointed out also that the companies that acted as stevedores are private contractors and that, in the interests of the objectors, the trustees would lay down instructions on the method of loading the grain to minimise any inconvenience to them.

In paragraph 4 of the petition, the objectors expressed concern at the possible increase in vehicular traffic during and after the development period. Although I accepted that there was bound to be an increase during the construction period, I believed that the limitations and restrictions placed by the commissioners in their report would reduce that traffic. As for traffic after the development, I established that the trustees' proposals for a readjustment of the traffic system, which would have to be approved by the Grampian regional council, would result in considerably less traffic using Lodge walk and Harbour street than at present. Grampian regional council, which had originally petitioned against the order but later withdrew its objection, in its petition, said:

[Mr. McQuarrie]

"Your petitioners in general support the proposals by the trustees and do not object to them as such".

In paragraph 6 of the petition the same group of objectors expressed worry that, in the area of the seaward site of Harbour street and Lodge walk and adjacent to the lifeboat station, buildings and other structures would be erected which would restrict their present view of the sea.

I was satisfied that the restrictions placed by the commissioners would provide safeguards, but, in addition, Mr. Anderson guaranteed that the trustees had undertaken that no structures would be erected above the existing parapet level. It was pointed out also that any proposals for quayside structures would have to be approved by the planning committee of the Banff and Buchan district council and that full opportunities would be afforded at all stages for the residents to make representations if they thought it necessary.

The final part of the petition of these objectors is concerned with the loss of amenity ground on the seaward side of Harbour street and Lodge walk which was of benefit to the residents of Peterhead and the objectors. The petition showed that the ground was owned by Banff and Buchan district council. I am advised that that amenity area, with the seats, will be retained in an acceptable form. That undertaking has been given by the Peterhead harbour trustees. Banff and Buchan district council raised no objections to the trustees' proposals. I understand that the local authority approved them. Given those assurances and the further protection that will be available to my constituents, I am certain that any future representations that they make will be sincerely considered by the Peterhead harbour trustees.

All those petitions were carefully considered by the Parliamentary Commissioners before the report submitted to the Secretary of State for Scotland. In the normal course of events, the Bill would have been presented to Parliament and passed all stages without trouble. That was not to be, as the Aberdeen harbour board presented a petition praying that the confirming Bill be referred to a Joint Committee of both Houses of Parliament. It is interesting to place on record that, of all the objectors who had been heard at the public inquiry, only the Aberdeen harbour board could not accept the commissioners' findings. Even the Dundee port authority had no further petition, despite the fact that the hon. Member for Dundee, East, in his usual arrogant manner, had chosen to oppose the Bill on his own account. No member of the Dundee harbour board appeared in person before the public inquiry.

Mr. Gordon Wilson (Dundee, East): I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his description of my signature to a motion to the House of Commons as "arrogant". Is he aware that I signed the motion in direct response to a request by the chief executive of my port authority?

Mr. McQuarrie: That may well be, but the hon. Member for Dundee, East was not in his place when I discussed earlier the fact that he had assured the constituency and the parliamentary candidate in Banff and Buchan that he was supporting the Peterhead harbour trustees. I refer the hon. Gentleman to a copy of the Buchan Observer in which the parliamentary candidate clearly stated that he had approached the hon. Member for Dundee, East who had given him an assurance that he would support the Peterhead harbour trustees' proposal.

Mr. Wilson: That is wrong.

Mr. McQuarrie: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for confirming that the information conveyed in the Buchan Observer by the prospective parliamentary candidate for Banff and Buchan is wrong.

It is an insult to the commissioners for the Aberdeen harbour board to pursue this matter further after the most careful consideration of its pleadings at the inquiry. Having read Mr. John Russell Turner's evidence to the inquiry, which is in pages 992 to 1138 of the proceedings, I can see the reason for the persistence. Mr. Turner is the general manager of the Aberdeen harbour board. During his evidence it was perfectly clear that he was adopting a dictatorial and evasive attitude to the Parliamentary Commissioners. It was the old story—"Whatever I say is right and whatever you say is wrong." One has only to read the evidence to gain a clear impression that Mr. Turner was determined, by any action he could take, to prevent the Peterhead trustees from successfully promoting the Bill.

Having carried out considerable research into the money that has been spent at Aberdeen harbour over the years, and the authority for carrying out that work, I asked myself: how has the Aberdeen harbour board the effrontery to petition against the Peterhead Harbours (South Bay Development) Order Confirmation Bill when it has carried out over many years a works programme without asking for parliamentary approval? Should not the Aberdeen harbour board have been subjected to the same parliamentary scrutiny as the Peterhead harbour trustees?

Mr. Gerald Malone (Aberdeen, South): An important point must be clarified. The Aberdeen harbour board has spent considerable sums. It has invested to improve existing port facilities, not to carry out enormous expansion such as is proposed by the Bill. That is the distinction. I am sure that my hon. Friend does not want to be unfair. I think it is best that he should know that that was the purpose of the expenditure.

Mr. McQuarrie: I am grateful to my hon,. Friend for making that point, but he must accept that, in the past few years, the work in Aberdeen has been carried out with sole purpose of extending the harbour facilities — [Interruption.] — and carrying out new works. The Aberdeen harbour board has spent money on tidal works and improvements in the harbour area.

Harbour boards generally have the power to dredge the harbour and carry out maintenance and improvement work. However, the power is usually confined to the lands belonging to the harbour board. If a board wishes to carry out tidal work, it requires parliamentary authority because the seabed belongs to the Crown and the harbour work extending into tidal waters interferes with the rights of navigation.

It appears that the Aberdeen harbour board relies for its powers on the provisions of the Aberdeen Harbour Confirmation Act 1960. It may be relying on section 69 of that Act, which confers power on the board

"on or in relation to any lands for the time being vested in them or in relation to any other property belonging to them leased, let, hired or loaned to the Board."

Notwithstanding the wide wording of section 69(1)(a) of the Act, it says that the powers apply only to the land and may not be exercised in tidal waters. It seems that any tidal work and development in the Aberdeen harbour before and during Mr. Turner's tenure as general manager may have been carried out unlawfully and should have been investigated by the Secretary of State.

I shall deal with some of the matters raised in the new petition of the Aberdeen harbour board after the public inquiry. It repeats what was said in the earlier petition and at the inquiry. In paragraph 4, the Aberdeen harbour board admits that the commissioners have found in favour of the order. Why can it not accept the report by the appointed parliamentary body, which gave it a full hearing? If the Aberdeen harbour board suggests that the order is wrong in principle, Mr. Turner's evidence did not prove that. On the contrary, he made a case for it, as can be seen from his cross-examination by counsel and the commissioners.

The theme of the new petition is based on many statements that are not new, and I shall deal with some of them. First, there is a complaint about the non-existence of the national dock labour scheme, which the Aberdeen harbour board said would give Peterhead an unfair advantage over Aberdeen. The national dock labour scheme has been in existence since 1942, and this is the first time that Aberdeen has suggested that it is adversely affected.

It became clear from Mr. Turner's evidence to the inquiry that he wanted to be rid of the scheme in Aberdeen because it was killing the fishing trade in that harbour. Some 67,000 boxes of fish are landed each day — Monday to Saturday — at Peterhead compared with 3,400 boxes at Aberdeen. That includes 428 boxes that have been consigned from other ports in Scotland. As the Peterhead order is mainly for the fishing vessels, there should be no need to prove the case further.

In addition, it was clear from Mr. Turner's evidence that fishing is responsible for only 10 per cent. of the revenue at Aberdeen harbour. That must be a serious loss-making operation, and it proves the evidence brought out during the public inquiry that the fishermen are voting with their feet and staying away from Aberdeen.[Interruption.] The hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) seems to think that he is in the Chamber for a laugh. He never comes in for a serious debate. It would serve him better in his position in the shadow Cabinet if he listened to what is said by hon. Members.

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian) rose——

Mr. McQuarrie: I shall not give way to the hon. Gentleman.

It will be most interesting to know how much of the total loss at Aberdeen is accounted for by the loss-making fishing trade. Mr. Turner was unable to give that information when he was pressed by the chairman of the commissioners, who suggested that he was trying to steal the fishing vessels away from Peterhead.

Paragraph 7 of the new petition submits that at Aberdeen harbour and elsewhere in Scotland more than sufficient harbour facilities already exist, which are better located and well suited to meet the requirements of the type of shipping that could be expected to make use of the facilities that could be afforded by the proposed work. The simple question is: where and how suitable are they? My constituency covers the largest fishing area in the United Kingdom. There are nice harbours at Portsoy, Whitehills, Banff, Macduff, Gardenstown and Fraserburgh. Fraserburgh did not oppose the confirmation order although it would have had most to lose from it. All those harbours are efficient and busy. Fraserburgh commissioners have just promoted two parliamentary orders in the House for increased fishing and grain facilities.

None of those harbours could cope with the trade that is carried out at Peterhead and none has the same difficulties as Peterhead in accommodating the fishing vessels that use the harbours. Mr. Turner in his evidence stated that half a million tonnes of traffic would be at risk if the Peterhead order is approved. That is the total traffic passing through Aberdeen, and it is farcical to make such a suggestion. In cross-examination, Mr. Turner accepted that that was all guesswork, scaremongering and had no foundation—[Interruption.] Look at the record.

If, as Aberdeen's petition states, there are adequate facilities there and in other ports, why did Mr. Turner tell the inquiry that the board has plans for further extensions costing millions of pounds over the next 10 years? Is that just another reason for his opposition to the Peterhead proposals, with the Big Brother attitude —"Don't do as I do, do as I tell you"?

On the matter of the grain trade, I shall confine myself to the latest figures from J R Crabtree, which are an update on the Entwhistle report that was referred to at the public inquiry. Between August and March 1984-85, Peterhead handled 143,079 tonnes compared with Aberdeen's 9,089 tonnes. In April, Peterhead had 7,687 tonnes and Aberdeen had nil. In May, Peterhead had 3,146 tonnes and Aberdeen had 5,889. In June, Peterhead had 553 tonnes, Aberdeen nil. That brought the total for the period to 154,565 tonnes for Peterhead and 14,978 tonnes for Aberdeen. In the current period, covering August, September and October 1985, Peterhead and Aberdeen had no grain traffic in August. In September, Peterhead had 14,042 tonnes, Aberdeen nil. In October, Peterhead had 31,395 tonnes, Aberdeen nil. For those three months, Peterhead had 45,437 tonnes of barley exports, Aberdeen nil.

It is interesting to compare other ports which, according to the Aberdeen harbour board, handle barley exports. In the same period for the 1985-86 totals, Montrose handled 20,570 tonnes, Dundee 9,738 tonnes and Leith 18,467 tonnes. Therefore, it is clear that neither Aberdeen nor any other Scottish port can match Peterhead for the handling of barley for export. That fully justifies the Bill.

Oil-related works were also mentioned in the new petition. Much discussion took place at the public inquiry about what Peterhead might do in the future which could affect Aberdeen. Mr. Turner was not prepared to say that Peterhead had no intention of taking on any oil-related work. That was made clear by Mr. Tom Buchan, the chairman of the Peterhead trustees, in his evidence to the inquiry. In his evidence Mr. Buchan said:

"Well, as far as the trustees are concerned there is a gentleman's agreement, an operating agreement between the two bodies that we don't touch oil vessels—we have had many approaches over the years from various companies to use the fishing port as an oil base and that has been refused, and I see no reason why the Peterhead harbour trustees should change their mind in the future."

[Mr. McQuarrie]

If that was not a good enough undertaking for Mr. Turner and the Aberdeen harbour board, apparently nothing will satisfy them in their efforts to thwart the passing of the Bill.

I refer to Aberdeen harbour board's plan for a Peterhead harbour extension, which it said would be acceptable. I have with me some drawings, which I now exhibit to the House. I was unable to bring the whole bundle to the House because it is more than 3 ft in length. Those drawings were presented by the Peterhead harbour trustees to the public inquiry. They were accepted by the commissioners, who reported back to the Secretary of State for Scotland.

The drawings were compiled by the trustees' consulting engineers. I am sure that the House will agree that it does not require an experienced person to see that they involved a great deal of time and money. As I said, those drawings were considered and approved by the commissioners at the public inquiry.

I also have a cutting from The Press and Journal, a daily newspaper that is circulated widely in Scotland, especially in the Grampian region. It is dated 25 October and headed, "Harbour plan unveiled." It is a report from Mr. Bob Kennedy, the fishing editor. The article states that the Aberdeen harbour board unveiled plans for an alternative scheme to that proposed by the Peterhead harbour trustees. The drawing illustrated in the article is all that has been issued. No technical details have been set out, nor were prior consultations held with the Peterhead harbour trustees. Mr. Tom Buchan is quoted in the article as saying:

"It is a bit like me having a garage plan turned down by the planning authority and then my neighbour presenting me with his own ideas."

Mr. Turner, general manager of the Aberdeen harbour board, suggests that it was endeavouring to help, not hinder; but in the article he goes on to admit that ideally Aberdeen harbour board would not want a new development at Peterhead and that it had used considerable expertise to prepare the alternative plan. As none of the harbour trustees at Peterhead has seen the scheme, other than in The Press and Journal article, let us look at how expert it is.

Mr. Robert Hughes (Aberdeen, North): Has not the hon. Gentleman put his finger on the problem? At the initial inquiry, and since then, despite determined efforts by Aberdeen harbour board, the Peterhead trustees have never been allowed to see the alternative scheme. I have evidence from the Peterhead trustees' parliamentary agents that no agreement could be reached. Would it not be better if the trustees looked seriously at the scheme instead of dismissing it in a cavalier way, as the hon. Gentleman seems to be doing?

Mr. McQuarrie: I cannot accept what the hon. Gentleman says. I have checked thoroughly. The Peterhead harbour trustees were not advised of the scheme until they saw it in The Press and Journal on 25 October. There has been no discussion on the matter.

Mr. Malone: This is an important point. If I am called, I shall make the point that Aberdeen harbour board has been keen to compromise. I do not want my hon. Friend to be wrong on a matter of fact. The question was put by the general manager of Aberdeen harbour board to Mr. McCrae, the clerk to the Peterhead harbour trustees, at the meeting in London with the two sets of parliamentary agents, and it was dismissed out of hand at that stage. That was in October or the early part of November.

Mr. McQuarrie: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that information. However, my information is that no discussions have taken place between Aberdeen harbour board and Peterhead harbour trustees. They are the people who are affected.

Aberdeen harbour board unveiled a plan, and the newspaper article was presented to Mr. Stanley Anderson, the consulting engineer to the Peterhead harbour trustees, as the trustees were willing to look at it, although the information was scanty.

After those investigations, the following points must be made. First, it was proven during the public inquiry, after careful consideration, that the Peterhead trustees' scheme would not interfere with tanker manoeuvrability in the Bay of Refuge. That was accepted by the commissioners.

Secondly, the width of the structure proposed by Aberdeen is such that the storm waves will be reflected straight back into the Bay of Refuge, reaching a possible height of 20 to 30 ft, which would render navigation by fishing and commercial vessels hazardous.

Thirdly, the alternative plan for width would be too narrow to be anything other than a vertically faced structure. It would act as a mirror reflecting the full energy of the waves back into the Bay of Refuge, again causing severe problems for the fishing and commercial vessels.

Fourthly, the Peterhead trustees' proposals took full account of those dangers, as can be seen from their scheme, where the proposed jetty is much wider and has a curved end to prevent unacceptable wave motion within the new harbour and render the existing south harbour free of any wave motion. The Aberdeen harbour board proposals do neither. They are defective in that the wave motion would be considerably worsened in the existing south harbour. That factor was established after extensive tests carried out by Mr. Anderson, the consulting engineer, on various shapes and forms of harbour layouts at the hydraulic research station at Wallingford.

Fifthly, it is obvious that no real thought, never mind the considerable expertise claimed by Mr. Turner, has gone into providing an alternative proposal to that of Peterhead. Nobody in his senses, having spent £250,000, as the Peterhead trustees have done, in the preparation of drawings, models, site investigation, design, hydraulic testing and many other operations, would consider a 3 in by 3 in illustration in a daily newspaper a suitable alternative to that produced by the Peterhead trustees.

For those reasons, it is right that the ridiculous alternative proposals should be rejected by the Peterhead harbour trustees. Even Mr. Turner is quoted in the article as conceding that they had already been dismissed as not being cost-effective by the clerk to the Peterhead harbour trustees, Mr. Colin McCrae.

Paragraph 12 of the new petition seeks to have the Bill referred to a Joint Committee of both Houses of Parliament. In parliamentary discussions arising out of motions to refer confirmation Bills to a Joint Committee, it has been established that such a course should be followed only where a good prima facie case has been made that there have been grave errors in procedure or a serious miscarriage of justice before the commissioners, or that new or material facts have emerged. Since the present procedure was introduced, on the passing of the Private Legislation Procedure (Scotland) Act 1899, only twice has such a motion been successful—in the Leith Corporation Tramways Order Confirmation Act 1904 and the exceptional Lothian Region (Edinburgh Western Relief Road) Bill this Session.

In the Leith case, the commissioners had denied an objector a locus standi and it appeared that there was a denial of justice. As is well known, the Edinburgh case has not yet been considered by the Joint Committee. Peterhead harbour trustees, the promoters of the Bill, do not think that there is any legitimate reason for referring the Bill to a Joint Committee. The new petition of the Aberdeen harbour board merely raises matters that have already been argued or could have been argued before the commissioners at the public inquiry.

Due to the pressure of time, I have been able to deal only in part with the necessity of giving a Second Reading to the Bill tonight. At present, unemployment in Aberdeen is only 5·6 per cent., compared with 13·9 per cent. in Peterhead. The development will create many jobs during the construction period and some permanent jobs on completion. It will mean a safer harbour for the fishermen, who require our support, when one considers the dangerous calling that they follow.

For that reason, and for others that I have mentioned, I ask my hon. Friends and Opposition Members to support Second Reading of the Bill and to reject the petition by Aberdeen harbour board to refer the Bill to a Joint Committee of both Houses.

7.40 pm

Mr. Harry Ewing (Falkirk, East): My intervention in the debate will not be brief, although it had been my intention to be brief. I gained the impression from the speech of the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. McQuarrie) that the hon. Gentleman thought that this matter should be referred to a Joint Committee of both Houses. However, as the hon. Gentleman said that he had no intention of agreeing to such a proposition, the Opposition obviously have a duty to persuade the hon. Gentleman that even at this late hour and as the debate continues within its time limit, he ought seriously to reconsider his position on that point.

It is right that the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan should argue his case on behalf of the Peterhead authority. I was tempted to say on behalf of his constituency, but from the evidence and the correspondence that hon. Members have received, I think that the hon. Member would concede that there is some controversy in his constituency about the proposed development. The argument between the Peterhead harbour authority and Aberdeen harbour authority has far wider repercussions than the harbour at Peterhead and the port at Aberdeen.

Mr. McQuarrie: The hon. Gentleman has said that there are considerable problems in my constituency. Will he elaborate upon those constituency problems?

Mr. Ewing: The hon. Gentleman should not put words into my mouth. I did not say that there were considerable problems in his constituency. When he reads Hansard tomorrow he will see that I understand from correspondence that I have received that there is some controversy in his constituency about the development. I did not say that there were considerable problems.

The hon. Member for Banff and Buchan referred to the controversy that surrounds the proposal to develop Peterhead harbour in an area which the harbour authority does not own. The area is owned by the Peterhead bay authority. The matter of ownership is one of the major differences between the developments that have taken place over the years at Aberdeen and the proposed development at Peterhead. The developments at Aberdeen have taken place in an area that is owned by the authority carrying out that development whereas the Peterhead trustees do not own the land where the proposed development will take place.

I honour and respect the fact that the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan is entitled to argue on behalf of the proposition for the Peterhead authority. I was interested in the points that he made in seeking to reassure the householders in the proposed development area about the skyline of the buildings to be constructed if the developments and the proposed road network went ahead.

The hon. Gentleman said that the road network would have to be approved by Grampian regional council and the planning consents affecting the skyline and other matters would have to be approved by Banff and Buchan district council. The hon. Gentleman seemed to suggest that that would be an automatic fait accompli; if the residents accepted the development, the planning authorities would take care of the residents' interests in planning considerations.

After 15 years in the House of Commons dealing with such matters both on a constituency and a national level, it has been my experience that it is pointless to put too much faith in the outcome of a planning application. I would not want to put a great deal of emphasis or stress on such an assurance because no planning authority would give any assurances before a planning application was submitted. The hon. Member for Banff and Buchan does not have grounds to pursue that point on that basis.

On a lighter note, it was interesting to hear the hon. Gentleman refer to Mr. Tom Buchan. The hon. Gentleman said that the Aberdeen harbour authority's approach to the matter was like Mr. Buchan having an application for a garage rejected by the planning authority and his neighbour then suggesting an alternative proposal. I have news for the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan. I do not know what happens in his part of the world, but in Falkirk, East that is a regular feature of garage construction. The two neighbours get together and arrange a compromise. That is what we are trying to do today.

The hon. Member for Banff and Buchan skated over the very important point of Peterhead harbour's record on the export of grain. I was tempted to intervene and ask the hon. Gentleman why, if Peterhead harbour is operating so well and efficiently at present, it should want to spend £13·2 million. That was the estimated cost in March 1984 but obviously that will have risen since then, as one can see the final costs of civil engineering jobs over the years outstrip estimated planning costs. I do not understand why the Peterhead planning authority wants to spend that sum if, as the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan claims, it is operating exceptionally well.

The only reason for the authority wishing to spend that money is that it wants to attract more traffic from other ports. I know that the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan will say that the harbour authority wants to spend that money to provide a safer refuge for the fishermen who steam into Peterhead harbour. I am in favour of making the sea and the refuge as safe as possible for the fishermen, but I cannot accept that the development is solely for the safe passage of the fishermen who use the harbour. I suspect that in his heart of hearts the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan knows that.

[Mr. Ewing]

Mr. McQuarrie: I did not say that the development was intended solely for the fishermen. I said that it was primarily for the fishermen. The hon. Gentleman, who has had ministerial experience, must accept that the vessels in the harbour line up six, seven or eight deep and that there is a serious risk of overcrowding in the harbour. That risk justifies the harbour commissioners in asking for an extension primarily for the fishermen and to make the harbour safe. I do not dispute the fact that the proposal would make the harbour safe. The prime purpose of the Bill is to assist the fishing vessels and to make the harbour safe.

Mr. Ewing: I accept what the hon. Gentleman says, but I suspect that the alternative proposal by the Aberdeen harbour authority would make the harbour safe primarily for fishermen, as the hon. Gentleman says. There is another element involved, and that is that the development would attract additional traffic. The authority is seeking to increase the facilities of the harbour to allow vessels up to 10,000 tonnes into the harbour. It is clearly essential to attract additional traffic to obtain a return on a proposed investment of £13·2 million.

Mr. Malone: If the proposal was intended to benefit fishermen in the first instance, it seems odd that the proposals put before the commission included a roll-on/roll-off facility. My hon. Friend the Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. McQuarrie) has said that the fishermen are voting with their feet, but I do not think that even that novel concept requires a roll-on/roll-off facility.

Mr. Ewing: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. Whether the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan and the Peterhead authority like it or not, there is grave discontent about the way in which the commission conducted the inquiry. It cannot be right for one party to be able to take the commission on a tour of the area and to submit its evidence without cross-examination.

Mr. McQuarrie: That is not true.

Mr. Ewing: It is clearly recorded in the documents that the Peterhead harbour authority was never cross-examined. The chairman, Lord Hughes, allowed no cross-examination of the authority itself as distinct from its witnesses.

Mr. McQuarrie: Mr. Tom Buchan, chairman of the harbour trustees, was questioned and cross-examined. His evidence is contained in papers 15 to 80 of the record. The words "T. S. Buchan cross-examined" are there for all to see. Mr. Buchan gave evidence and was examined by Mr. Osborne and cross-examined by other parties including the chairman. I quote just one example:

"The Chairman: If all the parties produce documents, if you finish up with 10 the Objectors will start with No. 11."

That is just one of the chairman's comments to Mr. Buchan in cross-examination. The hon. Gentleman should get the facts right.

Mr. Ewing: The cross-examination of witnesses is the function not of the chairman but of those representing the objectors. One of the unsatisfactory features of the inquiry was the attitude of the chairman — I say this in the friendliest possible way to my old friend Lord Hughes —to those seeking to object to the proposition. I leave it at that, but the deep dissatisfaction and discontent that it has caused is just one of the reasons why the matter should be submitted to a joint Committee of both Houses.

It would be wrong for the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan to try to convince the House that the commission conducted the inquiry satisfactorily because it did not. Indeed, that is a salient difference between the 1904 Leith tramways case mentioned by the hon. Gentleman and last week's western relief road case. In the latter case, there was no complaint about the commission of inquiry, but there was certainly a complaint in the 1904 case and there is a complaint in relation to the present case which should be taken into account when the House makes its decision today.

There is a much broader issue involved. As I have said, one might easily gain the impression that this was a private battle between the Aberdeen harbour authority and the Peterhead trustees, but nothing could be further from the truth. We need look no further for evidence than the barley export comparisons made by the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan between Peterhead and the Forth ports. The hon. Gentleman failed to mention the significant fact that the EEC Commission recommended to the inquiry that there should be no extension of harbour and port facilities in the United Kingdom. As Scotland is included in the United Kingdom, that was a salient feature in the investigation. If the project were allowed to go ahead it is clear that there would be serious repercussions for the Forth authority ports. At the last count, there were some 21 harbours around the coast of Scotland involved in those exports.

Mr. McQuarrie: Give us the facts.

Mr. Ewing: I wish that the hon. Gentleman would afford others the courtesy and respect with which the House listened to his comments. He should sit quietly for a minute and listen to what others have to say.

There has been a dramatic change in the export of goods from Scottish ports in the past five years, and the extension of facilities at Peterhead will merely aggravate the problem. I hope that I shall not bore the House if I give some figures. Five or six years ago, 75 per cent. of all exports with manufacturing origin in Scotland were exported through Scottish ports — the Clyde authority ports, the Forth authority ports and ports in other areas of Scotland, including one non-scheme port. Peterhead is not the only non-scheme port in Scotland. Now, only 25 per cent. of all goods with manufacturing origin in Scotland are exported from Scottish ports. The reason is the introduction of the grid system, to which the Government have turned a blind eye despite my constant efforts to make them come to terms with it.

Under the grid system, the shipowners — not the Government or the exporters—pay for the transport of exports by road from any part of Scotland to the non-scheme port of Felixstowe. A good example is whisky which is manufactured in Perth but taken by lorry free of charge down to Felixstowe. The reason given is the long steaming distance to Scottish ports, but the Government fail to appreciate that the grid system is leading slowly but surely to the closure of the Scottish ports and that as soon as that result is achieved the system will be removed and the exporters will have to pay the road haulage costs. Among all the threats to the prospects of Scottish industry I can think of none more damaging than the inability to use our own ports for the export of our manufactured goods.

Gartcosh is in the news. I do not intend to go into detail about it, but 48 per cent. of the cargo going out from my port of Grangemouth is finished steel products from Gartcosh — finished steel products for export to the German car industry. If Gartcosh closes, we simply could not replace that dry cargo let alone allow a development at Peterhead which may take away more. Grangemouth is also a port which is used to ship to the Shetlands and other islands.

The Bill has far wider repercussions that appear to be appreciated by the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. McQuarrie). I must say this as gently and as kindly as I can, but I simply do not accept that the Peterhead harbour trustees can blandly assure us that they will not take cargo from anybody else. It may be Christmas, but we do not live in a fairytale world. The Peterhead harbour authorities will be as much in competition for exported goods from Scotland as Grangemouth, Leith, Dundee, Aberdeen or any other port.

Mr. Robert Hughes: If the scheme went ahead and Peterhead harbour did not increase its revenue as much as possible by increased trade, Peterhead fishermen would pay a heavy price. What would the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan say then?

Mr. Ewing: That is a very important point. It emphasises what I am trying to say about the viability of this investment at Peterhead. It could not be supported by fishing alone. There are no ifs and buts about that. This investment of £13·2 million at 1984 prices, now possibly in the region of £17 million, could not be supported simply by fishing. If that is true and the House accepts it, support for this investment must come from somewhere else.

It is the somewhere else that concerns us. There is uncertainty about where the investment will come from. There is uncertainty about all that will flow from a decision to allow this development to go ahead without further examination. That makes me strongly favour reference to a Joint Committee of both Houses, and on that I will cast my vote tonight.

8.2 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Michael Ancram): On these occasions when confirmation Bills are contested there can be a general misunderstanding about the Secretary of State's role and responsibilities. As we have heard tonight, the Opposition, and especially the official Opposition spokesman, the hon. Member for Falkirk, East (Mr. Ewing), can take a fairly broad view. I am sure that hon. Members will be under no illusion about the Secretary of State's function. The House will know that this is purely formal in relation to the introduction of the Bill and of our proceedings tonight.

Perhaps I might go back a little in time to set those remarks in context. Under the Private Legislation Procedure (Scotland) Act 1936, where a provisional order under that Act is opposed, as is the case here, an inquiry is held before the commissioners. This inquiry takes place in Scotland at or near the place which is the subject of the powers which are sought.

Promoters and objectors, represented by council, appear before the commissioners and lead evidence. After the hearing the commissioners recommend to the Secretary of State, in the form of a report, that the order should be issued or should be rejected or should be issued with modifications. In this case the commissioners, sitting at Peterhead, hearing the arguments put forward, recommended that the order should be confirmed, with some small modifications.

If an order is then issued by the Secretary of State, as it has been in the present case, it is submitted to Parliament in the form of a confirmation Bill, which once approved by Parliament is regarded as a public Act. The Secretary of State's role so far is a formality.

In theory, the Secretary of State could decline to accept the recommendations of the parliamentary commissioners, but it has been the practice to honour the undertaking given during the passage of the Private Legislation Procedure (Scotland) Act 1933—consolidated in the 1936 Act—that the Secretary of State would treat such recommendations with the greatest respect and would not, save in exceptional circumstances, set them aside. Therefore, in submitting to Parliament an order which has been the subject of an inquiry, the Secretary of State is not to be regarded as expressing a view on the merits of the order. My right hon. Friend is enabling the appropriate parliamentary procedure to take place.

Mr. Robert Hughes: May I refer the Minister back to the original confirmation Bill. I refer especially to an answer that he gave about the publication of confirmation Bills. He said that he would not normally publish confirmation Bills until such time as a transcript of all the evidence was available to those who had an interest. Why did that procedure not operate in this case? The original confirmation Bill was published some months before the transcript was publicly available.

Mr. Ancram: The hon. Gentleman is right to remind the House that he put a parliamentary question to me on this. He is also right to say that my answer suggested that that was the normal practice—that the transcript of the evidence should be available. I understand that this is not of necessity the case, but it has been the normal practice. Under section 8(3) of the Private Legislation Procedure (Scotland) Act 1936, my right hon. Friend is required to introduce a confirming Bill

"as soon as conveniently may be".

Obviously, in those circumstances, where there is some difficulty in getting the transcript—the hon. Gentleman is aware that there were certain difficulties in transcribing —there must be a balance of judgment struck by my hon. Friend to decide when he chooses to introduce the Bill in order to conform to his statutory obligations. It was in the light of that that the Bill was originally introduced by my right hon. Friend in July of this year.

I should make one or two general points. It is our legal practice in this country that those who wish to build harbour works, which might interfere with the rights of others, should have statutory powers, usually quite specific, to do so. In the present case the trustees of the harbours of Peterhead, which is where the fishery traffic is accommodated, wish to extend their harbour facilities to the southward by creating new quays and berthing spaces. I understand that these facilities are intended primarily for commercial, that is non-fishery, traffic. The trustees maintain that these new works will have a beneficial effect also on their handling of fishery traffic. The financing of the proposed works is a matter for the trustees.

[Mr. Ancram]

The confirmation Bill has been the subject of inquiry by colleagues in this House and from the other place. They have recommended, having listened to the evidence, the order for confirmation by means of a Bill, and it is on that basis and in accordance with precedent that it is before the House tonight.

In relation to the motion to refer to a Joint Committee, perhaps it would help the House if I were to explain the position as I understand it. There is a power under section 9 of the 1936 Act to refer the matter to a Joint Committee, if a petition against the order in the Bill has been presented before the period of seven days after the introduction of a confirmation Bill. I understand that a petition was presented in form and in time by the Aberdeen harbour board.

Although it has been usual not to refer confirmation Bills to a Joint Committee, that practice or precedent was overturned two weeks ago by the decision to refer the Edinburgh Bill to a Joint Committee. It is for the House as a whole to decide what to do in relation to a confirmation Bill under the private legislation procedure, including reference to a Joint Committee. I would not seek to advise or direct the House in that regard. As with the Edinburgh Bill, the Government are neutral, and I trust that the House will accept that we have fulfilled our responsibilities in regard to this Bill.

8.9 pm

Mr. Gordon Wilson (Dundee, East): I rise on the insistence of the Dundee port authority to ensure that this matter is fully ventilated. I have had the privilege of visiting Peterhead harbour. I found the trustees' work building up the harbour for fishermen superb. I hope that nothing that we do today will hold up those necessary improvements to make the harbour safer for fishermen.

I should like to put in a cautionary word. The hon. Member for Falkirk, East (Mr. Ewing) has already made it clear that there are broader implications in these developments than appear at first sight. The very fact that hon. Members who represent ports throughout the east of Scotland are present suggest that the matter is more controversial than was originally thought.

I do not oppose the general upgrading of Peterhead harbour, but I wonder whether its impact on other east coast ports has been considered properly. There is a question mark over the Commission chaired by Lord Hughes. It is remarkable that, after such a commission of inquiry, several organisations still feel that their arguments have not been examined properly and fairly.

The port of Dundee has a wide variety of harbour facilities which are well suited to the requirements of the types of shipping that could be expected to use the facilities afforded by the proposed works. As the roll on/roll off proposal has already been struck out by the Hughes Commission, I should like to focus attention on the accommodation and loading of grain vessels with a carrying capacity of 10,000 tonnes. Dundee port authority believes that the proposed work would not generate any new business, but rather that it could erode existing trade at Dundee and other major Scottish ports without contributing to the economy of Scotland as a whole or to that of Grampian and Tayside regions.

The port of Dundee currently exports more then 50,000 tonnes of grain a year in consignments ranging from 2,500 tonnes to 5,000 tonnes. The port owns two grain elevators with a loading capacity of 200 tonnes an hour and a further two elevators with a loading capacity of 800 tonnes an hour. It can accept and load vessels with a 10,000-tonne capacity. Peterhead and Dundee draw such traffic from separate hinterlands, with the exception of grain drawn from intervention stores. It is estimated that, from that source, there will be occasional cargoes from 10,000 tonnes to 15,000 tonnes capacity. That grain will not be collected from a restricted area of about 35 miles from a port, but will be collected from anything up to 150 miles from a port. The subsidy given by the intervention board makes it economic for the haulier to collect from a much greater distance. That is an echo of the grid facility which the hon. Member for Falkirk, East described. The port of Dundee and other major Scottish ports can already cope with the trade. The port's worries remain despite the work of the Hughes commission.

A scheme port has certain financial obligations which by statute it must fulfil. Such obligations do not necessarily arise from the operation of the port. They frequently—and most often do—arise from other ports. The National Dock Labour Board levy for administrative purposes is 2·75 per cent. of the port employer's gross wages and, in addition, there is a severence levy of 4·75 per cent. of the gross wages. Unfortunately, the pattern in our ports recently has been the rundown of manpower. That would happen if Peterhead went ahead without such financial obligations, and it would have an unfair advantage over other ports.

I hope that we do not have to vote down the whole proposal, because there is much in it, such as what the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan said about the need to take care of fishermen's interests, with which the House agrees. However, we must protect our own people's interests. The hon. Member for Banff and Buchan mentioned unemployment. I have to tell him that unemployment in Dundee is running at 16·5 per cent. Male unemployment, which includes dock workers, is considerably higher. In view of the general dissatisfaction and the need for a fair hearing, it would be best if the matter went to a Joint Committee of both Houses so that it can be examined with fresh eyes. If the Joint Committee accepts the order, I would accept it. I merely require the matter to be ventilated in the interests of my constituents, so that it is clear that they will not be disadvantaged. We wish Peterhead well.

Mr. McQuarrie: I should like confirmation of what the hon. Gentleman said. Did he say that he would accept the ruling of the Joint Committee?

Mr. Wilson: Yes. My port authority is worried that the matter has not been considered closely enough. If the order is upheld by a Joint Committee, I would accept it and not inhibit the scheme going ahead. In view of the tremendous disquiet in the House and in my area about the proposals, the subject should be referred to a Joint Committee.

8.17 pm

Mr. Robert Hughes (Aberdeen, North): I respect the views of the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. McQuarrie). He must put his constituency case strongly. I do not object to that. However, I wish that he would not present the case in such a way as to make it appear that those of us with a strong interest in Aberdeen harbour are not behaving in a proper parliamentary way. We have a right to look after the interests of our own port and to consider the wider issues.

This is not a party issue. I am speaking purely with my constituency hat on as many of my constituents work in Aberdeen harbour or depend for their livelihood on the harbour in one way or another.

There has been some argument about parliamentary procedures and propriety. It seems that people in the Peterhead area have been given the impression that the parliamentary inquiry is the beginning and end of the democratic process and that no other means are open to them. They have been given the impression that they must accept the inquiry's findings and that to challenge them in any way is undemocratic. That is not true.

The inquiry is the beginning of the parliamentary process. Our debate tonight is the second part of that process. Other parliamentary processes follow. Some of the aggravation could have been prevented if the Secretary of State's office had handled the original confirmation Bill properly. The Secretary of State was aware of my interest in the parliamentary inquiry.

So that there should be no doubt about how the Aberdeen harbour board should proceed, and to further its objections, I advised it to write to the Secretary of State to find out how to lodge a petition. The Secretary of State's private secretary wrote to the general manager of the harbour board describing the procedures and explaining how, once the Bill had been published and read the First time, seven days were available to lodge a petition. Because of a strange coincidence, a lapse by the Scottish Civil Service or a deliberate act, the day before the Bill was published the Secretary of State's private secretary wrote to the general manager and neglected to tell him that the Bill was to be published the next day.

One could argue that the Aberdeen harbour board was lax. It did not imagine that the Bill would be dealt with so quickly. When I was telephoned, only by chance did I look at the Order Paper to discover that the Bill was due for its Second Reading. I had not been advised that the Bill had been published. Perhaps I was lax, because I could have been more vigilant by looking at the Order Paper every day. Whatever the reasons, the normal courtesies were missing, and as a result the opportunity to deal with the matter properly in the last Session was missed.

There is nothing new in Back Benchers seeking to block confirmation Bills and to refer them to Joint Committees. There is nothing new, novel, arrogant or malevolent in that. It is wrong to say that we are seeking selfishly to guard the areas which we represent and to destroy Peterhead's capacity to develop. Nothing could be further from the truth.

We want a development at Peterhead that will satisfy the original objectives, which were to provide a safer harbour and some improved facilities for cargo traffic. The hon. Member for Banff and Buchan cannot have it both ways. In his anxiety to show the need for development, the hon. Gentleman drew attention to the percentage unemployment for Peterhead compared with Aberdeen. Percentages mean nothing. I accept that the percentage figures for Peterhead are serious. I do not deny that they are much higher than they are for Aberdeen. However, many more people in Aberdeen are unemployed than in Peterhead. It shows the depths to which this Tory Government have driven us that we have to talk about percentages and job losses in Aberdeen compared with Peterhead. If the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan is saying that more people will be employed in Peterhead as a result of the South bay development, it must mean that Peterhead is looking for more traffic.

The hon. Gentleman's attention was diverted earlier during my intervention. Perhaps when he has finished his walk he will listen to what I am saying. The hon. Gentleman said that the Peterhead harbour trustees were not looking for increased traffic. He said that there was a gentleman's agreement not to take oil-related work and that the board did not want to poach grain trade from other ports. The development must be paid for. If the new scheme is to be viable, additional revenue must be raised to pay for it. If increased revenue is not generated by additional traffic, it will be necessary to increase costs to existing port users. If that happens, the first person to be on his feet complaining will be the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan, because the fishermen will have to pay more.

Mr. McQuarrie: The Peterhead harbour trustees make £1 million a year profit, mainly from fishing vessels. I made it clear that the development is primarily for fishing vessels. Many fishing vessels would like to use Peterhead harbour as their home port, but are prevented from doing so because of problems within the harbour. The fishing vessels are the main problem, not the grain. An undertaking has been made that no oil-related work will be taken on. In cross-examination, Mr. Buchan made it clear that the harbour trust had enough financial resources and approved backing to provide all the money required for the development.

Mr. Hughes: That last remark might one day haunt some people. We do not know the exact cost of servicing, and we do not know what will happen. There is no doubt that the depth of water required for the proposed development is intended to generate increased traffic. Assumptions about where the cost will fall are serious.

I appreciate why the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan keeps moving round the Chamber, but I would appreciate it if his ideas did not move as well. We are receiving different signals about his intentions later this evening. The hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. Wilson) said he hoped that he would not be driven to vote against the Bill. I hope that I am not forced to vote against it. The matter is in the hands of the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan. He is in control of events. On his attitude depends how the Bill proceeds.

I enter a cautionary note. I have not had a chance to discuss the matter with the Chairman of Ways and Means, but I think that if the hon. Gentleman does not proceed far with the Bill this evening he may discover—as he might at Heathrow airport—that the plane has lost its place in the queue for take-off and that there may be a long delay. If the delay is too long, he may lose altogether. He must have a care that he does not lose his place in the queue for take-off and that his objective that the development at Peterhead should come to fruition is not lost because he has misjudged the mood of the House, tactics or the future. He will obviously have to take those into account.

[Mr. Hughes]

One other matter of real contention is how far the alternative scheme has been considered and the stage of development that it has reached. The hon. Gentleman had a bit of a laugh about the article in The Press and Journal. He said that it published a 3 in square photograph of the development. To ask the House to believe that that was the sole available information on the alternative development is stretching credibility too far. An alternative scheme has been devised and tested on the hydraulic model. It has been found to satisfy the stated objective of the proposed new development. Such a scheme would have been acceptable to all the petitioners, although it fell short of the ideal compromise. That has been under discussion for some time. The fact is, as was admitted in evidence, that the Peterhead harbour trustees have never considered the options, and they have never been put in front of them.

I hope that the matter will not be decided simply on the word of either Mr. McCrea or Mr. Turner. We are not having a gladiatorial contest. This is a serious matter. We have the Peterhead harbour proposed scheme and the alternative schemes on the same scale. They are all produced in exactly the same form. If the matter is to be satisfactorily resolved, by far the best way is to allow a re-examination before a Joint Committee. If that were done, the matter could be examined, counsel could put the case, engineers could be cross-examined about the various schemes and we could come to some objective analysis.

I hope that the hon. Gentleman will be willing to allow the matter to go to a Joint Committee, where there can be a proper and free examination. That should be done with goodwill, not simply as an exercise to buy time. I know that the hon. Gentleman, like all hon. Members, is an honourable man, so I hope that we can look at the matter seriously. We want to see that reasonable developments are carried out. If those developments are to proceed at the quickest possible rate to the satisfaction of the hon. Gentleman's constituents and the fishermen, and to the joint satisfaction of those who represent other constituencies, and if a compromise can be agreed on, well and good, but let us have the matter thoroughly thrashed out.

I do not complain that the hon. Gentleman reads the brief that he has been given by the Bill's promoters—that is perfectly fair—just as he, I am sure, would not disagree with my right to put the brief put to me by my constituents. However, he is not in a position, and nor am I, to know for certain about wave heights and all the technical details that he began to go into. I trust Mr. Turner, the manager of Aberdeen harbour board, who is an engineer. There is no harm whatever in the matter being properly examined, and I hope that in everyone's interests the matter will be disposed of in the best possible way. That is in the hands of the hon. Gentleman. I ask him to accept my goodwill and that of others, and I hope that he will take that into account. I hope that Peterhead, too, will take that goodwill into account and will not wake up tomorrow to find that our goodwill has not been taken properly into account, because in the end it is Peterhead that will suffer.

8.35 pm

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): I rise to support the Bill. I do so because as a Conservative I believe that competition is good for the customer. As a party we believe that it is right to encourage competition, and that every effort should be made to encourage competition which leads to efficiency and a better service to customers.

I was interested in what the hon. Member for Falkirk, East (Mr. Ewing) had to say. If I understood him correctly, he was critical of the parliamentary commission. I think I am right in saying that the hon. Member for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Hughes) was also critical of the way in which the matter had been handled.

It is becoming fashionable this week to criticise bodies that have been set up to conduct inquiries into Scottish affairs. If some hon. Members do not like the decision of a body, whether it is the parliamentary commission or the Select Committee on Scottish Affairs, they attempt to have the matter retried. They do not seem to care about the merits of the case and whether they have been examined properly and fully by a parliamentary commission, as in this instance, or by the Select Committee on Scottish Affairs.

I draw your attention to this, Mr. Deputy Speaker, because the hon. Member for Falkirk, East drew attention to the link between Gartcosh and Grangemouth and the effect that any improvements at Peterhead may or may not have. There is no doubt that that was his clever way—he is good at it and he does it fairly well—of bringing in a topical argument. He and I both know that a parliamentary commission is set up in the knowledge that it is not a high court but an endeavour to find some kind of parliamentary view and the facts.

We may not like what the parliamentary commission has done in this matter. It is true that the chairman of the parliamentary commission was one of the hon. Gentleman's noble friends. One can presume that the hon. Gentleman was unhappy with his noble friend. I imagine that he is equally unhappy with the Chairman of the Scottish Affairs Select Committee.

The need to improve the harbour facilities to make the harbour safer for those who presently use it would, I imagine, obtain support from all corners of the House. There seems to be substantive evidence that there are too many boats alongside each other, certainly at weekends, at times when the tidal and wave conditions present a real hazard in the harbour.

Here we have a harbour that is efficient and profitable, making profits of about £1 million a year. That profitable harbour wishes to expand. It is incredible that any Conservative should object to that. We spend so much time in the House considering how we can help the lame ducks of the world and improve their lot, and all too often we do not invest in success. Here is a successful harbour which, by all accounts, is the premier white fish harbour in the United Kingdom. The figures appear to confirm that. There is some common ground in this matter.

Although people may say that there are alternatives, they may not give the trustees the harbour that they want to take them into the next century. An investment of this magnitude is not for this year or next year, but for many decades ahead. It is only right that the trustees should consider changes that may occur, and the ships, directly or indirectly related to fishing, that may wish to use the harbour.

People may say that a berth that will take 10,000 tonnes is not necessary. I do not know about that because I am not a professional seaman. Yet if some years ago someone had said to me that the Queen Mary and the Queen Elizabeth would not be plying the high seas today, I would have thought that they were talking nonsense. Those ships appeared to be the last word in seafaring. Who can say which ships will be directly or indirectly connected with fishing in the future?

There have been remarkable changes in the fishing industry. For example, off the west coast ports substantial Soviet vessels are carrying out various activities — I think that "factory ships" is the term used to describe them. I believe that the trustees have been responsible and prudent. I understand that originally they put forward proposals for a roll-on/roll-off facility, but then withdraw it. That does not surprise me because Dundee recently introduced such a facility which, I understand, is not—at this stage—obtaining the business for which it had hoped. Therefore, it would be unnecessary to include that facility at Peterhead——

Mr. Malone: I must put the record straight. The parliamentary commission amended the scheme to remove that facility. It was not removed at the request of the trustees. That puts a wholly different complexion on the matter.

Mr. Walker: I was fishing, and the fish rose to the bait. All that we hear is criticism of the commission. I wanted someone to say something good about it—so I am delighted that it has come from a hostile source.

We are trying to get at the facts, not opinions and views. The fact is that the commission is much maligned. It has no friends. I am doing my best to be friendly, so I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, South for his intervention. I know little about this sort of fishing, but I have experience of other sorts of fishing. I know that if I throw the right bait, a fish will often rise when it is not rising for other bait.

Why are there so many objections to the scheme? It cannot be that there are fears that the harbour will be used by oil supply ships. After all, they are using an adjacent bay. It cannot be because there are fears that Peterborough will steal the fishing business of Aberdeen. We know from what has been said this evening and on other occasions that Aberdeen's fishing business is now 10 per cent. of its total business. Why are we meeting so many problems?

It is surely significant that a neighbouring harbour, Fraserburgh, does not object to the proposals even though it has similar business interests. It is a busy port, not far from Peterhead. The fact that it did not object to the proposals must tell us something. It did not object because it thought that it was a sensible scheme for the busiest port in Scotland.

The fishermen know something about risks and about the way in which they must invest for the future. They are looking to the trustees to provide them with safe harbour facilities. I mean not simply somewhere to put their boats, but all the necessary facilities of the quayside and all the necessary modern equipment that will meet the needs of a modern fishing fleet for the next 10, 20, 30 and 40 years. The proposals can only be beneficial.

Because Peterhead harbour is not part of the dock labour scheme, it is possible that it is looked on unkindly in certain quarters. As a Conservative, that does not worry me because I know that often the places that are not run in a manner that calls for any state supervision or that are not run in a way that suits out-of-date doctrine, are much better at doing the job. There are examples of that along the east coast. If Peterhead is to become an even greater success story than it is, I for one believe that this House should clearly say that the Bill commands our support on the merits of the case.

I do not ask the House to support the Bill on the basis of opinion. I do not suggest that it supports the Bill because the trustees will consult the regional authority about roads and so on. Everyone knows that, at the end of the day, the scheme must obtain planning permission, and regional authority support must be given for road networks. There is nothing odd about that—it happens with almost every project. Even the great design schemes of the Scottish Development Agency and other bodies require the co-operation, help——

Mr. Ewing: Not the enterprise zones.

Mr. Walker: I was very careful not to mention enterprise zones. I know something about the enterprise zone in Dundee. I shall not rise to the hon. Gentleman's bait—he cannot land me with that.

I accept that planning permission is not always required, and in some areas planning permission is simply a courtesy. Even if it is not granted, the scheme will still go ahead. However, Peterhead does not fall into that category. A proposal is being brought forward in the normal way, under the procedures by which we make changes to harbours. Even if the House agrees to the proposal, which I hope it does, the local authorities must be consulted to ensure that the scheme is in accordance with what they wish. I have no reason to think that Grampian regional authority is any different from Tayside, with which I deal and which is always helpful towards private enterprise schemes.

There have been suggestions that Peterhead is wrong to seek to engage in anything other than fishing activities. However, Peterhead has already become an important port for the export of grain and other bulk cargoes. Why should it not export those goods if it is the port that customers want to use? That is the important point. There is another small port on the east coast of Scotland, at Perth, which is no longer in my constituency. That port is also interesting. It was developed against the trend because it is well up river, but customers wanted to make use of it.

Mr. McQuarrie: Does my hon. Friend agree that the main reason why Peterhead has expanded its grain trade is that the people in the hinterland find it the most accessible port, and that they are saved the 35-mile journey to Aberdeen port if they can go to Peterhead or Fraserburgh, which is the adjoining port in my constituency?

Mr. Walker: My hon. Friend and I would not argue about choice, and customers being able to choose which port they want to use.

In any other area, if a successful organisation has generated capital and wishes to invest it and expand, there would normally be crowds of people demanding that we allow it. In Scotland, we want firms that provide employment and create export opportunities. If any firm came to the House and said, "We are not looking for public money. We generate profits and from them we can find the necessary finance to go ahead with our programme," I would be surprised if many hon. Members spoke against it.

[Mr. Walker]

What, then, makes harbours different? Historically, we have dealt with harbours differently from other industrial areas. The hon. Member for Falkirk, East shakes his head, but I cannot think of many instances where the House considers legislation of this sort.

Mr. Ewing: I was trying to restrain myself from interrupting the hon. Gentleman. In this case, the difference is that the Peterhead trustees want to develop an area which they do not own. We do not need to deal with other harbour extensions, improvements or expansions in this way in any other part of Scotland, because the port authorities own the area that they wish to develop. The hon. Gentleman is missing the major point that the Peterhead trustees want to develop an area which they do not own.

Mr. Walker: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that helpful intervention which spells out the matter clearly. However, I hope that he will agree that I was saying that harbours have been treated differently historically, and that we are considering a successful operation which wants to expand into an adjacent area. There is nothing wrong with that. Airports do it all the time and railway stations have done it. There are precedents, although not in recent times. At one time special legislation was needed to deal with railway stations and lines.

Similarly, we are considering a successful harbour run by trustees who wish to provide a better service for those in the hinterland, and to invest in facilities in the quayside that will provide modern grain-loading equipment of the highest order. The harbour board sees wooden-hulled and steel-hulled vessels siting along the quay wall in conditions that create hazards for the hulls, particularly wooden hulls. One does not have to be clever to realise that in some conditions hulls become vulnerable, and that that is not wise because harbours are supposed to be places of safety.

If one links that with the bulk and the grain facilities, it is clear that the harbour board's proposals, which have been examined by the parliamentary commissioners, are realistic and should be accepted. They will get rid of the congestion at present in the harbour, will provide better loading facilities, and will generally make the harbour better for the customers—the fishing vessel owners who want to use Peterhead harbour. I hope that the House will view the matter on its merits, and not from a narrow constituency point of view because that is not in the best interests of private interests or customers.

8.54 pm

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): As I represent an area between Aberdeen and Peterhead, I have constituents who work at both ports and I have people interested in both harbours. My remarks seek to secure the best balanced development of the ports in north-east Scotland. I do not wish to see any port seriously held back from development.

At this stage, there is sufficient cause for anxiety to warrant a reference to a Joint Committee of both Houses of Parliament. Indeed, a letter from the British Ports Association to my hon. Friend the Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Ross) makes the point succinctly. It states:

"The British Ports Association do not wish to express any views about the merits of this Bill or the issues raised in the enclosed statement" from the Aberdeen Harbour Board.

"They do, however, suggest that it is most unfortunate that a responsible harbour authority should feel so strongly that the arguments against the development proposed in the Peterhead Harbours (South Bay Development) Order have not received a fair hearing. For that reason, we would ask you to consider whether it would not be expedient for the Aberdeen Harbour Board's petition to be referred to a joint committee of both Houses of Parliament so that this difficult matter can be looked at again."

That is the view of most hon. Members who have spoken in the debate. Clearly, there is a serious point at issue which must be resolved.

The simple statement of the entrenched position of the extremes of either side will not bring the matter forward. A fair and reasonable assessment that there is a genuine difficulty must be made. The detailed submission from the Aberdeen Harbour Board does not merely take issue with points of fact, but shows an element of bitterness, which the House would wish to address properly. In one or two areas, the board feels that it has legitimate grievances which have not been fully dealt with.

Much has been made of the cost. An investment in excess of £13 million is no little sum, especially if that sum is merely to achieve the creation of a safe, less crowded harbour for fishing boats. No one will deny that investment is needed to secure safety and more space, but £13 million-plus is a great deal of money simply for that.

There are two ways to repay that investment. The first, on which the hon. Member for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Hughes) has already touched, is that the users of the ports and the trustees will have to raise money to repay capital. Two obvious ways can be used. One is to ensure that the greater efficiency in the fishing harbour results in the generation of more revenue from fishing. It is probably asking a lot to think that that will be enough to fulfil the whole cost. What is more, there is concern that the fishing boat owners will find that their costs rise significantly to pay off the costs of the capital.

Much more likely is that the Peterhead harbour authority, having got excellent facilities with a wide range of versatile and alternative uses, will go out to get in extra traffic to generate the extra revenue. The hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. McQuarrie) has rightly pointed out the success of Peterhead harbour in attracting other traffic. I am pleased to see that success and if I were persuaded that this scale of development is needed to enable the essential and normal development of the harbour, I might accept it.

However, a compromise has been proposed that will meet all the potential expansion needs of the growing traffic through Peterhead without creating a major new harbour on the east coast that will be in competition immediately not only with Fraserburgh and Aberdeen but with Montrose, Dundee and the Forth ports. It is worth reiterating what the EEC's findings were. The official journal for 31 January said that the port facilities in north-east Scotland already have surplus capacity and utilisation of the existing facilities is only around 50 per cent. It clearly points to one port going ahead only at another's expense, and it questions the contribution of new port projects to the region as a whole.

A question has to be asked and answered. The hon. Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) will no doubt have a positive answer. The question is where, if the expanded Peterhead harbour goes for new business, it will come from. If it is to come from new business that is not available to the existing ports, a closer investigation would wish to consider that. If, on the other hand, it simply draws it away from the other ports in the area, a major investment that does not create new employment or benefit has been made.

Mr. McQuarrie: If the hon. Gentleman is trying to make the case that the EEC has decided that there should be no further increase in facilities at ports in the north-east of Scotland, can he relate that to Mr. Turner's evidence to the commission that, for the next 10 years, Aberdeen harbour will spend millions of pounds in developing its facilities?

Mr. Bruce: There are two distinct points. I was quoting the EEC, but what is happening in Aberdeen harbour—I recently visited and toured both harbours—is investment in improving existing quays, clearing buildings, putting in better facilities and reorganising existing facilities to meet modern needs and technologies. The two things are mutually exclusive. I make it clear that I am not suggesting that there is no case for anything to happen at Peterhead harbour and that it should not be allowed to make investment to improve its facilities. Every hon. Member who has spoken recognised that Peterhead is ready to expand in that way. There is a difference in scale, timing and implication of these proposals.

The hon. Member for Tayside, North alluded only briefly to the existence of the dock labour scheme. This is not the time or place to discuss the scheme at any great length. However, the hon. Member said that the development should be encouraged on the ground that it creates competition. Whether or not we like it, the dock labour scheme is a restraint on competition. It matters not what a person's political views are—we have to accept that the basis of the dock labour scheme was to guarantee dockers work, and that ensures that the scheme ports have a cost. If the scheme exists, we have to accept that it is the basis of operation. Nothing will be done about it, but both the commissioners and the House should take notice of it.

Mr. Ewing: It is important to put on record the purpose of the national dock labour scheme. It was introduced in 1944 to replace the old casual labour scheme whereby men went to the docks in the morning and were sent back up the road with no work within half an hour. The scheme does not exclude competition—far from it, it guarantees the men a day's work and wage and replaces the casual labour scheme under which they had no such guarantee.

Mr. Bruce: I am grateful to the hon. Member for Falkirk, East (Mr. Ewing) but, as I said earlier, I do not think that this is the time to develop that point. However, I accept his contribution for the record. My point is that a port scheme port has a different basis of operation than a non-port scheme port. Given that a parliamentary commission is investigating the developments in a non-scheme port, it is legitimate to recognise its impact on other ports that are not operated on the same basis. I want the ports in the area to be developed, but the development of one port at the expense of another needs to be examined closely.

The Aberdeen harbour board's submission points to the extent to which it feels that its case has not been given a fair hearing and to the fact that its arguments have not been fully developed. The hon. Member for Banff and Buchan was somewhat dismissive of the Aberdeen harbour board's compromise proposals. I do not presume to comment in detail on their merits, nor am I qualified to do so. However, I take seriously the submissions of a body that has been involved in port engineering for more than 40 years and that puts forward a scheme as a serious, constructive alternative. Such a scheme is worthy of consideration and it was put forward, I know, in good faith.

It would not be wrong to say that the Aberdeen harbour board would prefer Peterhead to do nothing at all; it would prefer no development to take place at Peterhead. That is not my view and I do not believe that it is the view of most hon. Members who are taking part in the debate. However, the board recognised that that view was unlikely to carry very much weight. It was too introspective and too self-interested. Therefore, it recognised from the outset that at best it would need to secure a compromise. However, it feels that the Peterhead harbour commissioners have not been willing to respond to its compromise proposals.

It states that the promoters have put forward a scheme which, if it were fully utilised, would allow them to compete with Aberdeen in all the major areas of port activity in which Aberdeen is concerned, not just in those areas where there is a small overlap. For example, it pointed out that one part of the new scheme could be used as an oilfield supply base. My understanding is that the Peterhead harbour trustees have said that that is true but that they would be prepared to give an honourable undertaking not to use it as an oilfield supply base.

There are two problems. If my earlier point about the financial pressure on Peterhead turned out to be true and the expansion of the North sea activities that is hoped for in the future were to continue, the temptation might become too strong and, if it were there and had the potential, the facility would be used. The Aberdeen harbour board said that a binding agreement that the facility would not be used would be acceptable to it, if it underpinned the gentleman's agreement that the Peterhead harbour trustees were prepared to give. However, it was unable to secure a binding agreement. Therefore it is left with a nagging concern that at some stage or another the entrance to the inner harbour at Peterhead will be used as another supply base. Peterhead is a major competitor of Aberdeen as an oil field supply base. Indeed, the south side of the Peterhead Bay of Refuge is probably the best oilfield supply base in the country, as it was custom built. Therefore, this is a point of legitimate concern.

The point at issue on the specific compromise proposals is that the harbour board feels that the proposals have been dismissed. I said earlier that the Aberdeen harbour board would probably prefer the Bill to be stopped altogether. During the next few minutes the hon. Member for Aberdeen, South (Mr. Malone) will have to consider on behalf of his constituents whether he wants the Bill to be killed or whether he wants a compromise to be secured. That is the danger he runs. It is important that he should seek to represent his constituents and to use his judgment and parliamentary skills in deciding how to secure the best outcome for his constituents.

The point that was made about the compromise proposal was that it was put forward by those who know something about harbours. They believe that it could meet all of the Peterhead harbour trustees' objectives. It would be considerably cheaper but it would not create a port that offered the same threat to the existence of other ports in the area as it is believed that the proposed development will pose. Although this scheme was discussed, it was never fully considered, and the chairman of the Peterhead trustees is on record as saying:

[Mr. Bruce]

"Peterhead Harbour Trustees have never considered these options, they have never been put in front of Peterhead Harbour Trustees."

That alone warrants a referral of the Bill to a Joint Committee of both Houses of Parliament, because that alternative needs to be looked at before we can be sure which is the right and fair scheme that should go ahead.

These proposals should not be viewed in terms of Aberdeen versus Peterhead. I would not be representing the interests of my constituents if I supported such a duel, because I have constituents who work at both ports. My wish and objective is to see two strong, healthy, expanding ports to the north and south of my constituency. To that extent I do not wish my remarks to be judged in terms of Aberdeen versus Peterhead.

The harbour board in Aberdeen is dearly anxious to secure a compromise. Most hon. Members who have spoken want to see a Joint Committee examining this matter. If the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan holds out for the whole Bill, he runs the serious risk of getting no Bill at all. That is also the risk that the trustees run. The hon. Gentleman should make his own judgments on behalf of his constituents and should recognise that there is good will for Peterhead harbour on all sides of the House. There is a desire for a fair and just outcome. I hope that he will take that on board and will support reference to a Joint Committee.

9.12 pm

Mr. Gerald Malone (Aberdeen, South): It is worth considering referral to a Joint Committee of both Houses. I should put it clearly on the record that, although I have a close constituency interest in this matter, no campaign is being waged either by myself or the Aberdeen harbour board to kill the Bill. Indeed, the Aberdeen harbour board has always been prepared to talk about compromises and it has put forward an alternative scheme.

The sad truth has been that for their own reasons, and perhaps acting on their own best advice, the Peterhead harbour board trustees have decided not even to talk. My hon. Friend the Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. McQuarrie) should bear in mind that this compromise has been offered and that it could best be discussed in a Joint Committee of both Houses.

On an occasion such as this, when there is such an overwhelming expression of the views of hon. Members, and when this is perhaps the best device by which to settle the issues between the parties, it would be unfortunate if that avenue of approach were not accepted by my hon. Friend.

Opposition Members are right to say that this matter broadly lies in the hands of my hon. Friend the Member for Banff and Buchan. If he is unable to tell me that he would like to adopt that line of approach, I would accept that because it is not my wish that the Bill should not get a Second Reading. However, Opposition Members will be only too well aware that the procedures of the House are such that one is perhaps obliged to adopt a line of approach that is not ideal in all the circumstances.

I repeat to my hon. Friend the Member for Banff and Buchan that the matter is in his hands and nobody else's. He has to represent not only one section of the community in his constituency; he ably and vociferously represents all points of view. However, some expressions of opinion in his constituency have not been in favour of the scheme.

There has been much disquiet about the way in which the parliamentary commission conducted its proceedings. When worries have been expressed on the Floor of the House, publicly and in the media it is important and proper that the House should consider the substance of those complaints and should consider the request for a referral to a Joint Committee. I do not suggest that, because we have to search far back into history for one example of a referral and to last week for another, we should simply say that the procedure should not be brought into play or that the practice has fallen into desuetude. Perhaps it is a shame that it has not been used more often to consider matters of this kind. There is genuine disquiet about the way in which the parliamentary commission conducted its affairs and that disquiet centres on several points.

Some of the implications of the inquiry's report were a little strange, as were the imputations cast on some of the evidence. One point that has not been raised in any detail is safety, which was considered by the commission. Important evidence on behalf of the Department of Transport was given by Captain Fellingham. I do not understand Lord Hughes' statement when he says:

"We took into account the report of the Department of Transport and the statement of Captain Fellingham which unlike the evidence of other witnesses was neither made on oath nor subject to cross-examination."

That would appear to impugn the captain's evidence. However, what is not explained is that that is the normal procedure when departmental representatives give evidence to parliamentary commissions. Some aspersion has been cast on the fact that Captain Fellingham properly did not submit himself to examination and properly did not go on oath. If there was an impugnment of his evidence, and there would appear to have been so if one reads the statement of the noble Lord, we are right to consider whether that coloured the commissioners' judgment when they reached their conclusions. I suggest that it should not have done so.

Opposition Members have already mentioned the tour of Peterhead harbour by members of the commission and the fact that there was no opportunity for others to cross-examine on that evidence and no other representatives were present. It is odd that a parliamentary commission seeking to take evidence and to be independent should proceed in that way. A procedure that is akin to the tour of Peterhead harbour and is common practice in court proceedings in Scotland is known as a view. Some hon. Members will be familiar with that procedure. If the sheriff or those trying the case decide that it is important to examine the locus, all parties traipse off to the view. They go to see what the facts are on the ground or, as in this case, in the water.

In that judicial process, all parties and their representatives must be present. If that criterion is considered essential by the courts, a similar procedure should have been seriously considered by the commissioners. Perhaps they did not take a completely independent line when considering one of the most important pieces of evidence.

Mr. McQuarrie: I am sure that my hon. Friend does not wish to mislead the House. He said that objectors and their counsel were not allowed to take part in the tour by the Commission. In fact, all the objectors and their counsel took part in the tour of the area of the proposed works.

Mr. Malone: I must disagree with my hon. Friend; that is not my information. We must judge the sources of the information put to the House, but representatives of Aberdeen harbour have made the point vigorously to me and it seems to have been made vigorously to Opposition Members. My hon. Friend did not challenge the point when it was made by, I think, the hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. Wilson) and it is odd that he should choose to challenge it now.

My hon. Friend has an opportunity to concur with the will of the House, which is to have the matter investigated further. I do not intend to kill the Bill, but my hon. Friend must know the procedural risks that he is running. He would not be happy if he had to say that the Bill had been lost. I concede that the Peterhead harbour trustees are perhaps entitled to their legislation in an amended form and I should be sorry to see the opportunity lost.

The Court of Auditors of the European Commission reported in 1984 on the investment of about £15 million of European funds in port facilities throughout Scotland, and particularly in the north-east, over the previous 10 years. In its report to the Commission, the court said that port facilities in the north-east of Scotland were 50 per cent. under-used. The Commission had been investing not in port facilities that were necessary to cope with existing traffic or in port facilities that might be needed in the foreseeable future, but in port facilities which were substantially redundant. That fact is abundantly clear.

Not only European funds have been invested in ports in the north-east of Scotland. A substantial number of harbours in the area are maintained and supported by Grampian regional council, to the tune of £400,000 a year. In examining the economic case put by the promoters, we have to consider whether the facilities already provided in the north-east, substantially by public funds, will be used even less than they are at present.

I take up the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker). If the Peterhead harbour trustees decide that they will spend this money and put forward this proposal, good luck to them. The trustees say, "Of course, it is our money. There will be no further call on public funds."

I draw the attention of the House to the history of this matter, because we need to go beyond the past six or seven months to note the intent of the Peterhead harbour trustees. When the proposals were initially considered, the Peterhead harbour trustees wanted a substantial injection of public cash to make the project possible. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Banff and Buchan will not mind if I refer again to that well-known national organ, that most worthy paper, that accurate reporter of local matters in the constituency of my hon. Friend, the Buchan Observer, which has been quoted so lavishly with great success. An article on 11 September 1984 stated:

"Aid refusal angers harbour board".

Of course the Peterhead harbour board trustees were not looking in September 1984 to fund the project from private funds — they were looking for public funds of £12 million, which they were not given by the Scottish Office. That was right. Mr. Buchan, the chairman of the Peterhead harbour board, reacted by saying:

"No way can we accept this without kicking up a helluva row about it."

I am surprised that the board was not relying on private funding then and I suspect that it is not relying on the prospect of private funding now.

Mr. Bill Walker: Surely my hon. Friend must write this down as a success for the Conservative Government. Is this not what we have been trying to do for so long—stop people bleeding the public purse? Yet my hon. Friend is complaining!

Mr. Malone: I am certainly not complaining about that. I believe that, if the scheme is approved, we shall not have heard the last of the claims on the public purse for support. I think that my hon. Friend the Member for Tayside, North would agree that, if these funds were required in September 1984, they may inevitably be required again. I hope that my hon. Friend, who seems to know so much about this matter, will bear in mind the fact that the first time the Peterhead harbour board trustees called for a detailed economic analysis to be made public on this matter was April 1985 when a Coopers and Lybrand report was prepared and submitted in evidence. It is odd that a scheme that has been more than a gleam in the trustees' eyes for a substantial period should suddenly be subjected to a form of economic analysis.

Mr. McQuarrie: I am sure that my hon. Friend would not want to give the wrong impression about the Coopers and Lybrand report. I am sure that he will accept that the Peterhead harbour trustees were obliged to obtain a report from Coopers and Lybrand because the public inquiry had not been presented with anything on the subject of development.

Mr. Malone: The trustees were required to obtain a report because, until then, they had no idea of their economic case, except that they were looking for grants of £12 million from public funds. The Coopers and Lybrand report, which is a rather strange and scanty document containing many highly conditional conclusions and an economic analysis that is highly conditional with respect to much of the revenue that the trustees say will accrue if the changes are successful, is a little unlikely to prove true. It gives the game away, because, no matter how much my hon. Friend the Member for Banff and Buchan may say that the primary purpose of the development at Peterhead harbour is to improve the lot of fishermen, increase the safety of the fishing vessels and provide them with a safer harbour, if he reads the report he will find in one of the appendices of the economic analysis that the trustees are counting on increased revenue from cargoes brought into Peterhead harbour to fund the scheme if it were to be granted. It may have been represented to my hon. Friend that the main interest was to improve the lot of the fishing fleet. Of course, Peterhead harbour will look for more business beyond what it says is the purpose of the scheme—it will not look just for increased cargoes.

A gentleman's agreement was offered by Aberdeen harbour board when Mr. Turner gave evidence to the parliamentary commission. He said that he would be perfectly happy to accept an undertaking that there will be no increase in oil-related activities in Peterhead harbour. The commissioners decided to ignore that and hoped that Mr. Turner and the Aberdeen harbour board trustees would simply rely on the gentlemen's agreement. The Coopers and Lybrand report suggests that the Peterhead harbour board trustees are looking to go further than they say they intend, and I also say to my hon. Friend the Member for Banff and Buchan that in the circumstances it is difficult for Aberdeen harbour board trustees to attach tremendous credibility to any statement that the Peterhead harbour board trustees may make about the credibility of relying on a so-called gentlemen's agreement.

[Mr. Malone]

Mr. Donald Stewart (Western Isles): In fairness to the trustees, surely the hon. Gentleman does not think that any harbour board would construct a harbour and confine it to fishing vessels. Obviously, it will go out of its way to make it as viable as possible. Whatever the arguments against the board may be, surely it cannot be faulted on those grounds.

Mr. Malone: I am sure the right hon. Gentleman will understand that I accept that, if the proposal goes through, the board will use all its facilities as much as it can. The board is saying that that is not so. That is the point that I am trying to make.

What the board is seeking in the Bill goes way beyond any reasonable assumption of what it might require. I was interested to note that it has decided to seek a power to dredge in excess of 1·5 m more than it was seeking when the case was put before the parliamentary commissioners. We have to look carefully at the proposal. In Peterhead harbour it would be possible to berth the largest vessels if the power that the board is seeking in the Bill were exercised. There is no need for that. The board goes beyond its stated aim, and that is one more fact that suggests that it does not intend to stick to its declared intentions.

When the right hon. Member for Western Isles (Mr. Stewart) intervened, I was about to refer to the goodwill of Aberdeen harbour board. On its behalf, I must rebut the suggestion that has been made in the House that it has been intransigent and has not been prepared to listen, and put forward an alternative scheme in the most casual manner. An article in The Press and Journal and a small sketch were referred to my hon. Friend the Member for Banff and Buchan. I say this with no malice to him, but I should like him to hear it. Aberdeen harbour board put forward the suggestion, in detail, to its counterparts in Peterhead, or at least it attempted to do so, and met with a rebuff. When I intervened in my hon. Friend's speech, I said that it was my impression that a meeting had taken place with Mr. Turner of the Aberdeen harbour board——

Mr. McQuarrie rose in his place and claimed to move, That the question be now put.

Question put, That the Question be now put:—

The House divided: Ayes 119, Noes 53.

Division No. 27] [9.35 pm

AYES

Alexander, Richard
Alton, David
Amess, David
Ancram, Michael
Aspinwall, Jack
Atkins, Rt Hon Sir H.
Atkinson, David (B'm'th E)
Baker, Nicholas (Dorset N)
Blackburn, John
Body, Richard
Bottomley, Peter
Bowden, A. (Brighton K'to'n)
Bowden, Gerald (Dulwich)
Brandon-Bravo, Martin
Brooke, Hon Peter
Bruce, Malcolm
Bruinvels, Peter
Bryan, Sir Paul
Buchanan-Smith, Rt Hon A.
Buck, Sir Antony
Butler, Rt Hon Adam
Butterfill, John
Carlile, Alexander (Montg'y)
Carttiss, Michael
Cash, William
Clark, Sir W. (Croydon S)
Conway, Derek
Coombs, Simon
Cope, John
Corrie, John
Crouch, David
Currie, Mrs Edwina
Dicks, Terry
Dorrell, Stephen
Douglas-Hamilton, Lord J.
Durant, Tony
Evennett, David
Eyre, Sir Reginald
Fenner, Mrs Peggy
Fookes, Miss Janet
Fox, Marcus
Fraser, Peter (Angus East)
Freeman, Roger
Freud, Clement
Garel-Jones, Tristan
Gower, Sir Raymond
Greenway, Harry
Griffiths, Peter (Portsm'th N)
Ground, Patrick
Hamilton, Hon A. (Epsom)
Hamilton, James (M'well N)
Hamilton, Neil (Tatton)
Hancock, Mr. Michael
Harris, David
Heathcoat-Amory, David
Hickmet, Richard
Hind, Kenneth
Hirst, Michael
Holland, Sir Philip (Gedling)
Howells, Geraint
Hubbard-Miles, Peter
Hunt, David (Wirral)
Hunter, Andrew
Hurd, Rt Hon Douglas
Jackson, Robert
Jessel, Toby
Jones, Gwilym (Cardiff N)
Kellett-Bowman, Mrs Elaine
Kennedy, Charles
Kirkwood, Archy
Knight, Greg (Derby N)
Knox, David
Lambie, David
Lang, Ian
Latham, Michael
Lawrence, Ivan
Lennox-Boyd, Hon Mark
Lloyd, Peter, (Fareham)
Lord, Michael
McCrindle, Robert
McCurley, Mrs Anna
MacKay, John (Argyll & Bute)
Maclean, David John
McNair-Wilson, M. (N'bury)
Malins, Humfrey
Marlow, Antony
Marshall, Michael (Arundel)
Maxwell-Hyslop, Robin
Mayhew, Sir Patrick
Monro, Sir Hector
Moynihan, Hon C.
Murphy, Christopher
Neale, Gerrard
Newton, Tony
Normanton, Tom
Oppenheim, Phillip
Page, Sir John (Harrow W)
Page, Richard (Herts SW)
Patten, Christopher (Bath)
Pawsey, James
Portillo, Michael
Price, Sir David
Rifkind, Malcolm
Roe, Mrs Marion
Skeet, T. H. H.
Stanbrook, Ivor
Stewart, Rt Hon D. (W Isles)
Thurnham, Peter
Waddington, David
Wainwright, R.
Wallace, James
Waller, Gary
Warren, Kenneth
Wells, Sir John (Maidstone)
Wilson, Gordon
Winterton, Nicholas
Wood, Timothy

Tellers for the Ayes:
Mr. Albert McQuarrie and
Mr. Bill Walker.

NOES

Barnett, Guy
Beckett, Mrs Margaret
Bennett, A. (Dent'n & Red'sh)
Bermingham, Gerald
Boyes, Roland
Brown, Gordon (D'f'mline E)
Caborn, Richard
Callaghan, Jim (Heyw'd & M)
Campbell-Savours, Dale
Clark, Dr David (S Shields)
Clelland, David Gordon
Clwyd, Mrs Ann
Cook, Robin F. (Livingston)
Corbyn, Jeremy
Cunliffe, Lawrence
Dalyell, Tam
Davies, Ronald (Caerphilly)
Dixon, Donald
Eadie, Alex
Eastham, Ken
Evans, John (St. Helens N)
Ewing, Harry
Field, Frank (Birkenhead)
Fields, T. (L'pool Broad Gn)
Fisher, Mark
Foster, Derek
George, Bruce
Hardy, Peter
Haynes, Frank
Home Robertson, John
Hughes, Sean (Knowsley S)
John, Brynmor
Lamond, James
Lloyd, Tony (Stretford)
McCartney, Hugh
McKay, Allen (Penistone)
McWilliam, John
Madden, Max
Marek, Dr John
Maxton, John
Maynard, Miss Joan
Michie, William

Morris, Rt Hon J. (Aberavon)
Patchett, Terry
Pike, Peter
Powell, Raymond (Ogmore)
Rogers, Allan
Short, Ms Clare (Ladywood)
Skinner, Dennis
Strang, Gavin
Thomas, Dr R. (Carmarthen)
Torney, Tom
Winnick, David

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Robert Hughes and Mr. Gerald Malone.

Question accordingly agreed to.

Question put accordingly and agreed to.

Bill read a Second time.

Question put:—That the Bill be referred to a Joint Committee of both Houses.

The House divided: Ayes 69, Noes 87.

Division No. 28] [9.50 pm

AYES

Alton, David
Barnett, Guy
Beckett, Mrs Margaret
Bennett, A. (Dent'n & Red'sh)
Bermingham, Gerald
Boyes, Roland
Brown, Gordon (D'f'rmline E)
Caborn, Richard
Callaghan, Jim (Heyw'd & M)
Campbell-Savours, Dale
Carlile, Alexander (Montg'y)
Clark, Dr David (S Shields)
Clelland, David Gordon
Clwyd, Mrs Ann
Cook, Robin F. (Livingston)
Corbyn, Jeremy
Cox, Thomas (Tooting)
Dalyell, Tam
Davies, Ronald (Caerphilly)
Deakins, Eric
Dixon, Donald
Douglas, Dick
Eadie, Alex
Eastham, Ken
Evans, John (St. Helens N)
Ewing, Harry
Field, Frank (Birkenhead)
Fields, T. (L'pool Broad Gn)
Fisher, Mark
Fraser, Peter (Angus East)
Freud, Clement
Garel-Jones, Tristan
George, Bruce
Hamilton, James (M'well N)
Hancock, Mr. Michael
Hanley, Jeremy
Hardy, Peter
Harrison, Rt Hon Walter
Hogg, N. (C'nauld & Kilsyth)
Home Robertson, John
Howells, Geraint
Hughes, Robert (Aberdeen N)
John, Brynmor
Kirkwood, Archy
Lamond, James
McCartney, Hugh
McDonald, Dr Oonagh
McKay, Allen (Penistone)
McWilliam, John
Madden, Max
Malone, Gerald
Marek, Dr John
Maxton, John
Maynard, Miss Joan
Michie, William
Miller, Dr M. S. (E Kilbride)
Morris, Rt Hon J. (Aberavon)
Patchett, Terry
Pike, Peter
Radice, Giles
Rogers, Allan
Short, Ms Clare (Ladywood)
Skinner, Dennis
Spearing, Nigel
Strang, Gavin
Thomas, Dr R. (Carmarthen)
Wainwright, R.
Wallace, James
Winnick, David

Tellers for the Ayes:
Mr. Gordon Wilson and
Mr. Malcolm Bruce.

NOES

Alexander, Richard
Amess, David
Arnold, Tom
Aspinwall, Jack
Atkins, Rt Hon Sir H.
Atkinson, David (B'm'th E)
Beaumont-Dark, Anthony
Blackburn, John
Body, Richard
Bowden, A. (Brighton K'to'n)
Bowden, Gerald (Dulwich)
Brandon-Bravo, Martin
Bruinvels, Peter
Bryan, Sir Paul
Buchanan-Smith, Rt Hon A.
Buck, Sir Antony
Butler, Rt Hon Adam
Butterfill, John
Carttiss, Michael
Cash, William
Clark, Sir W. (Croydon S)
Conway, Derek
Coombs, Simon
Corrie, John
Crouch, David
Currie, Mrs Edwina
Dicks, Terry
Dorrell, Stephen
Douglas-Hamilton, Lord J.
Evennett, David
Eyre, Sir Reginald
Favell, Anthony
Fookes, Miss Janet
Fox, Marcus
Freeman, Roger
Garel-Jones, Tristan
Gower, Sir Raymond
Greenway, Harry
Griffiths, Peter (Portsm'th N)
Hamilton, Neil (Tatton)
Hanley, Jeremy
Harris, David
Hickmet, Richard
Hind, Kenneth
Hirst, Michael
Hogg, Hon Douglas (Gr'th'm)
Holland, Sir Philip (Gedling)
Holt, Richard
Howell, Ralph (Norfolk, N)
Hunter, Andrew
Jessel, Toby
Jones, Gwilym (Cardiff N)
Kellett-Bowman, Mrs Elaine
Kennedy, Charles
Knight, Greg (Derby N)
Knox, David
Lambie, David
Latham, Michael
Lennox-Boyd, Hon Mark
Lord, Michael
McCurley, Mrs Anna
Maclean, David John
McNair-Wilson, M. (N'bury)
McQuarrie, Albert
Malins, Humfrey
Marshall, Michael (Arundel)
Maxwell-Hyslop, Robin
Mayhew, Sir Patrick
Monro, Sir Hector
Moynihan, Hon C.
Normanton, Tom
Oppenheim, Phillip
Page, Richard (Herts SW)
Pawsey, James
Powley, John
Price, Sir David
Rhodes James, Robert
Rifkind, Malcolm
Roe, Mrs Marion
Speed, Keith
Spencer, Derek
Stanbrook, Ivor
Stewart, Rt Hon D. (W Isles)
Thurnham, Peter
Waller, Gary
Warren, Kenneth
Winterton, Nicholas

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Bill Walker and
Mr. Christopher Murphy.

Question accordingly negatived.

To be further considered upon Wednesday 18 December.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, at this day's sitting, the Education (Amendment) Bill may be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour.—[Mr. Maude.]

Orders of the Day

Education (Amendment) Bill

Considered in Committee.

[MR. HAROLD WALKER in the Chair]

Clause 1

INCREASE OF LIMIT ON EXPENDITURE APPROVED FOR EDUCATION SUPPORT GRANT PURPOSES

10.2 pm

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett (Denton and Reddish): I beg to move amendment No. 1, in page 1, line 11, leave out '1 per cent.' and add '·75 per cent.'.

The Chairman: With this we shall discuss amendment No. 4, in page 1, line 11, at end add 'in 1986-87 and 0·5 per cent. thereafter'.

Mr. Bennett: At this time of night the Committee will not want to spend long on the measure. The Bill is difficult to amend. Our main complaint is that it is irrelevant to the needs of the education service.

The Government must come up with a solution to the problem of teachers' pay and morale. The Opposition's most bitter complaint is that the Government are being provocative by introducing the measure at this time.

Our amendment is intended to probe the Government about their proposals. Amendment No. 2, which has not been selected, would seek to leave out the words "1 per cent." and insert "1·5 per cent." We do not favour the insertion of "·75 per cent." rather than "1 per cent." or any other figure, but we want to probe the Government about their intentions.

I hope that the Government will take the opportunity to make it clear that they are looking for a solution to the teachers' dispute and are not further provoking them, thus making them angry and disillusioned. I hope that the Minister will assure us that the Government do not intend to be even more provocative by introducing merit money without the teachers' agreement. If he does that, he will further anger and disillusion the teachers. Before he goes much further with the idea of merit money, he should look carefully at the response that will come from parents who will want to know what compensation the Government will give to their sons or daughters, or to them as parents, if a child finds that in his passage through primary or secondary school he is not taught by any teacher who is receiving merit money.

The Chairman: Order. The hon. Gentleman is straying wide of the amendment.

Mr. Bennett: Yes, I accept that I am a little wide of the amendment, but I hope that the Government will tell us that they will not come forward with such unilateral measures. I had hoped that the Government would pursue an independent inquiry.

The first time that I was involved in industrial action was in the early 1960s when teachers questioned whether lunchtime supervision was compulsory.

Mr. J. F. Pawsey (Rugby and Kenilworth) rose——

Mr. Bennett: Let me develop my case a little further.

As a result of that action, it was clearly established that lunchtime supervision was voluntary. Ever since then, the first stage in the withdrawal of good will has been to question lunchtime supervision. I also accept that many teachers have sought to get rid of the necessity to volunteer to carry out any lunchtime supervision.

What happens at lunchtime should be examined much more thoroughly than is possible under the Bill. Given the amount of money to which the amendment refers, it is not clear whether the Government have thought that out. If teachers do supervision at lunchtime, almost the only payment is the possibility of a free school meal. Who qualifies for a free meal and what school activities should be carried out vary from one authority to another.

I also accept that since the 1960s more and more local authorities have employed people to do lunchtime supervision which usually covers supervision of the meal, the playground and around the school buildings. The only person who has a legal duty, other than the employed supervisors, for discipline and behaviour within the school is the head teacher and, to a certain extent, the deputy. Considerable resentment has been caused by the fact that since May nearly all lunchtime supervision has fallen on head teachers, their deputies and the paid supervisors, if the local authority employs such people.

The Government are now introducing a new proposal which would be welcomed by teachers' unions if it were being introduced during a period in which there was goodwill in schools when teachers were happy with their pay and conditions. In introducing it against a background of lack of co-operation from the teachers the Government will cause far more problems.

I think that everyone would agree that it is important that teachers have a proper break at lunchtime. Many people would say that during the past nine months teaching has improved because most teachers have had a proper break at lunchtime. It is important that teachers get half an hour or so at lunchtime, but in the good schools many school activities should be flourishing during the lunchtime. Schools with a long lunch break allow the teacher to have a break and also be involved in supervision. The Bill fails to address itself to the real problems of what is supervision and what is teaching during the lunchtime period.

The Government chose to put 1 per cent. in the clause and the amount of money that that represented, but they do not seem to have thought carefully about the difference between lunchtime teaching and supervision.

Is it the Government's intention that teachers, or anyone else, should be paid for carrying out educational duties at lunchtime? Examples of that are choir practice, preparation for school pantomime, various club activities, examination revision, sports practice and so on. If those educational activities are managed well, a large number of pupils will participate and therefore receive supervision during the lunch break.

If teachers are not paid for those educational duties, it is possible that they will not resume them when the dispute has ended. I hope that those activities will be resumed, but the authorities must state clearly the possible uses of the money provided for in the Bill, and the relationship between those looking after pupils and those carrying out educational duties.

Is it the Government's intention that teachers should be able to claim for carrying out those educational duties? If so, what is the position if those same duties are carried out not at lunchtime but, for example, after school? It would be a major anomaly if a teacher could claim payment for supervising a choir practice at lunchtime but not for supervising after school. The Government must make that clear; they must specify what they regard as being or not being lunchtime supervision.

Will there be a standard minimum rate of pay under the Bill, especially for lunchtime supervision carried out by people other than teachers? The position of the head teacher and deputy head teacher must also be made clear. Will the head teacher still be responsible at all times if supervisors are employed? To what degree can that responsibility be passed on to a deputy head teacher? If the head teacher and deputy head teacher are not on the school premises—and this applies especially in primary schools—can a teacher act for them, and if so, will he be paid?

I hope that the Government have seriously considered whether the money provided for in the Bill will be genuine new educational money. Are the Government hoping that, in practice, that money will be offset by, for example, savings in supplementary benefit through the employment of part-time or casual staff? I am not suggesting that it is not desirable that people receiving supplementary benefit should, instead, have a job that provides them with a wage. I merely suggest that if that is the case, the money provided for in the Bill will not be genuine new money.

Do the Government envisage older pupils being employed for supervisory duties, and especially the use of sixth-formers in primary schools? I am sure that the Government are aware that older pupils are encouraged to work in shops. If the Government's Sunday trading proposals become law, there will be even greater pressure for pupils to work at weekends. It might be more desirable that pupils be employed in their schools or in junior schools rather than in shops that might press them to work longer hours, to the detriment of their studies.

What will happen in the small number of schools that have adopted a continental or short stay? Can any of the money be used to pay those carrying out supervisory duties after school? Many parents, especially those with young children, will face problems if schools decide to close at 3 pm or earlier.

Finally, before the measure is implemented the Minister must get agreement between the teacher unions and the local authorities so that there is some uniformity of provision across the country. I hope that he will answer some of my questions when he justifies the need for 1 per cent.

10.15 pm

Mr. Clement Freud (Cambridgeshire, North-East): I share the sentiments of the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) that this is an irrelevant and bad Bill. My amendment is a probing amendment. To be specific in my opposition to the Bill, I shall give three good reasons for the two amendments tabled and selected.

The first relates to the general dissatisfaction at the further inroads into the autonomy of local education authorities. On Second Reading and throughout the passage of the original legislation it was made clear that the Opposition did not dislike the idea of the Secretary of State having powers to fund his pet projects. We disliked the fact that that money should come from LEA funding, which is already earmarked for specific purposes, and which further erodes the ability of an LEA to impose a modicum of regional excellence on its programme. For that reason alone, it seems desirable to restrict such encroachment. If the Secretary of State wants to have separate contracts for lunchtime supervisors, he should pay for it from Government money, not money already earmarked.

My second reason for tabling the amendment is the confusion that persists after Second Reading about the money that will be used for supervision. The Government have still not satisfactorily explained why they can both pay for lunchtime supervision from the increased education support grant, and knock £40 million of the £1·25 billion offered to the teachers. On Second Reading the Minister said that the money came from sums

"additional to our existing plans for educational spending."

I accept that the Government will pay for some of the supervision under the formula for ESG, but I do not accept that that means that £40 million should be clawed back from the £1·25 billion, because, as I understand it, that is the total to be spent and includes the LEA element. Will the Minister clarify that point?

Thirdly, there is a good case for applying the increase in ESG to the first full year only. The Secretary of State admits that there is spare money from the ESG this year, which is why he can pay for lunchtimes until April from the existing 0·5 per cent. He made that clear on Second Reading when he said:

"In 1985-86 there is sufficient headroom within the existing limit to pay grant on this new activity."—[Official Report, 5 December 1985; Vol. 88, c. 460-479.]

One wonders whether the same will be true in future or, at least, whether there will be some spare to render excessive the full 1 per cent.

When that fact is added to the claim that future years' payments will come from the 1·25 billion, we have justified cause for anxiety. Added to that financial question is the fact that to pass the Bill in its present form seems to anticipate failure on the part of local authorities.

We know that lunchtime supervision has been a bone of contention for a long time, but it seems dubious to pass a Bill when the negotiations are in abeyance and there is a possibility, albeit remote, of new machinery to deal with lunchtimes without this expedient.

The amendments matter because it is wrong to give a Secretary of State yet more control over local authorities for more and for longer than is absolutely necessary. It gives power in a way which gives more power than a good man should need or a bad man should have. For those reasons, I support the amendment.

Mr. Pawsey: I am puzzled as to why the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) should describe this measure as a provocation. We are merely giving teachers what they have been asking for for many years and I cannot see how that could be provoking. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will elaborate on that point at some time.

[Mr. Pawsey]

One of the great paradoxes of the educational scene is that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has introduced some measures to improve and——

The Chairman: Order. We are in Committee and are discussing a narrow amendment. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will address himself to it.

Mr. Pawsey: I shall do my utmost to stay within the rules of order.

My right hon. Friend has introduced many measures to improve the educational performance of schools and thereby improve the quality of education for our children. This measure is cast in the same mould that——

The Chairman: Order. If I allow the hon. Member to follow that line, I must allow other hon. Members to put arguments either in support or rebuttal of the Bill, and that we cannot have. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will confine himself to the amendment.

Mr. Pawsey: I shall take careful note of that. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] It would appear that there is less support for me on Conservative Benches than there usually is.

I was genuinely surprised that there was no warm welcome for the measure. It will generally assist education. I hope that I am not straying out of order, but it would seem that the Opposition are opposing the measure purely for opposition's sake and are not looking at the benefits——

The Chairman: Order. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will seek to catch my eye on Third Reading. His remarks would be more appropriate then than now.

Mr. Pawsey: I acknowledge the fact that the amount of funding available for the measure is admittedly small. Nevertheless, it would seem that it is adequate to cover its requirements and needs. As this point will no doubt be touched upon by my hon. Friend the Member for Bath (Mr. Patten) when he makes the Government's winding up speech, I shall rest my case on that note.

The Minister of State, Department of Education and Science (Mr. Chris Patten): It is difficult to follow that contribution, but I shall do my best.

I hope that it will not disappoint the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) too severely when I tell him that we do not find it possible to accept the amendments to this small but helpful Bill. I was constantly reminded, both on Second Reading and this evening, of how difficult it is to do good in this world, but we are, as hon. Gentlemen will know, putting right something that has been frightfully successful for a number of years, and we should be given some credit for doing so.

I do not want to traverse once again all the arguments with which we dealt on Second Reading. On that occasion, I dealt with the argument put by the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish about provocation and the other words that are generally regarded as synonymous with provocation, most of which he trotted out then and has trotted out since. Were I to do so, I should be repeating myself—[Interruption.] On the question of the dispute, perhaps I should once again make it clear, in case it is necessary, that the Government want an early, fair and lasting settlement to the dispute, which will ensure that we do not again get into appalling difficulties, and the resulting damage which we have seen all to frequently in the past decade or so.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: What will the hon. Gentleman do?

Mr. Patten: I should have thought that £1.25 billion is not chicken feed. That is on the table and would be regarded by most public sector unions as being the flexibility with which they could well do.

Mr. Bennett: If this is such a generous offer, why is it that the hon. Gentleman's charms have not persuaded the teachers to renegotiate?

Mr. Patten: It is not for me to comment on my charms. Perhaps none of us is perfect.

There has been some criticism both this evening and on Second Reading that we have not made available enough additional resources to provide for adequate and reliable supervision.

Amendment No. 1 would in due course reduce the additional expenditure which could be approved in England and Wales to about £28 million. In our view, that would not be adequate for the purpose. The increase that it would allow would not be sufficient to provide for the £40 million which we have said we are prepared to approve for education support grant purposes in the coming financial year. The effect of amendment No. 4 would be that we could approve expenditure on midday supervision for ESG support only until the end of the financial year 1986-87. I do not believe that to be desirable. I understand the attachment of the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish to the block grant as a hallmark of local democracy and local accountability. That raises much broader issues, with which I hope we shall have the opportunity to deal on future occasions.

Our intention, in offering the ESG for midday supervision, is to encourage authorities to develop new arrangements. In that sense, as we have said before, it is a pump priming activity. We expect that once the new arrangements are fully established they can be funded through the rate support grant in the same way as is most education expenditure by local authorities. I imagine that this will go some way towards satisfying the hon. Gentleman. However, at this stage we cannot be sure how long it will take. In primary legislation it would be wrong to impose a time limit of this kind.

The increase that we propose will provide for the approval of an additional expenditure of £55 million in England and Wales in 1986-87. There is therefore likely to be a small amount of headroom as a result of this increase. However, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science has given an undertaking —he did so during our Second Reading debate—that pending the outcome of the review of local government finance, an outcome to which we all look forward, approvals for activities other than midday supervision will not exceed the existing 0·5 per cent. limit in the 1984 Act. I am perfectly happy to repeat that undertaking to the Committee.

The hon. Gentleman asked whether we envisaged paying for extra curricula work whenever it takes place during the day. The answer to this question is, as he knows, in the negative. The overall work that is done by teachers must obviously be taken into account when determining their pay and considering their conditions of service. The sooner we deal with those things together the better.

When dealing with amendment No. 4 the hon. Gentleman referred to the relationship between the money that we are making available for lunchtime duties and the £1·25 billion. We have been accused of robbing teachers because the money for midday supervision will come from within the £1·25 billion that the Government have said that they are prepared to make available, if a suitable agreement upon teachers' duties and a salary structure can be reached. However, as has been said on almost more occasions than I care to recall, teachers have long argued for an end to the uncertainty over midday supervision. A resolution of this problem is bound to cost money. We made clear last August when we announced the £1·25 billion that it included a provision for new arrangements at midday. The remainder of the £1·25 billion continues to be available if the conditions for its release are met, but we are not prepared to give something for nothing. I ask the Committee to reject the amendments.

Mr. Bennett: I am disappointed by the Minister of State's reply. He has thrown no new light upon the difference between supervision and teaching during the lunchtime period. The Minister must address that central problem. He is saying that the payment can be made if either a teacher or somebody else who is specially employed for the purpose merely stops pupils from getting up to mischief. In other words, he wants to ensure that pupils eat in a civilised manner at lunchtime and that after they have had their lunch they are looked after in the school building or in the school playground. If, however, somebody finds something that is educationally useful for pupils to do at lunchtime, the Minister doubts whether the money can be used for that purpose. That is the central dilemma of this approach. While most educationalists want teachers to get a break so that they can be refreshed for their teaching in the afternoon, they would also accept, particularly in schools with a fairly lengthy lunch hour, that it is possible to have a break and to carry out a role at lunchtime that is both supervisory and educational.

It is logical that teachers who are carrying out both an educational and supervisory role ought to be paid some of this money for doing so. Until the Government can answer that central problem, the proposals in the Bill will run into difficulty. I do not believe that the amendment would usefully alter the Bill in any way, and I therefore beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 1 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 2

Exclusion of certain remuneration from Remuneration of Teachers Act 1965

10.30 pm

Mr. Mark Fisher (Stoke-on-Trent, Central): I beg to move amendment No. 11, in page 1, line 17, at end add—

'which shall only be paid after local education authorities have satisfied the Secretary of State that adequate additional training has been provided for supervisory staff'.

The Chairman: With this it will be convenient to discuss amendment No. 7, in page 1, line 17, at end add—

'(2) This section shall not have effect until national minimum standards on the level of supervisory staff have been established.'.

Mr. Fisher: These amendments seek to ensure that whoever undertakes lunchtime supervision in schools is properly trained and is working to national minimum standards of staffing.

The questions of training and staffing were both raised on Second Reading, but the Government gave no clear indication on either matter. Tonight they owe it to head teachers, teachers, parents, children and anyone who may undertake this work in the future to make their position clear and to give some answers, particularly on safety and discipline.

Safety and discipline are difficult enough for trained, qualified and experienced teachers, but for untrained people the problems they raise will cause grave difficulties for the quality and maintenance of standards in schools. The premise behind the amendments is that most of the staff undertaking this work are likely to be untrained. The National Association of Head Teachers has estimated that the sums involved will allow payments at the rate of approximately £2·75 an hour. Do the Minister's figures accord with that? If so, very few teachers will accept that payment, and it is highly likely that the staff undertaking this work will be untrained and working to levels of staffing that are not specified in the Bill.

The Minister's Department is ultimately responsible, along with local education authorities, for ensuring the safety of children in schools, through Her Majesty's Inspectorate, and the provision of trained, qualified staff to teach our children.

Schools are extremely hazardous places. They are full of complicated, dangerous and sometimes heavy equipment, as well as chemicals. Many modern schools are full of glass, and in the urban areas many of our older schools are full of railings. These are all potential sources of accidents, especially during the dinner hour. In addition to any playground accidents or accidents with equipment, particlarly PE equipment, there is always the danger of fire. Since the Education Act 1981 there is also the problem of dealing with children with special educational needs.

Will children with special educational needs in normal primary, comprehensive or high schools be suitably supervised at lunchtime by unqualified and untrained staff working to unspecified levels of staffing? Such staff may well be unfamiliar with the premises and the materials to be found on them. How will they cope? Many secondary schools are now very large. I represent an inner city constituency, yet a school that I visitd last week has 840 pupils. Although it is in the middle of Stoke-on-Trent, it has 13 acres of ground, and additional hazards arise from shops, roads and visits to the chippy. How will unspecified levels of staff, particularly untrained people who do not know these premises, be able to supervise lunchtime?

I mentioned earlier the problems of fire and children with special educational needs. The Minister will recall that a few weeks ago a special school at Fenton in Stoke-on-Trent burnt down. Fortunately, that was not during the dinner hour. If it had been, handicapped children would have had to be got out of the building by unqualified staff.

[Mr. Fisher]

Is the Minister prepared to make any special provision for special schools? I am sure that he agrees that he has a particular responsibility to children with special needs.

Accidents are more commonplace, but how will unqualified staff cope with simple breaks and lacerations? I was amazed to learn from the North Staffordshire health authority last week that more than 100 children are admitted to the hospital casualty department in Stoke-on-Trent every week of the school term with lacerations and breaks. We are not accident prone; I am told that those are typical figures. Many more children suffer breaks, cuts and lacerations during the lunch break, and an onerous responsibility is being placed on staff who, if the Bill is not amended, will be working with no training and with unspecified numbers.

Who will be responsible for taking children to hospital? Will it be the head? What will happen if the head is off the premises, as the Bill allows him to be? What will be the levels of staffing and training? To whom will staff be responsible if things go wrong? Will they be responsible to the board of governors, to the local education authority or to the head?

What training do the Government envisage? Who will pay for the training? Who will set the standards of training? Will the Department of Education and Science get involved? What level of staffing does the Minister think will be necessary to ensure the safety of children? Will there be minimum national standards of training and staffing, or will it be left to each local education authority, with the Government saying, "You sort it out. It is your responsibility"? That would not be fair. The Government are changing the law and providing the money. They should be responsible for ensuring that staff are trained and that there is an adequate level of staff to ensure the safety of our children.

The problems of safety are containable compared with the less tangible problems of discipline. I am sure that the Minister and other hon. Members will know that discipline is difficult, even in some primary schools, particularly in inner city areas. There is a narrow line between order and chaos, and between a good educational atmosphere and a shambles in the classroom or the playground. If the Minister had ever had to take charge of high-spirited teenagers, let alone more difficult and disturbed children, he would know that these are serious problems and that the skill of maintaining discipline is not easy to learn.

How will discipline work with untrained non-teaching staff? Will lunchtime supervisors have disciplinary powers? That question is not answered by the Bill. What synchronisation does the Minister envisage between the lunchtime supervisors and teachers and head teachers? Who will supervise the lunchtime supervisors? Who will ensure that there is continuity of discipline in school hours and at lunchtime?

What advice would the Minister offer to a dinner lady or lunchtime supervisor who is left in charge of a high school and is approached by a large 14-year-old lad who uses what can only be described as unparliamentary language to her? That is not a matter of jest, though it has made some Conservative Members smile. That would be an unfair and difficult situation for the supervisor. It would also be unfair to other pupils, and it would be detrimental to the standards of discipline in the school. What will a supervisor do if there are two outbreaks of disciplinary problems and there is not enough supervisory staff to cope? The Bill does not ensure that there will be sufficient supervisory staff with adequate skills — staff provided nationally—to make sure that discipline is maintained.

I am sure the Minister will not deny that a breakdown in discipline at dinner time will have an effect on the whole of afternoon education in the school and could affect the quality and atmosphere of education in the school more permanently. I am sure the Minister will agree also that discipline is a vital ingredient in education and in the ethos of a school. Untrained supervisory staff of variable numbers, with unspecified guidelines, could have considerable problems and could do considerable damage to the school, to pupils, to staff-pupil relationships, to education and to standards in schools, which, rightly, the Government say they are seeking to improve.

I fear that the Government have not thought about any of these problems. The Minister agreed on Second Reading that they have not consulted any of the teachers' unions. I understand that the Government sent a note to the National Association of Head Teachers, but they have not indulged in any consultation. They have not thought the Bill through. They have not thought through the difficulties that the Bill will raise of training, staffing, appointing staff, the accountability of staff, the liaison that the staff may have with teaching staff and the position of the head and deputy head in relation to the staff. They have not even defined the lunch hour. I do not know how they have made their calculations without defining what they mean by a lunch hour. The Minister will know that a lunch hour varies considerably from school to school and authority to authority.

None of these problems has been considered by the Minister or his Department. In answering the debate on the first amendment, the Minister suggested that everything was quite simple and that it was a thoroughly uncontroversial Bill. The amendments reflect the difficulties that lie behind the unconsidered parts of the Bill. Even now it is not too late for the Minister to recognise that there are difficulties with the Bill. He would be wise to recognise them and to accept the amendments. I am sure he will agree that the Government owe it to parents and teachers to ensure that standards are maintained and that the supervisory staff in a school are properly trained and sufficient in number. The Government should set the standards, because they are introducing the Bill. They should set an adequate standard of training, and they should pay for the staffing that is proposed and for the training of the staff, to ensure that the staff are competent and efficient. Failure to do that will put schools and the standards within them in jeopardy.

The amendments are extremely constructive and give the Government the chance to improve the Bill by addressing the serious problems of safety, discipline and the quality of supervisory staff in schools. I urge the Minister to accept them and to improve the Bill.

Mr. Freud: The amendments are another example of concern that was expressed on Second Reading. It seems reasonable that if LEAs are to have to bid for ESG moneys, which is how the system has worked in the past, they should know what the rules are by which their bids will be assessed in future. I suggest to the Minister that he has not thought about this nearly enough. We do not know what he feels about ratios or the role of teachers, if any.

We do not know why he has rejected the idea of a national agreement. In a parliamentary answer which I received today——

Mr. Chris Patten: I am struggling to follow the hon. Gentleman's arguments. A short while ago he was accusing the Government of being too centralist in their approach. He is now saying that we should not leave everything to local authorities. His arguments are confusing. On the one hand, he is saying that we are centralising too much, and on the other he is saying that we are depending too much on local education authorities.

Mr. Freud: My point was that the Minister had not thought. I received a reply today, containing a fair amount of waffle, to my question about ratios. It stated:

"the sum of £40 million is not based on any single staffing ratio or rate of pay but the Government are satisfied that it will suffice to provide reliable and adequate supervision in schools in England and Wales."

The Minister has had the brilliance to pluck a figure of £40 million out of the sky and say, "This is an adequate sum", without giving the rationale for what those ratios will be. I remind him of the success that the Secretary of State had when he plucked the figure of £1·25 million out of the sky and felt that it was adequate to settle the teachers' dispute.

10.45 pm

Mr. Chris Patten: I hope that the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central (Mr. Fisher) will not regard me as being too legalistic if I say that the effect of the amendments would be decidedly bizarre. As they would add words to the end of clause 2, if enacted they would mean that the remuneration paid under the Remuneration of Teachers Act 1965 — the salaries of teachers and lecturers — should be paid only if local education authorities had satisfied the Secretary of State that they were providing adequate training and standards for supervisory staff. I cannot believe that that is the Opposition's intention.

I shall address myself to what may be the Opposition's intention. I cannot go along with the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central. We do not accept that additional training should be a statutory requirement for supervisory staff, which amendment No. 11 implies. It will be open to local education authorities to offer teachers separate contracts to do this work. It cannot be right to require local education authorities to train experienced teachers in the supervision of the midday break. I am sure that local education authorities will be guided by the principle that new supervisory staff must be capable of performing their tasks — covering safety and first aid, as the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central said — and of discharging the authorities' duty of care to the pupils in their charge. No doubt, some recruits will need short courses of training for this purpose—a point that has been taken on board by the Manchester education authority and the Inner London education authority which were considering, independently of this legislation, introducing lunch-time supervision. Authorities have experience in the provision of courses for such staff on which they can build.

The Committee should leave this matter to the local education authorities, which were properly commended earlier by the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East (Mr. Freud). I take the point that local education authorities and the Government will need to pay particular attention to special schools and units. The Government do not propose to issue guidance on the ratios of supervisory staff to pupils, which I understand was the thinking behind amendment No. 7. Our concern is to assist local education authorities to put in hand supervision arrangements which provide for work to be done under separate contracts, secure effective supervision over the period of the midday break under the overall authority of the head teacher—this takes up a point made by the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent,. Central — and do not rely on voluntary participation of teachers. Provided that those objectives are met, we believe that staffing levels and the type of staff to be recruited are best left to local discretion.

Mr. Freud: Will the money be divided equally among LEAs on a per capita basis, or will those who can strike a bargain with their meal supervisors be punished?

Mr. Patten: We have set out in the draft circular which is in the Library the criteria on which we shall allocate funds. It is based on the number of children in an authority area and the number of schools. One must make some allowance for the size of schools and the existence of rural areas, which is why Wales has been treated in the way that it has been. Those details are set out in the circular. I am sure that that should satisfy the hon. Gentleman.

Those who press for the Government to prescribe staffing standards for midday supervision should reflect on the fact that no standards have been prescribed for teacher staffing in primary and secondary schools for some time. The Labour Government revoked the regulations relating to maximum class sizes in 1969. The Government do not think that it is right to introduce arrangements to secure the supervision of pupils at midday subject to the conclusion of a national agreement.

We believe that local education authorities are best placed to decide, within broad criteria, what arrangements are best suited to the circumstances of their schools, taking account of existing arrangements that vary from one area to another. For example, it will be for authorities to decide whether teachers should be given the opportunity to participate in supervision and for teachers to decide whether to accept that opportunity. Until the balance between teaching and non-teaching staff within the new arrangements is known, it would be premature to attempt a national agreement. Whether there should ultimately be a national agreement on midday supervision is not an issue for the Government, who would not be a party to it. It is a matter for the local education authorities and the staff whom they employ to resolve in the light of experience. I do not hear much support for the call made by the National Association of Head Teachers for a national agreement.

The hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central suggested that midday supervision can be done only by teachers. That was a point that I sought to answer during the Second Reading of this admirable little measure. Already many people who are not teachers are employed to assist with supervision—about 90,000. Many adults are responsible for the safety and welfare of children in other areas. I do not believe that it is a job that can be done only by teachers. I therefore hope that the Committee will resist the two amendments.

Mr. Fisher: The Minister is being a little legalistic. Of course the Bill is difficult to amend, because it is unspecific. If the Minister would like to draft some amendments to the Bill on Report we would look at them with great sympathy and kindness. I am sure that his staff would have no difficulty in amending the Bill, if only the will was there. Unfortunately, the will is not there. The Government have said that they do not accept that there should be statutory training. The Labour party believes that the Government are wrong and that they will regret that decision. Time will prove that it is necessary to have statutory levels of training for the serious job of supervising children in schools.

[Mr. Fisher]

The Minister talked about that being the responsibility of local education authorities and said that they should have short courses. He will of course, recognise that it will mean extra expense for the authorities if they take their responsibilities seriously. Does he believe that short courses at the discretion of local education authorities are adequate to deal with the problems that we have discussed? He said he believed that they should work within broad criteria. Is it his intention to publish those critieria, because they are certainly not laid down in the Bill?

If the Minister is saying that the Government will come forward with certain criteria, for example, minimum standards and guidelines within which local education authorities will work, we welcome that. That is what he appeared to say in the Bill. If not, he was referring to other criteria set by other people. I understood him to mean that the Government would come forward with the criteria. We would welcome that, because we believe it to be necessary.

The Minister also seemed to suggest that special schools were a particular case. What will the Government do to protect all children with special educational needs, not only those at special schools? I am sure that he recalls the provisions of the Education Act 1981, which ensures that children with special educational needs are educated alongside other children in ordinary schools. They, too, have particular needs of safety and discipline.

Is the Minister seriously saying that he does not believe that children with special educational needs require specially trained staff to supervise them at lunchtime? He cannot mean that. He knows that I was referring, not to teaching staff, but specifically to trained staff. For children at special schools with special educational needs, and physically and mentally handicapped children, it is wrong for the Government to say that they can be supervised by untrained and unqualified staff.

If anything goes wrong when the Bill is put into practice in schools, the Government will regret it. I urge them now to publish the guidelines or broad criteria to which they are working. In the hope that they will think again seriously about safety, particularly that of children with special educational needs, and in the belief that the Minister is serious about addressing the problems and will reconsider them on Report, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: I beg to move amendment No. 13, in clause 2, page 1, line 17, at end add—

'(2) Section 2A above shall not apply to nursery schools.'.

Before the Minister jumps up to tell us that the amendment will not have the effect that he thinks we intend, let me tell him that we wish to take the opportunity to probe the Government on how they see the measure affecting nursery schools. If the amendment is impractical, we shall not be too disappointed. However, we shall be disappointed if the Minister fails to answer this question: in practice, what does he expect to happen in nursery schools?

The Minister has some major problems to sort out. In an earlier debate, he did not seem to be able to answer the question about the difference between supervision and education in the lunch hour. He will have greater difficulty in telling us where supervision finishes and where education starts in the nursery school.

In nursery education, the teacher and the nursery nurse have a different tradition of training and a clear difference in function, one being involved with education and the other in looking after the children, although in practice in many nursery schools it is often difficult to see where the skills of the one finish and the skills of the other start.

At lunchtime there will be greater difficulty in working out how to separate the supervision role from the education role. Anyone involved in looking after 3 to 5-year-olds in nursery schools will feel that it is part of the education to encourage the children to eat their midday meal in a civilised way and talk to each other, as well as to experiment with food that they are not likely to get at home. The teachers can talk about the nutritional content of the food and encourage the children to widen their taste so that they become interested in a wide range of foods. Those are educational areas. It would unfortunate if the Government want to give someone rate of pay that encourages him simply to supervise the children and see that they do not do any physical damage, rather than to carry out an educational role.

What does the Minister envisage will happen in the nursery schools? Does he envisage the nursery nurses working through lunchtime, or having a staggered lunch hour, whereas the nursery teacher will stop work at some point, and his or her role will be taken over by the person involved with lunchtime supervision? Then the teacher will start work again, having had a half hour or three quarters of an hour break. There will be great difficulties in making the Bill work effectively in nursery schools. I hope that the Minister will tell us how he thinks it will work.

11 pm

Mr. Chris Patten: Two points set the argument in context and I hope that the hon. Gentleman will accept that, not unreasonably, they have determined our approach to the question. First, five out of six nursery pupils attend school part time, for either the morning or the afternoon, so the great majority do not need to be supervised during the midday break. Secondly, nursery schools and classes necessarily employ more non-teaching staff than other schools. As the hon. Gentleman rightly said, and as parents of young children will immediately appreciate, these very young pupils need more supervision at all times and not just at midday. That need is reflected in the fact that non-teaching staff out number teachers in these schools.

Local education authorities may consider that there are already adequate arrangements for supervision of pupils remaining on the premises at midday, but some may wish to make additional provision. That will be their choice in the light of the staffing of their schools. Authorities will be able to use ESG money for the supervision of pupils in nursery schools if they think it right to do so. If they decide to offer separate contracts, there is no reason why those contracts should be treated differently from contracts for staff in other schools in terms of the Remuneration of Teachers Act.

The distinction between lunchtime supervision and extracurricular work at lunchtime, to which the hon. Gentleman has referred on several occasions, was made as long ago as the 1945 regulations and in the Rossetti report and subsequently, so although we all appreciate the distinction I think that on this occasion the hon. Gentleman is—to return to a word that we have both used—making a somewhat legalistic point.

Mr. Bennett: I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 2 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 3 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Bill reported, without amendment.

11.3 pm

Mr. Chris Patten: I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

The Government's purpose in this admirable little Bill is clear. We are seeking to promote the education of pupils by assisting local education authorities to make arrangements for supervision at midday which will ensure the orderly and efficient conduct of schools. As I have said before, I have been surprised at the objections raised by the Opposition on Second Reading and in our earlier consideration of the Bill today. I should have expected people as genuinely interested as I know that they are in the wellbeing of the education service to welcome this long overdue measure.

I would like to comment briefly on some of the objections that have been raised. We are accused of taking control of money which would otherwise have been available to local education authorities to spend as they wished. In respect of other ESG activities to be supported through education support grants, we have indeed said that the money should be found through redeployment within the total of planned expenditure on education, but we have recognised that midday supervision is a new demand which requires new money.

Under the arrangements that we propose, 70 per cent. of the additional cost of midday supervision arrangements which are approved for ESG support this year and next will be met from the Exchequer. There will be no reduction in block grant as a result of this proposal, so we cannot be accused of asking authorities to bid for their own money. Authorities will need to find the remaining 30 per cent. if they wish to qualify for ESG support, but that will be their own choice. No authority which does not wish to do so will be forced to seek ESG money for this purpose.

I hope that, in practice, most authorities will see the advantage of using the assistance we are offering to improve their arrangements for midday supervision. Some local education authorities are already acting to introduce arrangements along the lines we propose. We expect that many more will do so.

We have also been accused of rushing this measure through with unseemly haste, but the need in our schools is clearly, alas, urgent. The General Secretary of the Secondary Heads Association has been quoted as saying: "the urgency of the situation was such that delay might have extremely serious implications for pupils, parents and local communities".

The Association's members are in a position to know the damage being done to our schools. I might add that the Association has broadly welcomed our proposals. Like all of the other teacher bodies, it was consulted about our draft circular.

A more substantial objection, if it were true—which it decidedly is not—is that we are prepared to bring forward proposals on this subject but not to do anything to resolve the dispute about teachers' pay. The hon. Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) made that point earlier. I shall not repeat the arguments that have been put to the House many times. We want an end to this damaging dispute. We have done all that we can to achieve a settlement that is fair to all parties to the bargain. We should not forget that that must include the taxpayers and ratepayers who must ultimately foot the bill. They must find the £1·25 billion of new money that we have proposed.

Against that background, it is mischievous of Opposition Members to suggest that we should not go ahead with the Bill until employers and teachers reach a pay agreement for 1985-86. We all hope that an agreement will soon be reached. There is a meeting tomorrow, which I hope will move matters forward constructively. The Government will continue to try to find ways in which to bring the dispute to an end which is fair——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. That does not arise on the Third Reading of the Bill.

Mr. Patten: In that case, I shall come even more speedily to an exceptionally brief peroration. The Bill seeks to solve a longstanding problem which has caused increasing difficulties in our schools. I therefore commend it to the House.

11.8 pm

Mr. Giles Radice (Durham, North): We oppose the Bill receiving a Third Reading for the same reasons as we opposed its receiving a Second Reading. We object to the way in which education support grants are now being funded. Although we do not oppose the principle of specific grants, we oppose the Secretary of State removing money from hard-pressed local authorities to use it for his own purposes.

I accept that the Government will provide £28 million for 1986-87 to support supervision at midday. However, as the Minister admitted, local education authorities will have to provide £12 million out of their own resources and they will lose control over a further £12 million of their money.

Against the background of the growing crises of provision in our schools and the growing squeeze on education resources, we condemn the Government's failure to provide new money to cover all education support grants. We also oppose the Bill because we object to its timing. We recognise the strong case for a fully staffed ancillary service at lunchtime, but the Government have not answered some serious questions about training and staffing.

The Secretary of State is rushing through the Bill during the dispute without consulting the teachers, and that is understandably considered to be provocative, particularly since the £40 million approved expenditure comes from the so-called "envelope" of £1·25 billion which the Government say is available under certain conditions for teachers' pay.

[Mr. Giles Radice]

The third reason why we are against the Bill is the Government's sense of priorities. There is a glaring contrast between the Secretary of State's eagerness to rush the Bill through the House and his inactivity in solving the teachers' dispute. Since August the Secretary of State has either wrung his hands or sat on them. The dispute over teachers' pay has lasted 18 months in Scotland and 11 months in England and Wales, inflicting great damage on our children's education.

The Government must now set up an inquiry. It has responsibility for the education service——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is straying outside the Bill.

Mr. Radice: The Government must take responsibility for finding a solution to this damaging dispute.

The Bill does nothing to tackle the desperate shortage of money and crisis of provision in our schools. It is ill-timed. Above all, it does nothing to bring an end to the teachers' dispute. For those reasons, we oppose the Bill.

11.12 pm

Mr. Freud: The Minister described the measure as an admirable little Bill. That is how King Edward VII referred to the Kaiser. My right hon. and hon. Friends will oppose the Bill, mainly because of its irrelevance, and because the Minister has failed to provide anything remotely like supervision at mealtimes. He is providing only for people to stand around while children eat.

I oppose the Bill because it does nothing to make education in 1986 less awful than it was in 1985. What is more, it takes £40 million out of education expenditure which might have helped solve the teachers' dispute. I oppose it because it will do nothing towards finding a solution, and nothing towards setting up an inquiry that might finally help education.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have already reproached the Minister and the Opposition spokesman. The hon. Gentleman must address his remarks to what is in the Bill.

Mr. Freud: I wanted to show the unity throughout the House. I can see no good cause——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman seems to suggest that I am the only right hon. Gentleman who is out of step, but I am the only one in step. I hope that he will get in step with me.

Mr. Freud: I accept that and shall move on quickly.

Our opposition to the Bill is predominantly because it does nothing new. The only new step taken by the Secretary of State recently was to appoint the hon. Ladies the Members for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie) and for Surrey, South-West (Mrs. Bottomley) to junior posts because he is the only man in the House who does not know the difference between them. I welcome their appointments, but I hope that their talents will be used in future for more acceptable causes.

Question put, That the Bill be now read the Third time:—

The House divided: Ayes 145, Noes 66.

Division No. 29] [11.15 pm

AYES

Alexander, Richard
Amess, David
Ancram, Michael
Aspinwall, Jack
Atkinson, David (B'm'th E)
Baker, Nicholas (Dorset N)
Baldry, Tony
Beaumont-Dark, Anthony
Bellingham, Henry
Benyon, William
Blackburn, John
Body, Richard
Boscawen, Hon Robert
Bottomley, Peter
Bottomley, Mrs Virginia
Bowden, A. (Brighton K'to'n)
Bowden, Gerald (Dulwich)
Brandon-Bravo, Martin
Bright, Graham
Brinton, Tim
Brooke, Hon Peter
Brown, M. (Brigg & Cl'thpes)
Bruinvels, Peter
Burt, Alistair
Butterfill, John
Carlisle, Kenneth (Lincoln)
Carttiss, Michael
Cash, William
Chapman, Sydney
Chope, Christopher
Clark, Dr Michael (Rochford)
Conway, Derek
Coombs, Simon
Cope, John
Corrie, John
Cranborne, Viscount
Crouch, David
Currie, Mrs Edwina
Dicks, Terry
Dorrell, Stephen
Douglas-Hamilton, Lord J.
Durant, Tony
Dykes, Hugh Evennett, David
Eyre, Sir Reginald
Fallon, Michael
Favell, Anthony
Fenner, Mrs Peggy
Forsyth, Michael (Stirling)
Forth, Eric
Freeman, Roger
Gale, Roger
Galley, Roy
Garel-Jones, Tristan
Goodhart, Sir Philip
Gow, Ian
Gower, Sir Raymond
Greenway, Harry
Gregory, Conal
Griffiths, Sir Eldon
Griffiths, Peter (Portsm'th N)
Ground, Patrick
Hamilton, Hon A. (Epsom)
Hamilton, Neil (Tatton)
Hanley, Jeremy
Harris, David
Harvey, Robert
Hayward, Robert
Heathcoat-Amory, David
Heddle, John
Hickmet, Richard
Hind, Kenneth
Hirst, Michael
Hogg, Hon Douglas (Gr'th'm)
Holland, Sir Philip (Gedling)
Holt, Richard
Howard, Michael
Howarth, Alan (Stratf'd-on-A)
Howarth, Gerald (Cannock)
Hubbard-Miles, Peter
Hunt, David (Wirral)
Hunter, Andrew
Hurd, Rt Hon Douglas
Jackson, Robert
Jessel, Toby
Jones, Gwilym (Cardiff N)
Jones, Robert (Herts W)
Kellett-Bowman, Mrs Elaine
Knight, Greg (Derby N)
Knight, Dame Jill (Edgbaston)
Knowles, Michael
Lang, Ian
Latham, Michael
Lawler, Geoffrey
Lennox-Boyd, Hon Mark
Lester, Jim
Lord, Michael
McCurley, Mrs Anna
MacKay, John (Argyll & Bute)
Maclean, David John
McNair-Wilson, M. (N'bury)
McQuarrie, Albert
Major, John
Malins, Humfrey
Malone, Gerald
Marlow, Antony
Mather, Carol
Maxwell-Hyslop, Robin
Mayhew, Sir Patrick
Merchant, Piers
Miller, Hal (B'grove)
Mills, Iain (Meriden)
Mitchell, David (Hants NW)
Moate, Roger
Moynihan, Hon C.
Murphy, Christopher
Neubert, Michael
Newton, Tony
Nicholls, Patrick
Normanton, Tom
Norris, Steven
Oppenheim, Phillip
Ottaway, Richard
Page, Sir John (Harrow W)
Page, Richard (Herts SW)
Patten, Christopher (Bath)
Portillo, Michael
Powley, John
Proctor, K. Harvey
Raffan, Keith
Rhodes James, Robert
Ridley, Rt Hon Nicholas
Roe, Mrs Marion
Sainsbury, Hon Timothy
Shepherd, Colin (Hereford)
Spencer, Derek
Squire, Robin
Stanbrook, Ivor
Thompson, Donald (Calder V)
Thompson, Patrick (N'ich N)
Thurnham, Peter
Wakeham, Rt Hon John
Waller, Gary
Warren, Kenneth
Wells, Bowen (Hertford)

Tellers for the Ayes:
Mr. Peter Lloyd and
Mr. Francis Maude.

NOES

Alton, David
Atkinson, N. (Tottenham)
Bennett, A. (Dent'n & Red'sh)
Bermingham, Gerald
Boyes, Roland
Brown, Gordon (D'f'rmline E)
Bruce, Malcolm
Caborn, Richard
Callaghan, Jim (Heyw'd & M)
Campbell-Savours, Dale

Clarke, Thomas
Clelland, David Gordon
Clwyd, Mrs Ann
Cocks, Rt Hon M. (Bristol S.)
Cook, Robin F. (Livingston)
Corbyn, Jeremy
Cunliffe, Lawrence
Dalyell, Tam
Davies, Ronald (Caerphilly)
Deakins, Eric
Dixon, Donald
Dormand, Jack
Douglas, Dick
Eadie, Alex
Eastham, Ken
Evans, John (St. Helens N)
Ewing, Harry
Fields, T. (L'pool Broad Gn)
Fisher, Mark
Foster, Derek
Foulkes, George
Freud, Clement
Godman, Dr Norman
Golding, John
Hamilton, James (M'well N)
Hardy, Peter
Haynes, Frank
Hogg, N. (C'nauld & Kilsyth)
Home Robertson, John
Howells, Geraint
Hughes, Sean (Knowsley S)
Kennedy, Charles
Lamond, James
Leighton, Ronald
Lloyd, Tony (Stretford)
McDonald, Dr Oonagh
McKay, Allen (Penistone)
McWilliam, John
Madden, Max
Marek, Dr John
Maxton, John
Millan, Rt Hon Bruce
Miller, Dr M. S. (E Kilbride)
Morris, Rt Hon A. (W'shawe)
Patchett, Terry
Pike, Peter
Powell, Raymond (Ogmore)
Radice, Giles
Rogers, Allan
Short, Ms Clare (Ladywood)
Skinner, Dennis
Snape, Peter
Spearing, Nigel
Steel, Rt Hon David
Strang, Gavin
Thomas, Dr R. (Carmarthen)
Wardell, Gareth (Gower)

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Alex Carlile and Mr. James Wallace.

Question accordingly agreed to.
Bill read the Third time, and passed.

Education Support Grants

11.25 pm

The Minister of State, Department of Education and Science (Mr. Chris Patten): I beg to move,

That the draft Education Support Grants (Amendment) (No. 2) Regulations 1985, which were laid before this House on 27 November, be approved.

The draft regulations amend the Education Support Grants Regulations 1984 so as to add one further item to the purposes for which my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Education and Science and for Wales may pay grant. The additional purpose is "securing the supervision of pupils in schools at midday".

My right hon. Friends have consulted the Association of County Councils, the Association of Metropolitan Authorities and the Welsh Joint Education Committee about their proposals. Those associations raised no objections to the amendment effected by the draft regulations.

There has already been considerable debate in the House on our proposal to pay education support grants for midday supervision. I do not want to flog an argument which has long since been deceased. Therefore, I shall concentrate on two points which have a particular bearing on the draft regulations.

First, I shall explain more fully the resources which the Government are making available for this purpose. We shall add £10 million to relevent expenditure for local authorities in this financial year. The aggregate of Exchequer grants to local authorities will be increased by £7 million, representing 70 per cent. of the total which will be supported through education support grants, if the draft regulations are approved. For next year, the sums involved are £40 million and £28 million respectively. Those additions for 1986-87 can be made available only if the Education (Amendment) Bill, which the House has just read a Third time, receives Royal Assent.

Secondly, hon. Members may welcome some information about the nature of new arrangements which might result from our proposals. The description in the amendment regulations is deliberately drawn widely. My right hon. Friends have no wish to prescribe the details of any arrangements which local education authorities consider suitable for their authorities and schools. Before approving expenditure for education support grant, they will wish to be sure that the proposed arrangements satisfy a few simple criteria. Those criteria are described in the draft circular, a copy of which is in the Library.

We have received some helpful comments on the draft circular from the local authority and teacher associations, and others who were invited to comment, and we will look at the draft again in the light of those comments. If the regulations receive the approval of Parliament, we shall issue the circular to all local education authorities inviting them to submit proposals for approval for education support grant. Our aim is that grant should be payable on expenditure incurred from the beginning of the spring term so that authorities may move ahead quickly with their plans to provide proper supervision at midday.

I ask the House to approve the amendment regulations.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That the draft Education Support Grants (Amendment) (No. 2) Regulations 1985, which were laid before this House on 27th November, be approved.

SCOTTISH GRAND COMMITTEE

Ordered,

That, in the course of its consideration of the matter of the recommendations of the Scottish Tertiary Education Advisory Council concerning higher education in Scotland, the Scottish Grand Committee may meet in Edinburgh on Monday 20th January 1986 at half-past 10 o'clock.—[Mr. Mather.]

ARMED FORCES BILL

Ordered,

That Mr. Gerald Bermingham, Sir Antony Buck, Mr. Roger Freeman, Dr. Norman A. Godman, Mr. Kenneth Hind, Mr. Robert Key, Mr. Kevin McNamara, Mr. John Stanley, Mr. Neil Thorne, Mr. Peter Viggers and Mr. James Wallace be members of the Select Committee on the Armed Forces Bill:

Ordered,

That Three be the Quorum of the Committee:

Ordered,

That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers and records:

Ordered,

That the Committee have power to adjourn from place to place.—[Mr. Mather.]

House of Commons Members' Fund

11.29 pm

Mr. Alfred Morris (Manchester, Wythenshawe): I beg to move,

That in pursuance of the provisions of section 3 of the House of Commons Members' Fund Act 1948 and of section 2 of the House of Commons Members' Fund and Parliamentary Pensions Act 1981 the maximum annual amounts of the periodical payments which may be made out of the House of Commons Members' Fund under the House of Commons Members' Fund Act 1939, as amended, and the annual rate of any payments made under section 1 of the said Act of 1981 shall be varied as from 1st December 1985 as follows:

(a) for paragraph 1 of Schedule 1 to the said Act of 1939, as amended, there shall be substituted the following paragraph:

1. The annual amount of any periodical payment made to any person by virtue of his past membership of the House of Commons shall not exceed £2,355 of such sum as, in the opinion of the Trustees, will bring his income up to £4,353 per annum whichever is the less:

Provided that if, having regard to length of service and need, the Trustees think fit, they may make a larger payment not exceeding £4,545 or such sum as, in their opinion, will bring his income up to £6,543 per annum, whichever is the less:

(b) for paragraph 2 of that Schedule there shall be substituted the following paragraph:

2. The annual amount of any periodical payment to any person by virtue of her being a widow of a past Member of the House of Commons shall not exceed £1,179 or such sum as, in the opinion of the Trustees, will bring her income up to £3,177 per annum, whichever is the less:

Provided that if, having regard to her husband's length of service or to her need, the Trustees think fit, they may make a larger payment not exceeding £2,268 or such sum as, in the opinion of the Trustees, will bring her income up to £4,266 per annum, whichever is the less:

(c) in paragraph 2A of that Schedule for the words 'the annual amount of any periodical payment' to the end of the paragraph, there shall be substituted the words: 'the annual amount of any periodical payment made to any such widower shall not exceed £1,179 or such sum as, in the opinion of the Trustees, will bring his income up to £3,177 per annum, whichever is the less:

Provided that if, having regard to his wife's length of service or to his needs the Trustees think fit, they may make a larger payment not exceeding £2,268 or such sum, as in the opinion of the Trustees, will bring his income up to £4,266 per annum, whichever is the less:

(d) in section 2(1) of the said Act of 1981, for the words from the beginning to the end of paragraph (b) there shall be substituted the words: 'the annual rate of any payments made under section 1 shall be—

(a) £1,372 if the payments are made to a past Member; and

(b) £686 if the payments are made to the widow or widower of a past Member'.

The motion is in the names of right hon. and hon. Members on both sides of the House who share with me the responsibility, as trustees, of administering the fund.

The purpose of the motion is to provide for and to increase the present levels of grants and payments which may be made under the Members' fund legislation, in line with the recent increases approved for public service and national insurance retirement pensions.

Members of this House now enjoy pension rights under the parliamentary contributory pension fund, but this has not always been so. Former colleagues who left the House before 1964 have no pension whatever from the House.

Many of them live in considerably reduced, and indeed straitened circumstances, not least those who are now of advanced years and, even more so, the widows or widowers of former Members. The Members' fund has existed since 1939 to provide assistance where necessary to former Members and their dependants, but the help that my fellow trustees and I are empowered to give from the fund is extremely modest.

Mr. Tom Clarke (Monklands, West): What is the present annual rate of payment from the fund?

Mr. Morris: The present annual rate is £138,000.

The trustees are deeply conscious of the need for more help from the fund and are urgently considering what steps might be taken to achieve improvement.

A further problem is that the needs of former colleagues or their widows or widowers are not always known to us, which is why on occasions like this some attention to the fund's work is important. I shall be most grateful if right hon. and hon. Members will get in touch with me if they become aware of any former Members or their dependants who are in need of help that the fund can provide.

I need not detain the House for long, as the provisions for which I and my fellow trustees seek approval are set out in detail in the motion. In paragraph 1(a) we set out the new provisions for grants to ex-hon. Members. At present the trustees are authorised to make grants to ex-Members of up to £2,199, provided that the total income of the applicant, including the grant, does not exceed £4,067. By this motion the grant is raised to £2,355 and the income limit to £4,353. To this is added a provision by which the trustees will be authorised to make larger payments, having due regard to length of service and need, of a grant of up to £4,545, provided that the income of the applicant, together with the grant, does not exceed £6,543.

Grants to widows are set out under subparagraph (b). At present the grant to an ex-Member's widow is £1,101, provided that her income, with the grant, does not exceed £2,969. This grant is raised to £1,179, and the income limit raised to £3,177. There follows the provision by which, having regard to her husband's length of service, or to need, the trustees will be enabled to make grants of up to £2,268, provided that the widow's income, with the grant, does not exceed £4,266.

Grants to widowers are set out in subparagraph (c), and the provisions there are similar to those for widows in subparagraph (b).

Subparagraph (d) refers to the "as of right" payments from the Members' fund to former Members who had 10 years of service before October 1964, and to widows and widowers of such Members, provided for by the House of Commons Members' fund, and the Parliamentary Pensions Act 1981, which came into force on 19 March 1981. We now seek to increase the payments, at present at the rate of £1,282 per annum, to former Members to £1,372 per annum, and the payments to widows or widowers from £641 per annum to £686 per annum.

These new provisions will all be effective from 1 December 1985. They provide for increases of approximately 7 per cent. across the board, in line with the provisions in the Pensions Increase (Review) Order 1985, and the additional expenditure arising from the motion will be £9,800.

I hope that the motion will receive the unanimous support of the House, for I can assure right hon. and hon. Members that the experience of the trustees has made us realise how urgently this further provision is needed and how very much it will be welcomed by the fund's beneficiaries.

Finally, I wish to thank most warmly Mr. J. L. G. Dobson, the Accountant, and his colleagues in the Fees Office, both for their constant help to the trustees and for their ever humane concern for the wellbeing of those whom we serve.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That in pursuance of the provisions of section 3 of the House of Commons Members' Fund Act 1948 and of section 2 of the House of Commons Members' Fund and Parliamentary Pensions Act 1981 the maximum annual amounts of the periodical payments which may be made out of the House of Commons Members' Fund under the House of Commons Members' Fund Act 1939, as amended, and the annual rate of any payments made under section 1 of the said Act of 1981 shall be varied as from 1st December 1985 as follows:

(a) for paragraph 1 of Schedule 1 to the said Act of 1939, as amended, there shall be substituted the following paragraph:

1. The annual amount of any periodical payment made to any person by virtue of his past membership of the House of Commons shall not exceed £2,355 or such sum as, in the opinion of the Trustees, will bring his income up to £4,353 per annum whichever is the less:

Provided that if, having regard to length of service and need, the Trustees think fit, they may make a larger payment not exceeding £4,545 or such sum as, in their opinion, will bring his income up to £6,543 per annum, whichever is the less:

(b) for paragraph 2 of that Schedule there shall be substituted the following paragraph:

2. The annual amount of any periodical payment to any person by virtue of her being a widow of a past Member of the House of Commons shall not exceed £1,179 or such sum as, in the opinion of the Trustees, will bring her income up to £3,177 per annum, whichever is the less:

Provided that if, having regard to her husband's length of service or to her need, the Trustees think fit, they may make a larger payment not exceeding £2,268 or such sum as, in the opinion of the Trustees, will bring her income up to £4,266 per annum, whichever is the less:

(c) in paragraph 2A of that Schedule for the words 'the annual amount of any periodical payment' to the end of the paragraph, there shall be substituted the words: 'the annual amount of any periodical payment made to any such widower shall not exceed £1,179 or such sum as, in the opinion of the Trustees, will bring his income up to £3,177 per annum, whichever is the less:

Provided that if, having regard to his wife's length of service or to his needs the Trustees think fit, they may make a larger payment not exceeding £2,268 or such sum, as in the opinion of the Trustees, will bring his income up to £4,266 per annum, whichever is the less:

(d) in section 2(1) of the said Act of 1981, for the words from the beginning to the end of paragraph (b) there shall be substituted the words: 'the annual rate of any payments made under section 1 shall be—

(a) £1,372 if the payments are made to a past Member; and

(b) £686 if the payments are made to the widow or widower of a past Member'.

Fuel Poverty

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Maude.]

11.36 pm

Mr. Geraint Howells (Ceredigion and Pembroke, North): When the unnaturally cold spell hit us in November, many thousands of householders up and down the country were alarmed, for they saw ahead of them yet another long, dreary winter following on a cold and wet summer, with the ever-rising fuel bills that this means. This thought is depressing enough for the moderately affluent among us, but for those on the poverty line, or beneath it, it spells disaster and, for many, the inevitable cutting off of supplies because of the lack of ability to pay.

The Electricity Consumers Council recently issued disconnection figures up to 30 September of this year which show that the number of disconnections in England and Wales is now running at nearly 100,000 a year. The Liberal party commission on poverty in 1982 pointed out that one quarter of all local authority tenants are the victims of fuel poverty, while a further quarter are potential victims.

Age Concern tells us that seven years ago it was estimated that 90 per cent. of elderly people were unable to heat their homes up to the required 70 deg F to keep themselves warm and healthy in the winter months, and there is very little evidence that the position is improving. The consequences of inadequate heating for the elderly are often illness and, in some cases, death. We are all familiar with the sad stories of old people shivering in their poorly heated houses, terrified of the financial consequences of turning up the heat. Fuel costs have risen steeply in the last decade, and although prices have levelled off somewhat during the last two or three years the overall rise in the cost of fuel and light in real terms during the decade was 37·4 per cent., far outstripping other items in the household budget.

The people who have suffered most from the increase in fuel costs are inevitably the poor. They tend to live in bad housing, with inadequate insulation, often with the additional problems of dampness and condensation. They are seldom able to choose the kind of heating that they want and often end up with expensive and inefficient heating systems. This leads to a ridiculous situation, where those who can afford it least have to pay the most to keep themselves moderately warm. It is no wonder, therefore, that this leads to a failure to pay bills and to consequent misery.

We believe, as do the charities, that the White Paper that was published today will do little to help. Indeed, we feel that the difficulties will be even greater, both for the low paid who cannot heat their homes and for those charities that are involved in insulating several thousand homes in Britain.

The abolition of additional payments, including heating allowances for supplementary benefit claimants, will have serious consequences. The replacement of supplementary benefit by a system of income support containing a theoretical heating component may sound reasonable, but in practice it will lead to some very unpleasant choices for many households where budgets are strained to the limit. It could well be a stark choice between eating and keeping warm, with disastrous results for vulnerable groups, particularly the elderly.

I am also extremely alarmed that all other heating benefits to households, with special problems—those with young children or with ill, disabled or elderly people —will be abolished merely as an administrative convenience. It is also obvious that the abolition of single payments will jeopardise the future of insulation projects run by charities such as Neighbourhood Energy Action. In fact, the "Right to Fuel" campaign has said that DHSS single payments account for 80 per cent. of all insulation work carried out by the NEA.

Since 1981, this excellent group has carried out 120,000 jobs and has helped the elderly and disadvantaged to get the benefit of home insulation. At the same time, it has created about 2,500 jobs under the Government's community programme. Furthermore, it has opened up a new and thriving market for insulation projects. Will that work now be put at risk?

I believe that the present Administration, in their unseemly scramble to save money wherever they can at any cost, are in danger of reinforcing their public image as an uncaring, unsympathetic Government who are so intent on introducing tax cuts before the next election that they are careless of the needs of the most vulnerable in our society.

The White Paper represents a lost opportunity. It should have made an attempt to tackle the problem of fuel poverty, and it should have recognised the crucial role that single payments play in keeping the poor warm. The Government should take positive steps to make resources available for a special fund, as recommended by the Neighbourhood Energy Action movement, to provide a comprehensive and cost-effective approach to the insulation needs of the poor.

On a wider scale, greater efforts should be made to improve the housing stock and to ensure that building improvements and renovations are not subject to a crippling tax. Age Concern, a leading charity in the care of the elderly, has made many useful recommendations that the Government could well take on board and which would prove beneficial to all impoverished sections of society. It recommends that there should be mandatory payments for special circumstances, such as higher fuel bills in exceptionally severe weather. There should also be payments for draught proofing materials and insulation, repairs to heating appliances and so on.

I also believe that there should be a uniform and humane policy throughout Britain on disconnection procedures and repayment facilities, and that special payments should be made for reconnection. Fuel bills should be paid when disconnection may cause serious risk.

Will the Minister reassure the House that the Government are conscious of the need to modify their policies to fit the realities of life? After all, even the poorest among us are entitled to the basic requirements, including adequate heating. It is wrong that so many in this affluent society must face a miserable existence, and in this season of good will I hope that it will be possible for the Government to show just the smallest glimmer of compassion.

11.44 pm

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon) rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. Does the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) have the consent of the Minister and of the hon. Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North (Mr. Howells) to take part in the debate?

Mr. Bruce: Yes, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North (Mr. Howells) for giving me the chance to speak in this important debate.

I and others are grateful that the unfair trigger mechanism that was highlighted last year has been phased out, but I hope that the Minister will recognise that there is still a feeling particularly in northern parts of the country, that the system is unfair, because those in the northern parts—particularly the poorer members of the community—who have, by definition, higher heating costs, need additional help which is not yet available. The Government should try to ensure that such help is given.

The fact that a trigger mechanism could even be contemplated is indicative of the bias that exists against the northern areas. The temperature did not have to sink to freezing point in Penzance for people there to secure a benefit, but in my constituency, the temperature had to sink to 2·7 deg. below freezing—and that was on the coast. Temperatures inland were 10 deg. C. lower, but people still did not qualify for benefit. Getting rid of that system is one step, but we need another step to ensure help for those in colder parts of the country.

No doubt the Minister will say that the Government's contribution to fuel allowances has increased from £100 million to £400 million a year since they came to power. That is creditable, because it shows that the Government are willing to make a contribution to fuel costs, but we have not made the logical link of trying to help those on low incomes to reduce fuel costs. After all, some do not qualify for help, but still face high costs.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North mentioned the neighbourhood energy action schemes, which have been welcome. I was recently pleased to launch a scheme in my constituency. It took 13 people off the long-term unemployment register and gave poorer members of the community the opportunity to insulate their homes, so that they had lower fuel bills and higher temperatures. The risks of hypothermia were reduced and everyone was happy. It is important that such assistance, which we welcome, should be boosted and extended and not cut.

Many elderly people and those on low incomes are worried about standing charges on fuel bills. I was disappointed that the opportunity to abolish standing charges was not taken in the Gas Bill. Worse than that, when the Bill came before the House, the Secretary of State said that the best that he could write into the Bill was that the British Gas Corporation should use its best endeavours to keep the increases in standing charges in line with, or lower than, the rate of inflation. That is not good enough. We want to get rid of those charges and ensure that people on low incomes have help to meet fuel costs, help to be warmer and more comfortable and help to insulate their homes. I hope that the Minister will take up those points with his colleagues in the Department of Energy. They are linked.

11.49 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. John Major): I listened with interest to the hon. Members for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North (Mr. Howells) and for Gordon (Mr. Bruce). I understand and share many of the concerns which they have expressed and congratulate them on the way in which they have expressed them.

The issues raised by the hon. Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North ranged wide and covered both fuel policy and the alleviation of poverty. He spread the net even wider by referring to draught proofing, housing and a variety of allied matters. I propose to refer briefly to energy prices, although strictly speaking they are for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy. I propose to devote most of my remarks to the help given to the less well-off through the social security system, but I shall attempt to touch upon the specific issues raised by the hon. Members for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North and for Gordon.

Both hon. Members mentioned the projects that have been undertaken by various neighbourhood energy action groups. There is not a great deal that I can say about them this evening, save that I recognise the good work that has been done by the groups. Decisions have yet to be taken on how they will be funded in future. That is a matter that we are considering. I hope that it will be understood that I can go no further than that this evening.

The hon. Member for Gordon referred to some of the absurdities of the exceptionally severe weather payments and the disapproval last year which that method of making payments received in Scotland. The hon. Gentleman will know that the chief adjudicating officer issued fresh guidance about the payments only recently. We are considering the guidance and the future of that form of assistance with heating bills. The hon. Gentleman will know that last year the payments amounted to only £1·7 million, while administrative costs were £1 million. I mention those figures, not to denigrate the help that was given, but to put them in the context of the £400 million-worth of heating addition payments to which the hon. Gentleman referred.

The hon. Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North illustrated the extent to which the cost of fuel is relevant to those on low incomes. I accept that view. It is an important view, and I accept what he had to say on that score. Fuel is clearly a basic necessity, especially for the elderly and the sick. I recognise the concern that is felt by many on low incomes when it comes to paying for fuel. I shall come to what has been done, what is being done and what will be done under our new proposals to try to alleviate that concern.

Reluctant though I am to do so, I must take issue with the hon. Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North about the term "fuel poverty". It is a phrase which is often used these days, and upon examination it is a rather curious concept. The general idea of poverty itself is far from straightforward. We can recognise it, but it is not always easy to define it. The hon. Gentleman will know that the standard rate of supplementary benefit for adults has more than doubled in real terms since 1948 and that this benefit is the primary means of alleviating poverty, and has been so under successive Governments for some years. Yet the hon. Gentleman talks of fuel poverty. We do not hear a great deal about clothes poverty, or food poverty, but fuel poverty appears in a rather curious fashion to have developed a life of its own. Fuel, like clothes, food and all the other necessities for rich or poor alike is paid for out of people's normal income.

[Mr. John Major]

I recognise that individual need for expenditure on fuel can vary, but that is true of other necessities. I do not wish to make too much of what may seem to be a matter of semantics, but it is often misleading to talk about fuel poverty as if it were some special breed of poverty that necessarily requires different measures from those that are generally used to support the less well-off. An effective attack on poverty, which we all wish to see, comes in many guises — for example, benefit rates, control of price increases, economic stability and economic growth. Energy prices are a part of that tapestry, but only a part.

Although the general financial framework within which the gas and electricity industries operate is agreed with the Government, price increases remain a matter for the industries themselves. The Government do not set prices and do not have the power to so. Tariffs must reflect the industries' costs and provide a proper return on the substantial capital resources that they employ. They are not a means of indirect taxation. I call in evidence to support my proposition the relatively low level of price rises in recent years, which the hon. Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North acknowledged. They have been below the rate of inflation in the past two years and charges have therefore fallen in real terms. After allowing for inflation, the price of gas to the home is roughly what it was in 1970.

The hon. Member for Gordon addressed himself to standing charges. I know that these charges have been a cause of deep concern to many for many years, especially to the elderly. The charges reflect the necessary cost of keeping a supply available to the consumer in his own home for 24 hours a day. They cover the maintenance of the connection, meter reading, accounting, billing and emergency services. The costs arise no matter how much or how little gas or electricity is consumed by the individual householder.

The abolition of standing charges, although self-evidently attractive in some ways, is not an easy option. It would cost the gas and electricity industries more than £1·1 billion a year in lost revenue. Abolition for pensioners alone—if we could determine which pensioners should have abolition, whether it should affect people living on their own and all the other details that must be decided — would cost about £300 million. That lost revenue would have to be recovered by substantial increases in unit prices, which would penalise many of those who, through age, sickness, infirmity or some other reason, need more heat, even though they may be among the least well off.

That raises the question, which may have flashed through the mind of the hon. Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North, whether there should be special tariffs or free allowances for people on low incomes. That has been considered in the past, but successive Governments have concluded that it would be an expensive, ill-directed and probably ineffective means of helping those most in need. In 1976, the Labour Government announced that they had reviewed possible help through concessionary or restricted tariffs or free allowances of gas and electricity. Their conclusion—I quote from the report's foreword which was written by the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn)—was that these did not offer

"a satisfactory way of helping poor consumers with their fuel bills".

I am sure that the right hon. Member was right, and I suspect that the Liberal party thought so too, because, as far as I am aware, it expressed no contrary view at the time. Successive Governments have therefore taken the view that help is best given through the social security system. That help is considerable.

More than £40 billion is spent on social security—about a third of all Government spending. We have kept the major benefit rates ahead of the rise in prices during the lifetime of the Government and, because of the increases in benefit last month in line with inflation, we increased our spending by a further £2 billion a year. The main help for the less well off with their day-to-day living expenses, including fuel costs, is through the standard weekly rates of supplementary benefit. Those rates increased by 6 per cent. in real terms between November 1978 and November 1984 and were increased again last month in line with inflation. They have doubled in real terms since 1948, and I think that every hon. Member welcomes that.

On top of those benefit rates, we provide extra weekly help for those with special needs. The hon. Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North mentioned people with special needs—the elderly, the very young, the sick and the disabled. Each is entitled to heating additions. Last year we spent more than £400 million on those heating additions, which is £140 million more in real terms than any previous Government have spent at any time. Since 1979, we have extended the help available. In November 1979 we introduced a basic rate of heating addition for pensioner householders over 75. Over the years, we have extended the age range so that this now takes in pensioner householder over 65. We have introduced a similar addition for the under-fives. Last November, we introduced a new higher rate of heating addition, worth well over £200 a year—a considerable sum—payable automatically to householders over 85. We have also assisted disabled people. Since 1980, we have paid a higher rate of heating addition automatically to severely disabled people people on supplementary benefit who receive attendance or mobility allowance or its equivalent. Last month, we introduced a further measure — automatic entitlement to a basic rate heating addition for sick and disabled householder claimants on the long-term rate of supplementary benefit. As a result of these changes, we estimate that 60 per cent. of all people on supplementary benefit and 90 per cent. of supplementary benefit pensioners now receive a heating addition. That is a dramatic improvement on the position before 1979 and represents a considerable attack on what the hon. Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North referred to as "fuel poverty".

The hon. Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North referred to the White Paper proposals. I should like to explain why we felt it right to move forward and reform these arrangements, as announced in the White Paper which was published today. The answer is that heating additions are merely a means of giving more help to certain groups of claimants who may have extra heating needs. The additions are better, in our view, than tariff adjustments and certainly better than nothing, but they are not the only, or necessarily the best, form of assistance.

Heating additions are a rather curious mixture. Many are paid automatically on grounds such as age, but others involve detailed questioning on matters such as the claimant's health. There is a complex array of rates, rules and regulations. I am sorry that the hon. Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North did not feel that the White Paper would be an improvement on the present rather muddled situation. He asked me whether I was conscious of the need to modify policy to match reality. That is what we believe the White Paper is doing. I hope that, upon reflection, it will be shown that we are right, although I acknowledge that it is a controversial issue at present.

In the White Paper we are proposing an income support scheme to replace the current weekly supplementary benefit. Income support will continue to provide set allowances for normal living expenses, including fuel costs. There will also be premium payments for families, pensioners, sick and disabled people and lone parents to help with the extra expenses that those groups tend to have — including extra heating costs. That will mean a system that is simpler than the present one. It will be easier for the public and staff to understand. It will cut out much of the intrusive questioning that now takes place — I think that everyone will welcome that—and it will also effectively direct extra help to groups of people who are likely to face extra expenses.

As I said in the House only a couple of weeks ago, the fact that we shall not call the premiums "heating additions" does not mean that they do not exist, that the cash is not in the claimant's pocket and that it cannot be used towards fuel costs. We believe that income support will, in future, be a better means of delivering that help and we intend that the money spent on heating additions will be included in the resources available for the new scheme. Nor are we alone in that view. The Social Security Advisory Committee commented similarly on the Green Paper in June. The committee welcomed the idea of premium payments in income support for different groups. Moreover, the Select Committee on Social Services said that it "broadly accepted the principle of premiums reflecting the additional needs of individual client groups".

Therefore, I think that a substantial amount has been done, is being done and will continue to be done to meet the needs of people who face difficulties with fuel poverty through poor or low incomes. I hope that the hon. Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North will accept that we are sincere in our intention to help those people meet the difficulties that they face.

I also hope that on reflection the hon. Gentleman will see the wisdom of the approach that we set before the House in the White Paper today and that we shall seek to carry through in a Bill early in the new year. I am confident that when the House debates the Bill, it will take that view. I hope that it will carry the hon. Gentleman and his colleagues with it at that time.

I appreciate the hon. Gentleman's concern that people should be able to afford adequate heating. We share that concern and we shall continue to offer substantial assistance to that end, but we shall do so in a way that we regard as simpler and more effective than the current system. We believe that our proposals will meet those criteria and I hope that in due course they will be endorsed by the House and the hon. Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North who raised the subject.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at three minutes past Twelve o'clock.

House of Commons

Tuesday 17 December 1985

The House met at half-past Two o'clock

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

NEW WRITS

Sir Peter Emery (Honiton): Mr. Speaker, I have given you notice that I am desired today to move for the issue on 3 January of your Warrants in respect of Writs for by-elections in 15 constituencies in Northern Ireland—that is to say, all the constituencies in Northern Ireland except Belfast, West, and Foyle—in place of the 15 Northern Ireland Members of Parliament who have accepted today a disqualifying office—we used to call it "an office of profit under the crown".

In order to save the time of the House may I ask that these motions be taken together and that their text be published in the Votes and Proceedings and in the Official Report?

Mr. Speaker: Does that course have the agreement of the House?

Hon. Members: Aye.

Ordered,

That, on Friday 3rd January, Mr. Speaker do issue his Warrant to the Clerk of the Crown to make out a new Writ for the electing of a Member to serve in this present Parliament for the County Constituency of East Antrim, in the room of Roy Beggs, Esquire, who since his election for the said County Constituency hath accepted the Office of Steward or Bailiff of her Majesty's Three Chiltern Hundreds of Stoke, Desborough and Burnham, in the County of Buckingham.

That, on Friday 3rd January, Mr. Speaker do issue his Warrant to the Clerk of the Crown to make out a new Writ for the electing of a Member to serve in this present Parliament for the County Constituency of East Londonderry, in the room of William Ross, Esquire, who since his election for the said County Constituency hath accepted the Office of Steward or Bailiff of Her Majesty's Three Chiltern Hundreds of Stoke, Desborough and Burnham, in the County of Buckingham.

That, on Friday 3rd January, Mr. Speaker do issue his warrant to the Clerk of the Crown to make out a new Writ for the electing of a Member to serve in this present Parliament for the County Constituency of Fermanagh and South Tyrone in the room of Kenneth Maginnis, Esquire, who since his election for the said County Constituency hath accepted the Office of Steward or Bailiff of Her Majesty's Manor of Northstead in the County of York.

That, on Friday 3rd January, Mr. Speaker do issue his Warrant to the Clerk of the Crown to make out a new Writ for the electing of a Member to serve in this present Parliament for the County Constituency of Lagan Valley, in the room of the Right honourable James Henry Molyneaux, who since his election for the said County Constituency hath accepted the Office of Steward or Bailiff of Her Majesty's Three Chiltern Hundreds of Stoke, Desborough and Burnham, in the County of Buckingham.

That, on Friday 3rd January, Mr. Speaker do issue his Warrant to the Clerk of the Crown to make out a new Writ for the electing of a Member to serve in this present Parliament for the County Constituency of Mid-Ulster, in the room of the Reverend Robert Thomas William McCrea, who since his election for the said County Constituency hath accepted the Office of Steward or Bailiff of Her Majesty's Three Chiltern Hundreds of Stoke, Desborough and Burnham, in the County of Buckingham.

That, on Friday 3rd January, Mr. Speaker do issue his Warrant to the Clerk of the Crown to make out a new Writ for the electing of a Member to serve in this present Parliament for the County Constituency of Newry and Armagh, in the room of James Nicholson, Esquire, who since his election for the said County Constituency hath accepted the Office of Steward or Bailiff of Her Majesty's Three Chiltern Hundreds of Stoke, Desborough and Burnham, in the County of Buckingham.

That, on Friday 3rd January, Mr. Speaker do issue his Warrant to the Clerk of the Crown to make out a new Writ for the electing of a Member to serve in this present Parliament for the County Constituency of North Antrim, in the room of the Reverend Ian Richard Kyle Paisley, who since his election for the said County Constituency hath accepted the Office of Steward or Bailiff of Her Majesty's Manor of Northstead in the County of York.

That, on Friday 3rd January, Mr. Speaker do issue his Warrant to the Clerk of the Crown to make out a new Writ for the electing of a Member to serve in this present Parliament for the County Constituency of North Down, in the room of James Alexander Kilfedder, Esquire who since his election for the said County Constituency hath accepted the Office of Steward or Bailiff of Her Majesty's Three Chiltern Hundreds of Stoke, Desborough and Burnham, in the County of Buckingham.

That, on Friday 3rd January, Mr. Speaker do issue his Warrant to the Clerk of the Crown to make out a new Writ for the electing of a Member to serve in this present Parliament for the County Constituency of Strangford, in the room of the right honourable John David Taylor, who since his election for the said County Constituency hath accepted the Office of Steward or Bailiff of Her Majesty's Three Chiltern Hundreds of Stoke, Desborough and Burnham, in the County of Buckingham.

That, on Friday 3rd January, Mr. Speaker do issue his Warrant to the Clerk of the Crown to make out a new Writ for the electing of a Member to serve in this present Parliament for the County Constituency of South Antrim, in the room of Clifford Forsythe, Esquire, who since his election for the said County Constituency hath accepted the Office of Steward or Bailiff of Her Majesty's Manor of Northstead in the County of York.

That, on Friday 3rd January, Mr. Speaker do issue his Warrant to the Clerk of the Crown to make out a new Writ for the electing of a Member to serve in this present Parliament for the County Constituency of South Down, in the room of the Right honourable John Enoch Powell, M.B.E., who since his election for the said County Constituency hath accepted the Office of Steward or Bailiff of Her Majesty's Manor of Northstead in the County of York.

That, on Friday 3rd January, Mr. Speaker do issue his Warrant to the Clerk of the Crown to make out a new Writ for the electing of a Member to serve in this present Parliament for the County Constituency of Upper Bann, in the room of James Harold McCusker, Esquire, who since his election for the said County Constituency hath accepted the Office of Steward or Bailiff of Her Majesty's Three Chiltern Hundreds of Stoke, Desborough and Burnham, in the County of Buckingham.

That, on Friday 3rd January, Mr. Speaker do issue his Warrant to the Clerk of the Crown to make out a new Writ for the electing of a Member to serve in this present Parliament for the Borough Constituency of Belfast East, in the room of Peter David Robinson, Esquire, who since his election for the said Borough Constituency hath accepted the Office of Steward or Bailiff of Her Majesty's Manor of Northstead in the County of York.

That, on Friday 3rd January, Mr. Speaker do issue his Warrant to the Clerk of the Crown to make out a new Writ for the electing of a Member to serve in this present Parliament for the Borough Constituency of Belfast North, in the room of Alfred Cecil Walker, Esquire, who since his election for the said Borough Constituency hath accepted the Office of Steward or Bailiff of Her Majesty's Manor of Northstead in the County of York.

That, on Friday 3rd January, Mr. Speaker do issue his Warrant to the Clerk of the Crown to make out a new Writ for the electing of a Member to serve in this present Parliament for the Borough Constituency of Belfast South, in the room of the Reverend William Martin Smyth, who since his election for the said Borough Constituency hath accepted the Office of Steward or Bailiff of Her Majesty's Manor of Northstead in the County of York.—[Sir Peter Emery.]

Oral Answers to Questions

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Teachers' Pay Dispute

1. Mr. Yeo asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement about the teachers' pay dispute.

2. Mr. Hancock asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the teachers' pay dispute.

3. Mr. Haselhurst asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement about the teachers' pay dispute.

6. Mr. Alan Howarth asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the outstanding issues in the teachers' dispute.

11. Mr. Randall asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will make a statement on the teachers' pay dispute.

17. Mr. Merchant asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the teachers' pay dispute.

19. Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement about the current position in the teachers' dispute.

20. Mr. Spencer asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the latest position in the teachers' dispute.

The Secretary of State for Education and Science (Sir Keith Joseph): The teachers' panel of the Burnham committee met on 5 December and resolved to seek an early resumption of negotiations. The management panel met on 11 December and agreed to undertake further informal discussions with the teachers' side. Discussions are taking place today.

I welcome any development which may help to achieve a settlement of this bitter, damaging and unnecessary dispute. But it remains the Government's view that an honourable, worthwhile and lasting settlement will come only from a bargain which clarifies teachers' duties and reforms their career structure as well as improving pay levels. The teachers' unions have so far refused to try to negotiate a deal of that kind.

Mr. Yeo: Is my right hon. Friend aware that hundreds of thousands of families are desperately worried by the serious and permanent damage that is being inflicted on their children by the dispute? Is he further aware that while many of them recognise that the intransigence of the NUT has brought about the situation, they look to the Government in general and to my right hon. Friend in particular to take a lead in bringing about an early solution to the problem?

Sir Keith Joseph: Yes, and some of the teachers' unions could end the disruption today. The Government have taken an initiative in the conditional offer that they have made.

Mr. Haselhurst: Does my right hon. Friend accept that there are two unyielding obstacles—the determination of the teachers to prolong the dispute and the non-availability of resources to make an increased pay settlement in 1985? Will he equip himself with the powers necessary to pursue the objectives which he rightly has, and bring an end to this damaging dispute?

Sir Keith Joseph: If the Government sought to equip themselves with powers, I doubt whether that would immediately end the disruption.

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Alan Howarth.

Mr. Hancock: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. My question is No. 2 on the Order Paper and I was informed that my question would be taken with question No. 1.

Mr. Speaker: The mistake is entirely mine. Mr. Hancock.

Mr. Hancock: Will the Secretary of State say whether responsibility for settling the teachers' dispute has been taken out of his hands by the Prime Minister? Will he inform the House what proposals she has laid before him for any solution to the dispute and of any initiative coming from her?

Sir Keith Joseph: The hon. Gentleman should not believe everything that he reads in the newspapers. The Government have no new initiatives to put before the House.

Mr. Howarth: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that it is the Government's desire that, as resources become available, teachers' salaries should more adequately reflect the great importance of their responsibilities and their high professional standards, but that one of the conditions for teachers enjoying such a high professional standing is that they should forswear the disruption of their pupils' education?

Sir Keith Joseph: I agree with the latter part of my hon. Friend's question. To ensure the recruitment and retention of the right quality of persons as teachers and effective teaching, the Government see it as necessary to provide an adequate pay and career structure.

Mr. Merchant: Is my right hon. Friend aware of the serious anxiety now being displayed by parents at the effective abandonment of children during lunchtime in many areas by the teachers' unions' withdrawal of supervision? Is he aware of the problems in Newcastle where, in some areas, children have been threatened with sexual abuse and assaulted during lunchtime because there is no supervision? What steps is he taking to ensure that local authorities use their maximum powers to ensure that alternative arrangements are made at lunchtime to provide supervision for those children?

Sir Keith Joseph: The House will be aware that the Government have introduced a Bill to enable local education authorities to make alternative and effective arrangements for midday supervision.

Mr. Spencer: Is my right hon. Friend aware that the National Union of Teachers has taken special selective action in the constituencies of some Members to whose views it has taken exception? Does he agree that that is an especially nasty and vindictive form of attack on innocent children?

Sir Keith Joseph: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I agree with my hon. and learned Friend. It is only a fraction worse than the general indifference to children's welfare shown by some teacher unions.

Mr. Flannery: The Minister says that the unions could end the dispute overnight. Why does he not say that the reality is that the Government could end the dispute overnight? Despite his gerrymandering of the Burnham committee, the teachers' unity will continue for a long time after Christmas because of the Government's intransigence in failing to pay teachers a professional wage and refusing to give them the status that they should have, which would be the way to get children back to school. He knows that as well as the House does.

Sir Keith Joseph: Why does the hon. Gentleman persist in ignoring the fact that after a mere 20 minutes the National Union of Teachers and other teachers' unions rejected the Government's initiative when they offered substantial increases, conditionally, of pay for good teachers?

Mr. Sean Hughes: Did the Secretary of State mean what he said when he told the hon. Member for Portsmouth, South (Mr. Hancock) that the Government have no intention of taking any initiative to bring this dispute to a halt?

Sir Keith Joseph: The Government have taken an initiative which the teachers' unions could request the employers to pick up again tomorrow if they wished.

Mr. Barnett: Is the Secretary of State aware that the NUT's demands, which if responded to by him would settle the dispute, are entirely reasonable? It has asked for the cost of living during the current financial year to be taken into account, for the relativities between teachers and other professions to be restored, that there should be an element in the settlement to take account of the fact that teachers have fallen far behind others, and that he should give a commitment that there will be an attempt in future years to restore teachers' salaries to the level of Houghton? Is that not reasonable?

Sir Keith Joseph: No, Sir. The NUT walked out of negotiations in December 1984 which might have provided additional finance from taxpayers for the current year.

Mr. Haynes: Why does the Secretary of State have a one-track mind? There are two arguments in this. Why does he not stop interfering, and let the unions negotiate and settle the matter? They will win in the end.

Sir Keith Joseph: It would be extremely satisfatory if some Opposition Members spoke up for the children.

Mr. Greenway: Is my right hon. Friend aware that I recently saw a deputation of parents whose children had refused to attend a detention imposed on them for misbehaving during the teachers' strike? Is that not understandable, but sad, silly and tragic? Has not the time come for teachers to stop damaging children's education and to go back to work, and for a proper inquiry, not just into pay, but into pay and conditions, to be held?

Sir Keith Joseph: I agree with the first part of my hon. Friend's question. I am not convinced that an inquiry, however broad, would automatically bring this disruption immediately to an end.

Mr. Janner: Is the Minister aware that of the many teachers whom I have met and who are now in dispute, every one regrets having to take what he or she regards as necessary action to protect his or her profession and rights? Is he further aware that the teachers deeply resent the sort of allegation that he has seen fit to make again today, that they do not look after the welfare of the children, about whom they care deeply, but that that does not prevent them from trying to ensure that their profession has a decent life and continues to attract the first-class people whom the Minister would wish it to attract?

Sir Keith Joseph: The teachers are men and women given by God free will, and it is their decision to disrupt children's education. There is no question of having to do that.

Mr. Cormack: Does my right hon. Friend accept that while nothing can excuse the victimisation of children that is taking place on such a wide scale, and while only the teachers can give a status to their profession, there is real merit in my right hon. Friend considering during the recess the suggestion made by his predecessor, our right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Warrington, South (Mr. Carlisle), who suggested the establishment of a review body to consider the whole issue, on condition that further action was immediately called off?

Sir Keith Joseph: The behaviour of teachers is not such as to recommend the Government to consider a review body. Moreover, it is perfectly possible for the employers and teachers to agree on pay that rewards good teachers, recruits and retains people of the right quality, and which is affordable.

Mr. Freud: Does the Secretary of State genuinely believe that he is doing enough to settle the teachers' dispute?

Sir Keith Joseph: If the hon. Gentleman has suggestions that would be affordable, would achieve the Government's purposes, and would end the disruption, I would gladly listen to them or read them. Of the options available to the Government, I believe that the right one is to persuade the teachers to do their duty by the children and to finish the disruption now.

Mr. Powley: Would my right hon. Friend care to reflect on the attitude of the general secretary of the NUT when in a 20-minute address to the Back-Bench education committee he never once mentioned the effect of the dispute on the children, whom we should consider primarily, nor its financial effect? Many of us see other areas for expenditure in the education service, such as on improvement in the capitation allowance, and in buildings, and on welfare in schools.

Sir Keith Joseph: I would not be surprised if that were true, and I am sure that the gentleman concerned remains self-righteous despite it.

Mr. Radice: With the dispute now in its 11th month, is it not about time that the Secretary of State took a fresh initiative? He has not moved since the beginning of August to try to end the disruption in our schools. Why does he not establish an independent fast-acting inquiry on teachers' pay, which many of us have been urging on him for many months?

Sir Keith Joseph: The employers also asked for an inquiry and the Government considered such ideas, but there is no reason to expect that an inquiry would automatically end the current disruption. I hope that the hon. Gentleman tries to bring the same persuasive power to bear on the teachers as he does on the Government.

CERN

4. Mr. Heathcoat-Amory asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he has yet decided on the level of future British contributions to the CERN project.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science (Mr. George Walden): My right hon. Friend has not yet reached a decision in this matter.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Is my hon. Friend aware that the CERN project is a rare example of a successful European collaborative venture that which will help to keep Europe in the forefront of world science? Does he agree that if we alone reduce our contribution we shall send all the wrong signals to the many other European countries involved, as well as damaging the project itself?

Mr. Walden: I agree with the first part of my hon. Friend's question and one of the first things that I did was to go to visit CERN for myself. It is a centre of excellence. It is no part of our intention to damage it, but we have taken serious note of Professor Kendrew's recommendations, and in his view it will be possible to save 25 per cent. of the expenses. I reaffirmed in my contacts with member states that the Government continue to place the highest priority on European collaboration.

Mr. Dalyell: Why did the hon. Gentleman say last night that it would be wrong to make a hasty judgment?

Mr. Walden: Because that is self-evidently the truth. Professor Kendrew reported in June. I am undertaking a round of consultations and so far I have talked to nine of the 13 Ministers of member states. That is not evidence of hasty judgments.

Mr. Freud: Are there not grave implications for international co-operative ventures such as might come with SDI? Would it not be more sensible to invest money than to withdraw from something as valuable as CERN?

Mr. Walden: Not for the first time, I fail to see the connection between two propositions that the hon. Gentleman has put.

Dr. Bray: Is the Minister's proposal for a joint independent review of CERN similar to that of the Kendrew committee, or is he considering a wider international review of particle physics research, in which the United States and the Soviet Union might participate? Does not the latter course open up wider possibilities of international co-operation?

Mr. Walden: For the moment, our objective is to secure a radical review of the CERN operations, but against a mental background of the kind recommended by the hon. Gentleman. I noted carefully the thoughtful comments that he made on this subject in last night's debate.

Teachers' Pay Dispute

5. Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will institute an inquiry into the arrangements for the remuneration of teachers and their conditions of service.

Sir Keith Joseph: On 11 December the management panel restated its view that a Royal Commission or some other kind of inquiry should be established to look into teachers' pay, structure, conditions of service and negotiating machinery. Naturally I will give careful consideration to that request, but I have to say that it is difficult to see how such action would produce an early resolution of the present dispute in view of the union's insistence on a settlement for 1985 without conditions, at a level which the employers cannot afford.

Mr. Chapman: While I hope that good sense will prevail, particularly on the part of the NUT leadership and the dispute will be brought to an end, I should like my right hon. Friend to be a little more forthcoming. Is there any good reason why he should not set up a short inquiry now, irrespective of whether the negotiations are successful, and in linking conditions of service and pay have such an inquiry, whether or not with the co-operation of the NUT?

Sir Keith Joseph: It is not self-evident that such an inquiry would bring to an end the present disruption. Discussions are taking place this afternoon between the employers and the teachers' representatives. I do not want to pin too much hope on what might emerge from the discussions this afternoon, but I repeat that an inquiry would not necessarily end the disruption.

Mr. Spearing: The Secretary of State said earlier that this was a bitter and damaging dispute, and he referred to initiatives. Does he agree that it was his initial initiative and the requirement to link appraisal and pay that has caused the length and bitterness of this dispute? Is not the Secretary of State's initiative responsible, therefore, for a high proportion of the bitterness and damage to which he referred?

Sir Keith Joseph: No, indeed not. I do not for a moment believe that my modest suggestion, which is agreed in principle by so many teachers as well as by so many members of the public, has any part to play in this dispute.

Mr. Alexander: I accept the constraints under which the employers must operate in this dispute, but is it not a fact that there is a great shortage of mathematics and science teachers? Is not this shortage likely to continue until arrangements can be made to make salaries attractive to graduates in those disciplines?

Sir Keith Joseph: Most certainly yes. One of the advantages of the offer that the employers made on 12 September, with the help of conditional additional money from the taxpayers, was precisely that it would have enabled employers to offer relatively attractive salaries to teachers who are in short supply.

Mr. Freeson: Whenever it is suggested that an independent inquiry of some kind should be set up—a suggestion that comes from both sides of the House and from outside—why does the Secretary of State keep on repeating, parrot fashion, the phrase, "It is not self-evident that such an inquiry would end the present disruption"?

Nobody is suggesting that it would, but just because it is not self-evident to the Secretary of State, must everybody else therefore be ignored? Why will he not shift just a little bit to meet the views of many people, of all persuasions, and make some kind of movement to resolve the present dispute?

Sir Keith Joseph: It is an indication of the irrationality of some of the unions involved in the dispute that makes the right hon. Gentleman accept the possibility that even an inquiry would not bring to an end the destructive damage that is being caused by the dispute to the education of children. It is often in the minds of hon. Members on both sides of the House that, if introduced, an inquiry would end the disruption. I believe that it is right to say that that is not self-evident.

Mr. Madel: Is it not time, after 11 months of dispute, that the teacher trade unions made use of the good offices of ACAS to try to resolve the dispute? Even though the full-scale intervention of ACAS would not necessarily end the dispute, it should lead, first, to a lowering of the temperature and, secondly, to an end to the industrial trouble while ACAS does its best to solve the problem. Why do the trade unions not go to ACAS and be seen to be trying to solve the problem?

Sir Keith Joseph: My hon. Friend makes very sensible suggestions, but they are, alas, for the trade unions and the teachers concerned, not for the Government.

Mr. Radice: Many hon. Members on both sides of the House, and people outside, will be deeply depressed by what the Secretary of State has said this afternoon. Why does he not put an end to the Government's muddle, indecision and inactivity over the teachers' dispute and announce that he has decided upon and agreed to set up an independent inquiry?

Sir Keith Joseph: For the umpteenth time—because I do not believe that it would fulfil the hopes of many hon. Members, and of many outside the House, who imagine that the teacher unions would then behave reasonably.

Student Grant

7. Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he has any plans to restore the student grant, in real terms, to its 1979-80 value.

Mr. Walden: No, Sir.

Mr. Alton: Will the Under-Secretary admit that yesterday's decision to increase student grants this year by only 2 per cent. will mean that by next year students will have sustained a cut in real terms of 20 per cent. since 1979, and that yesterday's decision to reduce students' housing benefit, unemployment benefit and supplementary benefit during short vacations will mean that in real terms £14 million will be cut from students' allowances during the next year, making a net saving to the Government of £20 million? Does he not accept that he is surreptitiously introducing by the back door the provisions of his Green Paper, against the wishes of his own Back Benchers?

Mr. Walden: I accept—because it is incontrovertible—that over the years there has been a cut in the grant to students, but the hon. Gentleman must accept that the number of students in this country is at an all-time high. Secondly, he must accept that students in this country benefit from the most generous system of support in the Western world. Thirdly, he must accept that the cost of that support must be shared among students, parents and the taxpayer.

As for benefits, I understand that a written answer on this question is down for reply tomorrow by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services.

Mr. Forth: Is my hon. Friend aware that our student grant system is the envy of many students throughout the world, who are expected to make a much greater contribution towards their education? Will he undertake again to review the possibility of introducing a loan system, which works perfectly satisfactorily in many other civilised, developed countries?

Mr. Walden: Let me elaborate on the cost of student grants in this country. The United Kingdom devotes a greater proportion of GNP to student support than do our major competitors. For example, it is twice as much as West Germany, two and a half times as much as the United States, and about seven times as much as France and Italy.

I assure my hon. Friend and the House that full consideration was given to all the implications of introducing a loan system, but it was felt that for a number of reasons it would not be right to introduce it at the present time. Two of the reasons were high initial costs and the effect on low income groups.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: Can we take it from what the Minister has said that the Government are now determined to reduce the record number of students by giving them inadequate support? Why, after six years in office, cannot the Government at least afford to maintain the level of student grants rather than cutting them by about 3 per cent. next year? Should not the Minister come clean and tell us what will happen to student grants as a result of the removal of the right to claim housing benefit during vacations? Does yesterday's statement that there will be some adjustment mean that the grant will be substantially below the amount that will be lost?

Mr. Walden: The hon. Gentleman must realise that there is no evidence at all to suggest that the fall in the value of the grant has resulted from a decline in the demand for higher education. Therefore, his first question falls heavily to the ground.

He asked why the Government could not afford to do better. If he took the trouble to look back, he would find that, unfortunately, there has been a steady decline in the value of grants ever since 1962. Perhaps this was another example of this country promising too much, too widely.

Although the hon. Gentleman referred to benefits, I am sure that he would not wish me to anticipate the answer that will be given by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services.

World Archaeological Conference

8. Mr. Stern asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he has any plans to meet representatives of the Association of University Teachers to discuss the proposed world archaeological conference; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Walden: No, Sir. No approach on this issue has been made to the Department.

Mr. Stern: Is my hon. Friend aware of the circumstances in which a major international congress, which would normally attract academics from all over the world, has been attacked by the Association of University Teachers, which wishes to define the countries from which people should be invited? Is he further aware that that attack had been backed up by the vice-chancellor of Southampton university, Dr. Higginson? In view of this attempt to blackmail academics into submission to the current political shibboleth, will he note that the guidelines issued yesterday by the Committee of Vice-Chancellors and Principals on freedon of speech in our universities are silent on this form of blackmail? Will he send them back, on the basis that they are totally inadequate?

Mr. Walden: I have, naturally enough, seen references to the ban in the press, but it is entirely a matter for the organisers of the world archaeological conference whether to impose one. I understand that the matter has not been considered by the senate or the council of the university and that no such condiion was proposed by the university. My hon. Friend suggests that we send back the guidelines from the Committee of Vice-Chancellors and Principals, which we received only this morning. I hope that he will give us time to read them first.

Crayford School

9. Mr. Evennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he has received any representations about the proposed closure of Crayford school.

The Minister of State, Department of Education and Science (Mr. Chris Patten): No, Sir.

Mr. Evennett: Will my hon Friend consider the proposal to close Crayford school carefully when it arrives on his desk for a decision, and take account of the wishes of parents and the local community? Will he also consider the problems that children will face if they have to travel a long way to another school?

Mr. Patten: I know what an informed interest in due course my hon. Friend has shown in this issue. I assure him that my right hon. Friend will want to take appropriate account of all representations from his constituents.

Schools (Internal Management)

10. Mr. Neil Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will introduce legislation to restrict the circumstances in which local education authorities may intervene in the internal management of schools; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: The Education Bill to be introduced this Session will include proposals to establish a consistent pattern in the distribution of functions between the governing body, the local education authority and the head teacher. The local education authority will not then be able to override the governing body or the head teacher in the discharge of the functions allocated to them.

Mr. Hamilton: I thank my hon. Friend for that reply. I am sure he will be gratified to learn that we are on the same wavelength. There is a widespread desire among parents to strike off the shackles of political control and make schools more autonomous. Can my hon. Friend confirm that the Bill will cover the circumstances such as have occurred at Poundswick school in Manchester? What happens in the meantime, until the Bill is passed? What protection is there for parents?

Mr. Patten: My hon. Friend has filled my cup to overflowing and I very much hope that he is a member of the Committee that considers the Bill. Irrespective of whether we are talking about Poundswick or other matters, what is at issue is not so much the powers held by different interests, as how they are exercised. When responsibilities are split, there is scope for unproductive conflict. That can never be entirely removed.

Mr. Alfred Morris: The Secretary of State wrote to me on 9 December about the dispute at Poundswick high school in Manchester. As today—17 December—marks the time limit for a reply from the Manchester education authority to the Department's recent letter, is there anything more that the Minister can say further to the reply that I received on 9 December?

Mr. Patten: We have not yet received a reply from the education authority. I quite understand the right hon. Gentleman's concern and we shall, of course, get in touch with him as soon as possible.

Mr. Lawler: If the Labour and Liberal groups had had their way in Bradford, Mr. Honeyford would have been summarily dismissed a long time ago merely for expressing views with which they happened to disagree. Will my hon. Friend give an assurance that, in the forthcoming legislation, opportunities for local authorities to dismiss school staff will be restricted?

Mr. Patten: I suggest that my hon. Friend awaits the Bill. I understand that the difficult and sensitive issue to which he referred has now been settled, but I deplore the way in which some extremists have aggravated a delicate situation in a way that is clearly not in the interests of children.

Youth Training Scheme

12. Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement about the educational content of the youth training scheme.

Mr. Chris Patten: The new two-year youth training scheme will give all trainees the opportunity to secure a recognised vocational qualification combining training and work experience with relevant education.

Mr. Pike: Does the Minister not understand that the Manpower Services Commission, YTS trainees and the Trades Union Congress aspire to a higher educational content in the YTS programme and that that cannot be achieved without additional funding? How can he expect the two-year programme to achieve a better standard of educational content with the same real terms funding as the one-year programme?

Mr. Patten: I do not accept what the hon. Gentleman has said. I shall send him a copy of the speech that I made to the further education staff college a couple of weeks ago.

Mr. Dorrell: Will my hon. Friend confirm that the object of the YTS is to provide a skilled labour force for industry? It may be important to provide extra funding for adult education, but is it not better to address that issue separately than to try to distract the YTS to provide the funds?

Mr. Patten: I take my hon. Friend's point.

Mr. Sheerman: Rather than sending us copies of his speeches, will the Minister take on board the fact that many of the disadvantaged youngsters in our community who are in what are now called premium places—which used to be called mode B schemes — on two-year schemes are in great need of a special sort of education content? Is he aware that they will not receive the education content that they deserve, because of the 15 per cent. limit? Many disadvantaged youngsters will not have a mode B or premium place scheme within the YTS. What will he do about that with his colleagues in the

Mr. Patten: I do not accept what the hon. Gentleman said. I think that he was straying into some of the territory of my right hon. and learned Friend the Paymaster General. I still think that the hon. Gentleman would find my speech quite interesting.

Mr. Meadowcroft: Is the Minister happy with the increasing infiltration of the MSC into education, which is provoking an artificial split between education and training? Surely it is important to recognise that any training given under a two-year YTS would qualify the trainee for higher education. Does not the split between the Departments impede that development?

Mr. Patten: The more I listen to the hon. Gentleman, the better I think my speech was. I do not accept his premise.

Free Speech

13. Mr. Maclean asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what response he has had from vice-chancellors and principals of institutions of higher education to the concerns that he has expressed over the suppression of free speech.

Mr. Walden: Higher education authorities have affirmed their support for the principle of free speech. The Committee of Vice-Chancellors and Principals yesterday published guidelines for the universities on freedom of speech and lawful assembly. My right hon. Friend welcomes this action and will consider whether the content of the guidelines raises questions that he would wish to discuss with the committee.

Mr. Maclean: I thank my hon. Friend for that reply. Is it not a fact that the report from the Committee of Vice-Chancellors and Principals said, in effect, "Of course we believe in free speech, but"? Did it not then produce a series of excuses for not being able to implement that belief in reality? Will my hon. Friend and the Government consider the prosecution of any student who is involved in incidents such as that which we saw at Manchester university involving my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Waddington), the Minister of State, Home Office?

Mr. Walden: The practical problems of ensuring that an individual speaker is given a fair hearing are formidable. The Government are grateful for the advice of the Committee of Vice-Chancellors and Principals. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State wrote to the vice-chancellor of Manchester univerity expressing his view that a refusal to give a hearing to a Minister who had been invited to explain Government policy cannot be defended. He noted that the university's declared intention was to take firm action in response to the incident at Manchester on 8 November. The university made it clear immediately after the incident that it would consider recommending its council to withhold a proportion of the student union's grant if the latter's full report on the incident and its causes was not satisfactory.

Mr. Conlan: Why does the Minister not inform his hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and the Border (Mr. Maclean), as the Prime Minister is fond of informing others, that prosecutions are for the police and have nothing to do with the Government?

Mr. Walden: The premise on which the hon. Gentleman's question was based is obviously wrong, but his assertion that criminal prosecutions are matters for the police is obviously right.

Parent Governors

14. Mr. Gerald Howarth asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what plans he has to ensure that elections of parent governors are fairly conducted; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: Under section 2(9) of the Education Act 1980, responsibility for the conduct of elections of parent governors is for the local education authority, except in the case of aided and special agreement schools, where that is for the governors. Any contested election has to be by secret ballot, but otherwise LEAs and governing bodies are free to make what arrangements are appropriate to their particular local circumstances.

Mr. Howarth: Does not my hon. Friend agree that there should be provision to provide for a quorum of parents? Does he not also think it a good idea that notices of the elections for parent governors should be published in the annual report of the school, not only so that parents can be given plenty of warning, but so that they can choose suitable candidates?

Mr. Patten: The greater the clarity, and the longer the warning of the elections, the better.

Teacher Appraisal

15. Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science by what means he intends that teachers should be appraised; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Keith Joseph: I should like to see teacher appraisal conducted at the level of the individual school by the teachers themselves, in accordance with general arrangements introduced and monitored by local education authorities.

Mr. Bruinvels: I welcome my right hon. Friend's commitment to proper teacher appraisal. However, is he aware that Fred Jarvis, the secretary of the National Union of Teachers, and various other high-ranking officials, are deliberately smearing his plan? They are suggesting that the assessment will be done purely on pupils getting better examination results, rather than teachers improving themselves in the school. Is that not a shocking approach?

Sir Keith Joseph: I do not agree with everything that Mr. Jarvis does or says, but I am informed that there is a good deal of unanimity of opinion between Mr. Jarvis and his union and the Government on the matter of appraisal.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Fallon asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 17 December.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today. This evening I hope to have an audience of Her Majesty The Queen.

Mr. Fallon: Does my right hon. Friend accept that there is widespread concern on the Conservative Benches about the moral implications of unprosecuted fraud, hidden evidence, and ill-made money, and that we welcome the rigorous steps proposed by her right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry at the weekend to clean up those parts of the City which the law does not appear to reach?

The Prime Minister: I agree with the views expressed by my hon. Friend. No one is more anxious than the Government to ensure that those who are guilty of fraud are brought to justice. The Lord Chancellor and the Home Secretary have just received Lord Roskill's report. It contains about 112 recommendations. We shall be considering it carefully. It is a weighty document, and we hope to be able to publish it next month.

Q2. Ms. Clare Short asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 17 December.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Lady to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Ms. Short: Will the Prime Minister admit that she and her Ministers have been seriously misleading the House and the country over the past three months in suggesting that the unemployment rate has been falling and that that development shows some improvement in the real economy when, in fact, the fall is caused by an increase in places on the Government community programme for the long-term unemployed? That programme has increased by just over 24,000 places. The seasonal drop in unemployment is only just under 16,000, so that in the real economy unemployment is still rising. When will the Government start to do something about real jobs in the real economy instead of just fiddling the figures?

The Prime Minister: I thought that the Opposition were in favour of a community programme and of training young people. I shall have to revise my views, because clearly they are not. Yes, there are 230,000 places on the community programme to help the long-term unemployed back into work. Yes, there are 30,000 unfilled places. Yes, we shall continue with the programme because we wish to continue to help the long-term unemployed.

Mr. Hannam: Is my right hon. Friend aware of the Labour party's policy to renationalise newly privatised industries, with compensation being given only on the basis of the original investment price? Does she agree that that is a disastrous threat to the millions of new shareholders?

The Prime Minister: Wider share ownership is a great principle of the Conservative party. The Labour party will have nothing to do with it.

Mr. Kinnock: In 1984 the Prime Minister promised "to protect the poor and those most in need."
What does she now say to the pensioner couple in their seventies, who will lose £3 a week? What does she now say to the middle-aged couple on a take-home wage of £75 a week, who are to lose £5 a week? What does she say to a 24-year-old single worker taking home £55 a week, who is to lose £12? How does she excuse the malice and immorality of that act of robbery against the people who are already poor?

The Prime Minister: What the right hon. Gentleman wants to do is to accept all the increases that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services announced yesterday, and to forget that there might have to be some losers—[Interruption.] There might have to be some losers—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister: The right hon. Gentleman wants to forget that there might have to be some losers. However, if he looks at the total expenditure, which is set out in the autumn statement, he will see that this year the total planned expenditure on social security is £40 billion, but by the year 1988-89 it is planned to be £46 billion. That is an increase of £6 billion, which will have to be found out of taxation and contributions by ordinary people.

Mr. Kinnock: Is it not about time that the Prime Minister honestly admitted to the country that more money is spent on benefits for the poor because her policies have made many more people poor? Is it not time for her to say to those whom she glibly dismisses as "some losers" that she could not live on £75 a week and could not tolerate a further loss of £5 a week? How can she defend taking money from people who are already desperately poor, when she knows that her objective is to give more to those who are already very rich?

The Prime Minister: As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said yesterday, the point of the proposals is to direct resources to the areas of greatest need. The new family credit will go to 200,000 more families with children than now have the family income supplement. The right hon. Gentleman wants to take the benefits and all the increases, and accept none of the consequences of redistribution. My right hon. Friend wants improved incentives to work, and he wants to ensure that commitments entered into can be afforded. With that in mind, he has put forward his proposals, and they will require an increase in expenditure over planned expenditure this year and expenditure in 1988 of some £6 billion, which will have to be found by the taxpayer. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will think that that is reasonable. If not, how much more would his plan cost?

Mr. Kinnock: Will the Prime Minister now tell us when it is right to increase the money given to the near destitute in this country? What on earth is the moral or economic justification for finding that money by stealing from the very poor?

The Prime Minister: Once again, the right hon. Gentleman has gone over the top—[Interruption.] I take it that he does not want any of the increases that are to go to families, that he does not want improved incentives to work and does not want to ensure that commitments entered into can be afforded. He wants to promise the earth and not say how it is to be paid for.

Mr. Hill: Does my right hon. Friend agree that although elderly people are interested in pensions and housing benefit, they are mainly concerned about the protection of their environment, law and order on their council estates, and the fear that they cannot safely open their doors in the evening? Will my right hon. Friend continue to reinforce the police and help the chief constables in the regions to have discussions with the communities on neighbourhood watch schemes?

The Prime Minister: I agree with my hon. Friend that elderly folk, along with others, are very much concerned with law and order, especially on the council estates. I think he will agree that under this Government old-age pensions have gone up by more than the cost of living, and that under this Government old-age pensioners have had their Christmas bonus every year, which was not the case under the Labour Government.

Q3. Mr. Terry Lewis asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 17 December.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Lewis: In the dispute between the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and the Secretary of State for Defence, whose side is the right hon. Lady on?

The Prime Minister: I am on the side of a company that is hoping to keep business going for its considerable work force, that has responsibilities to its shareholders and moral responsibilities to its work force, that must deal with its obligations to its bankers and that also has to consider the legal obligations of auditors. In the very sensitive situation that we now have, I suggest that it is left to the company to decide its future.

Dr. Hampson: Will my right hon. Friend go further and take this opportunity to correct the impression that emerged from yesterday's statement on Westland that the Government are backing the Sikorsky deal and confirm that for a long time the Government have sought greater collaboration among European armament manufacturers, which is particularly long overdue with helicopters?

The Prime Minister: Westland is a public limited company. It must take its own decisions. The Government saw that it had a choice. The board has legal obligations to the shareholders, it has moral obligations to the work force, the banks have their obligations and the auditors have their legal obligations. The people on the board are the only ones in a position to know all the facts. They must make their assessment and present that to the company.

Mr. Steel: Reverting to the first question to the Prime Minister this afternoon, since the deputy chairman of the Conservative party is reported to be acting as a character reference for the return of Mr. Postgate to Lloyd's, will she remind him and everybody else that the Government, like her predecessor's, stand against the unacceptable face of capitalism?

The Prime Minister: I have said that the Government have probably done more than any other to try to tackle fraud wherever it occurs. That will continue to be our policy. As I said, Lord Roskill's report has reached the Government. We are publishing today the White Paper on banking supervision, and the Financial Services Bill will be introduced later this week. We have done, and shall continue to do, everything possible. I suggest that the right hon. Gentleman does the City a great disservice by forgetting the number of jobs and the amount of income that it provides for Britain. He is trying to suggest that because some things may be wrong somewhere, that applies to the whole City. That is not correct.

Mr. Robert Atkins: While we are on the subject of aerospace, has my right hon. Friend noticed today that the figures for the British aerospace industry are £1 billion up on this time last year, representing a 23 per cent. increase, and of that some 60 per cent. are exports to the world? Does not she think that that is the jewel in the crown of British manufacturing industry?

The Prime Minister: I congratulate the aerospace industry on its excellent export record and would like to point out that other parts of manufacturing industry have done very well. Indeed, exports by manufacturing industry were a record last year.

Q4. Mr. Sean Hughes asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 17 December.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Hughes: Does the fact that the under-25 age group appears to be another group targeted for cuts in welfare benefits mean that the Prime Minister now accepts the view of the vice-chairman of the Tory party that too many young people will not get off their backsides and find work?

The Prime Minister: As I said earlier, no one has done more for youth training than have this Government. The one millionth youth trainee has now entered the scheme. [Interruption.] I am sorry that the Labour party treats these matters with such levity.

Q5. Mr. Freeman asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 17 December.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Freeman: Is my right hon. Friend aware of the excellent reception on the Conservative Benches of yesterday's White Paper, especially the proposal for a broader spread of personal pensions? Will she continue to preach the principles of thrift and the broader spread of financial assets?

The Prime Minister: I am glad that my hon. Friend welcomes the White Paper. It is meant, among other things, to give wider choice to those who wish to save through a personal pension scheme and build up a capital fund on their own account. It is also directed to help more effectively those in greatest need, such as young families, through the new family credit scheme, and to give improved incentives to work.

It means that the commitment that we enter into can be afforded. That is a matter to which the Opposition have given no attention since the last election. Indeed, since then they have already promised an additional £10 billion without specifying from where that will come.

Mr. Adley: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. You will have noticed that, during Question Time, once again the tactics of the Labour party were to shout down my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister at every opportunity—[Interruption.]—as they are trying to do to me now. Will you please use your influence to protect this House from the barbaric tactics of the Opposition?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The noise during Question Time today was rather greater than usual, so I agree with the hon. Gentleman on that point.

Banking Supervision

3.31 pm

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Nigel Lawson): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement.

I am publishing today a White Paper setting out the Government's proposals for strengthening banking supervision, with a view to bringing a new banking Bill before the House early in the next Session.

The proposals contained in the White Paper reflect the vital importance that this Government attach to effective supervision. They build on the findings of the review of banking supervision that I set up exactly a year ago today under the chairmanship of the Governor of the Bank of England, in the wake of the Johnson Matthey Bankers debacle. Six months later, when the group's report was published, I told the House that the Government were minded to accept its two key recommendations. I can now confirm that both will be implemented.

First, the new legislation will extend to banks the higher supervisory standards that Labour's 1979 Banking Act applied only to licensed deposit takers, and not to recognised banks. That means that the so-called two-tier system will go. I have, however concluded that it would be right to confine the use of the name "bank" to institutions with at least £5 million in paid up equity capital.

Second, the Government will do whatever is needed to permit effective two-way communication between supervisors and bank auditors. If this can be done on the basis of agreed professional guidelines, underpinned by statute, well and good; if not, we shall not hesitate to take appropriate further powers.

However, assisted by the extensive consultations that have taken place since I made my statement to the House in June, I have become convinced that it would be right in a number of respects to go beyond the Leigh-Pemberton committee's recommendations.

The key to better supervision is the organisation and ability of the supervisors themselves. Last October, the Governor announced changes in the Bank's organisation to give supervision a higher priority. To carry that further, he will now set up, as soon as possible, a new board of banking supervision within the Bank of England. The board will be given statutory backing in the forthcoming legislation. It will be chaired by the Governor, and a majority of its members will be experienced practitioners from outside the Bank of England. That will bring independent outside expertise to bear at the highest level and give more forceful direction to the task of bank supervision. The board's views will be separately identified in the Bank's annual report, which I lay before the House.

Second, supervisors cannot do their jobs unless they have adequate, accurate and timely information. That was one clear lesson of the JMB affair. Under the existing legislation, it is not a criminal offence to mislead the supervisors, even if this is done knowingly or recklessly. I propose to make it one—with appropriate penalties.

As I told the House in June, one of the most conspicuous reasons for JMB's failure was that it was over-committed to a small number of closely related borrowers. Building on the Leigh-Pemberton committee's recommendation, I propose to make it a statutory requirement for banks to notify all such exposures in excess of 10 per cent. of their capital base; and all exposures in excess of 25 per cent. will require prior notification.

Important as they are, rules of this kind are not enough. Supervisors need to have a better knowledge of individual institutions at first hand. I therefore welcome the steps that have recently been taken to increase the frequency of supervisory visits to banks, on a routine basis as well as where there are grounds for prudential concern.

The nature of banking is changing fast and the supervisory system has to keep up with it. We cannot prescribe for every eventuality in advance. In particular, there is a risk that new forms of deposit-taking may fall through the supervisory net. I therefore propose to take powers to vary by secondary legislation the definition of deposits and deposit-taking around which the legislation will continue to be structured.

I am also very conscious that banking supervision can no longer be considered in isolation. The Government are urgently considering the supervisory problems posed by the growth of financial conglomerates. One of the most obvious requirements is that those who supervise banks should be able to exchange information with other supervisory authorities. Legislation this session will make that possible. Changes in the confidentiality requirements, including those in the Banking Act, will be secured through the financial services and building societies Bills this session.

The details of these and other proposals are in the White Paper. They represent a considered, full and prompt response to the real lessons of the Johnson Matthey Bankers affair. The system of supervision we will be putting in place will be strict, without being a straitjacket. The proposals avoid the pitfalls of unnecessary bureaucracy and administrative upheaval. They also avoid the danger of setting out rules so rigid that they encourage compliance with their letter but not with their spirit.

As I told the House in June, an effective system of banking supervision is essential, not merely for the protection of depositors but for the financial health of the economy as a whole. Effective supervision is also a vital weapon in the fight against fraud, which the Government are determined to do all in their power to combat. Supervision cannot eradicate risk—nor should it—and it must not stifle competition. Nor, above all, can it derogate in the slightest degree from the overriding responsibility of managers to run their businesses soundly and properly.

Together with the Building Societies Bill, to be read for the Second time on Thursday, and the forthcoming financial services legislation, I believe that the proposals outlined in this White Paper will help to create a comprehensive and effective statutory framework for a rapidly changing financial services sector.

I commend the White Paper to the House.

Mr. Roy Hattersley (Birmingham, Sparkbrook): Does the Chancellor realise that outside the City and the Tory party the proposals that he has outlined will be regarded as grossly inadequate, a reflection more of the City's views and values than of the growing concern about supervision of the City in general and the banking system in particular? Will he understand that confidence will not be restored while the duties of supervision essentially remain within the Bank of England? Negligence in the Bank of England contributed to the Johnson Matthey scandal. When asked to report on the lessons learnt from that affair, an inquiry dominated by the Bank of England made recommendations that even the Chancellor rejects; yet the power of supervision is to be given to the Bank of England.

[Mr. Roy Hattersley]

While the Chancellor, in his own words, retains the powers "within the Bank of England", some of the proposals that we welcome and some of the proposls that our pressure brought about — such as the statutory backing and the extension of the criminal law to cover the misleading of supervisors — will be seen as generally inadequate.

I ask the Chancellor the basic question relating to his statement: Why must the board of banking supervision remain in the City's own club? Why can it not be created outside, with all the additional confidence that its independence would provide?

Will the right hon. Gentleman answer some specific questions? For example, when the supervisory body is told of an exposure of more than 25 per cent., what powers will that body possess? If it discovers that the bank in question is over-exposed, what can it do about it other than note it and worry about it?

What changes does the right hon. Gentleman propose in the confidentiality requirements? When shall we hear of them, and when will they be passed into law? Indeed, does he appreciate the need for speed in this operation and the need to introduce the new legislation—the statutory backing — quickly to overcome any feeling that the Government do not want to tackle this matter urgently?

Do the Chancellor and the Leader of the House appreciate that the whole question of the supervision of the City is now such a matter of national concern that a debate in the House is urgently needed? Are they aware that, if the Government will not give time for such a debate, the Opposition will provide it at the first opportunity?

Mr. Lawson: My response to the right hon. Gentleman's last point is that I have set out in the White Paper important matters which I recognise the House might well wish to debate. However, that is a matter for the Leader of the House.

The right hon. Gentleman's categorisation of the measures which I have outlined, and which are outlined more fully, as inadequate, is wholly and completely untrue, but we shall, no doubt, have an opportunity to discuss that in the context of the forthcoming Bill.

The right hon. Gentleman asked some specific questions and made allegations about the Bank of England, allegations which I wholly reject. The JMB affair was a lapse, but a lapse from a very high supervisory standard which the Bank of England has carried out— [Interruption.]—over a number of years and which is recognised as such throughout the world.

The legislative framework which I am now tightening was put in place by the Labour Government. That framework, the 1979 Act, was inadequate. It took them five years—from the secondary banking crisis of 1974 until 1979—to legislate. I am proposing to legislate twice as fast after the JMB affair.

The right hon. Gentleman asked what the supervisory body could do. It has the ultimate power to revoke the licence of any bank to take deposits, and that is a very profound sanction indeed.

The answer to the right hon. Gentleman's question about the confidentiality requirements—I assume that he was referring to the relationship between auditors and supervisors—is that he will see them set out in annex 4 at the back of the White Paper.

Sir William Clark (Croydon, South): Is my right hon. Friend aware that many people, in the City and throughout the country, will welcome the strengthening of the 1979 Act, particularly in bringing the banks under control and especially in view of the imminence of the Financial Services Bill?

Is he further aware that the flexibility between auditors and supervisors should ensure that any misdemeanour, or suggestion of misdemeanour, involving any deposit taker, be it a bank or any other deposit taker, will be immediately recognised? A two-way movement of information, from supervisors to auditors and from auditors to supervisors, will ensure that, if an investigation is necessary, it will be speedy and accurate. That should be wholeheartedly welcomed by the House and the City because it is essential to ensure that the integrity of the City is maintained.

Mr. Lawson: My hon. Friend is right. Communication between supervisors and auditors is an entirely new departure. Up to now, supervisors have not communicated with auditors and auditors have not communicated with supervisors. That will be changed, and I am grateful for the help of the various accountants' bodies in co-operating fully with the changes that we have in mind. Normally that communication will take place in the presence of the bank in question, but there is provision in exceptional circumstances for the communication to take place directly between the supervisors and auditors.

Mr. Ian Wrigglesworth (Stockton, South): Is the Chancellor aware that some of us argued long before the Banking Act 1979 was put on the statute book that the Bank of England should not be responsible for banking supervision? Will he therefore reconsider the role that the Bank of England will play? Although the establishment of the new board is a welcome step, will he confirm that all its members will be appointed by the Governor of the Bank of England? Does he agree that it would be much better if the Bank of England carried on its role as a central bank like other central banks and that the supervisory function should be carried out by an independent board? Will he consider that possibility? Will he also note that the other provisions in the statement are a welcome strengthening of the present regime?

Mr. Lawson: I note the points made by the hon. Gentleman. As a member of the Labour party, he was a supporter of the Bankers Act 1979. Appointments to the board of banking supervision will be made by the Governor, but they must be made with my approval. I believe that that answers his point. Whether the supervisory authority should be the central bank is a fair point. If the hon. Gentleman reads the annex to the White Paper about overseas experience, he will see that in some countries the supervisory authority is the central bank but that in others it is not. As we have always had the Bank of England as the supervisory authority, I believe that it is better to build on and strengthen that authority rather than to have a tremendous upheaval which I do not believe would be warranted or fruitful.

Mr. Terence Higgins (Worthing): Does my right hon. Friend agree that his statement will be greatly welcomed, because those of us who are anxious that the City's reputation should not be damaged by abuses of the system feel that the steps that he proposes will be helpful? Would it not be extraordinarily dangerous at this stage to set up an entirely separate organisation with no experience of those matters rather than to build on the Bank of England's foundation? Will he give us an assurance that we shall not have to wait for the legislation to be introduced before positive steps are taken to improve the present position?

Mr. Lawson: My right hon. Friend is correct, and I welcome his remarks. Steps have already been taken. Mr. Sidney Proctor has been appointed special adviser on supervision to the Governor. He is an extremely experienced and distinguished commercial banker who has retired and can devote a great deal of time to the matter. The Governor has also strengthened numerically and in other ways the Bank of England's banking supervision department. In addition, the establishment of the board of banking supervision will not have to wait for the legislation. The Governor proposes to get on with that straight away.

Mr. Brian Sedgemore (Hackney, South and Shoreditch): Bearing in mind that this statement arises in large measure out of the wanton negligence of Robin Leigh-Pemberton, the Governor of the Bank of England, how can anyone place any trust in a system of supervision organised by that appalling deadbeat? Is it not time that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had the bottle to tell the Prime Minister that Pemberton is not merely a disaster; he is a disgrace?

Mr. Lawson: There has been a great deal of talk about fraud of one kind or another. Fraud must be rooted out wherever it is found. Fortunately, it takes place only in exceptional circumstances in the City of London. It is wrong to imply otherwise.

The biggest fraud so far exposed is the hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Mr. Sedgemore). He poses as the man who got things moving. [Interruption.] Listen to this. He did not even start—Hansard will show that this is so—his seemingly unending series of allegations until after my statement of 17 July informing the House that the fraud squad had already been called in. By engaging in a scurrilous McCarthyite smear campaign under the cloak of parliamentary privilege to further his sordid political objectives, the hon. Gentleman is succeeding only in damaging the good name of the City to the delight of our competitors overseas, and in impeding the police in their attempt to bring wrongdoers to court, as the police have already pointed out to him. To describe the hon. Gentleman as a pest would be unfair to pests.

Sir Peter Tapsell (East Lindsey): While any illegalities must be vigorously hunted down and their perpetrators suitably punished——

Mr. Sedgemore: You snivelling little git.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I prefer not to hear all of that.

Sir Peter Tapsell: Those of us who most abhor the scandals in the City at present sometimes find the interventions of the hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Mr. Sedgemore) to be counter-productive. While any illegalities must be hunted down and their perpetrators suitably punished, should we not, even in the present political atmosphere, be careful to bear in mind that the Bank of England is an extremely important national asset, particularly in the international sphere where on many occasions it has saved past Labour Governments? Indeed, if there is ever another, Labour Government, they will probably look to it to save them again. Should we not bear that in mind when scoring short-term party political points? My personal belief is that the Bank of England is, in the British context, the appropriate body to continue to conduct banking supervision.

Mr. Lawson: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. As he will have heard, I reached the same conclusion.

Mr. Ron Leighton (Newham, North-East): Will the Chancellor of the Exchequer explain where market forces end and fraud begins?

Mr. Lawson: If the hon. Gentleman does not know that, he is not fit to be a Member of the House.

Sir Peter Hordern (Horsham): Will my right hon. Friend consider whether it should be the duty of the auditors of the day to report independently to the bank's supervisors without the knowledge of the bank, if necessary?

Mr. Lawson: That is a difficult question, and my hon. Friend is right to raise it. I believe that that would place considerable difficulties in the way of auditors. My conclusion is that it is better to adopt the normal procedure, and that the auditor and supervisor should have their dialogue in the presence of the bank in question, while reserving powers, if need be, in special circumstances for there to be a direct dialogue between auditors and supervisors without the presence of the bank.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Will the Chancellor consider adopting in the Bill the principle that I have been advocating for defence contractors who make excess profits, whereby if an employee identifies fraud he should be compensated from the public purse?

Mr. Lawson: The hon. Gentleman is an assiduous Committee member, as I know from experience on many occasions in Standing Committees on Finance Bills of old, and I am sure that he will find himself in Committee on this Bill, when he can make that point. However, I do not think that that would be a sensible proposal.

Mr. Peter Rees (Dover): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the Governor of the Bank of England is a distinguished and honourable public servant who deserves better of the House than to be traduced by the vulgar criticisms of the hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Mr. Sedgemore)?

Mr. Lawson: I agree strongly with my right hon. and learned Friend. It is appalling how the hon. Gentleman seeks to traduce the Governor of the Bank of England, the Bank of England and the entire City of London to further his political objectives. It can mean only that people in Tokyo, Frankfurt, Zurich and other places will laugh all the way to their banks.

Mr. John Ryman (Blyth Valley): Will the Chancellor consider calmly and quietly for a moment what real sanctions there are, apart from the ultimate sanction of revocation of the licence, if the supervision board finds negligence or fraud? A complaint to the police takes a long time to investigate, and the resources of the fraud squad are far too limited to cope with the mass of complaints that emerge from time to time and that require thorough and lengthy investigation.

Mr. Lawson: As I announced, the legislation will create a new offence of misleading the supervisors for which there will be severe penalties, substantial fines or imprisonment. I announced as far back as July 1984 the Government's decision to set up a fraud investigation group, which was before the Johnson Matthey Bankers affair, and which has considerably strengthened the Government's and the authorities' resources for pursuing fraud wherever it may be.

Mr. Alex Fletcher (Edinburgh, Central): I welcome my right hon. Friend's statement, but I should like to press him a little further on the question of resources. I am sure that he will agree that more staff will be needed and will have to be sufficiently qualified as accountants, lawyers, bankers and others, not just in banking supervision but in insurance and other things as well. Can he assure the House that, in attracting people of the right quality, there will be no Civil Service-type restrictions on the grades at which they can be employed so that they can come into the business and do a proper job?

Mr. Lawson: It is important that those who are engaged in the seeking out and prosecution of fraud, whether in the Department of Trade and Industry or in the Department of the Director of Public Prosecutions, must be of sufficient calibre, and that is something that the Government will unstintingly seek to achieve.

Mr. Allan Rogers (Rhondda): Will the Chancellor accept that his proposal will be seen by the public at large as following the old principle of "set a thief to catch a thief"? Will he suggest ways in which he might undertake some positive screening of the people who will be on the supervisory board?

Mr. Lawson: The hon. Member should know that I have suggested a considerable strengthening of the system of banking supervision, which has a good record. That is widely acknowledged throughout the world. The JMB affair was a lapse from its high standard. The measures that I have announced will strengthen it still futher and make it better than any other banking supervision system.

Mr. Tim Smith (Beaconsfield): Are not these proposals tough and comprehensive — much more so than anything proposed by the Labour Government of which the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) was a member? Is not the real danger that, if we go too far, 2 million jobs and £6 billion worth of exports will be threatened as financial services companies move offshore?

Mr. Lawson: My hon. Friend is right—there is a real danger of that. I do not ask anybody to pronounce now, but I hope that when hon. Members have read the White Paper and seen what is proposed they will desist from uninformed criticism, which can only be bad for the country.

Mr. Stuart Randall (Kingston upon Hull, West): I am sure that the Chancellor will agree that the various fraud cases about which we have heard recently have reduced in the eyes of the British public confidence in the City and all the other institutions. Does he agree that, in order to regain that confidence, it would be desirable to publish some of the findings of the new board of banking supervision? Will that happen, and, if so, to what extent?

Mr. Lawson: The board of banking supervision will make an independent report of its own, to be contained within the annual report of the Bank of England. What it chooses to report will inevitably be governed by the laws concerning banking confidentiality.

Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark (Birmingham, Selly Oak): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the Bill that he has announced today could be tough, along with the Financial Services Bill, and that the need for that is because of the huge financial conglomerates that will come about and may spawn things of which many in the City will not have experience? Bearing in mind also that the Bank of England is an adviser to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, would it not be a sensible move if the Chancellor imported into his Department some people of great expertise in the City—although not those who are likely to go back to the City, who may have something else to gain? Would it not be a good idea if three or four people who have spent their lives in the City and understand it and the Treasury were there so that they could give five to seven years of good advice to prevent many of these things from happening? In the end is it not right that the buck stops here? Whenever there is a scandal, the Government cannot say that it has nothing to do with them. If it is in the end, therefore, to do with Government, is it not better for the Chancellor to have his own team of experts on hand to handle his advice?

Mr. Lawson: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I am quite sure that he means well, as he always does, but I have to say two things to him. First, I have every confidence in my officials in the Treasury. Secondly, the duty of supervising British banks is not laid upon the Treasury but is laid, and will be quite clearly laid by the legislation to which I have referred, on the Bank of England. Therefore, there will be a duty laid on the Bank of England to have supervisory staff of the appropriate quality and calibre and also to have independent outsiders to ensure that there is a strengthening of the enforcement of supervision at the top.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have to protect the subsequent business of the House. The Chancellor announced that there will be a debate. However, I draw to the attention of the House the fact that there will be an opportunity tomorrow to debate this matter on the Consolidated Fund Bill under item no. 3.

Mr. Rob Hayward (Kingswood): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. May I ask that during the Christmas recess you should ask that your amplifiers should be looked at, given the language used by the hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Mr. Sedgemore), aimed at the Chancellor of the Exchequer? It described him as a snivelling little git. It was clearly audible in the Chamber and such language is clearly disgraceful and unparliamentary.

Mr. Speaker: Order. In a highly charged atmosphere I did not hear all that was said and I do not think that it was directed at the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Although it may not, in strict terms, be unparliamentary language, it is not the kind of language that we want to hear in civilised debate.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. You probably heard the Chancellor of the Exchequer say in response to the question of my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch

(Mr. Sedgemore) that questions on these matters had not been put down until July. May I remind you that I put down questions on 23 October 1984? For that reason, I thought that there might be a chance to explain that in a question to the Chancellor.

Mr. Speaker: That is bad luck on the hon. Gentleman. However, he is one of the hon. Members who has applied for a debate on the Consolidated Fund, and he stands a very good chance of being called.

Mr. Richard Holt (Langbaurgh): Further to the point of order raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Kingswood (Mr. Hayward), Mr. Speaker. Whether or not the atmosphere was charged, the remark was clearly audible throughout the Chamber. Will you use your good offices, Mr. Speaker, to call upon the hon. Gentleman to withdraw it?

Mr. Speaker: Order. First, I do not know which hon. Gentleman made that comment. Unfortunately, or perhaps fortunately, under this canopy I do not hear everything.

Mr. Sedgemore: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. In view of your reference to civilised debate in the House, I wonder whether you could strike a balance between an East End epithet and an allegation. I have told the truth. Since when has the truth been a McCarthyite smear?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must say to the hon. Gentleman and to all other hon. Members that we should take great care about imputations concerning the characters of others who are not in the House.

Supplementary Benefit (Board and Lodging Payments)

4.3 pm

The Minister for Social Security (Mr. Tony Newton): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement about the position concerning supplementary benefit board and lodging payments following the Court of Appeal decision last Friday.

As the House will be aware, the court upheld Mr. Justice Mann's decision in the Divisional Court on 31 July that there was no power to make two paragraphs of the regulations passed by the House in April. The court rejected a cross appeal that the Social Security Advisory Committee had not been properly consulted before the regulations were made.

The House will wish to know that the Government do not intend to appeal further. We shall take steps to identify from our records those cases in which arrears may be due because we did not meet the full charge, and to pay these arrears as soon as possible. To this end, we have sought and received from the court today further guidance on how such arrears should be assessed.

I should make it clear that the Court of Appeal judgment does not affect the current benefit position of those in board and lodging. Those payments are covered by the fresh regulations agreed by the House last month which came into effect on 25 November.

Mrs. Margaret Beckett (Derby, South): Is the Minister for Social Security aware that his statement, both in its nature and in its perfunctory length, is an insult to the House and, much more than that, is an insult to the thousands of elderly, handicapped and vulnerable people who have been illegally cheated and short-changed by the Government since the regulations came into effect? How dare the Minister come to the Dispatch Box to make that statement and utter not one word of apology or explanation for all the suffering that has been caused. It is not even as if the Government can complain that they have not been warned. Initially when the regulations were introduced the Social Security Advisory Committee heard from over 500 organisations that wrote to condemn the proposed regulations. It was the largest number ever to condemn such proposals, apart from those who wrote to condemn the Fowler reviews.

We should like the Minister to say, first, whether it is the case, as he claims in his statement, that the Government sought clarification from the court or whether, as we have been informed, the Government tried once again to put pressure on the court to weaken the judgment that had been delivered so as to deprive claimants. Will the Minister admit that if the Government had accepted the plain implications of the judgment—that cash limits also are illegal—not only would many claimants have been saved hardship but his Department's task in identifying those who should have repayments would have been made singularly easier?

Secondly, will the Minister tell us how his Department proposes to trace those who are owed money? Does he understand that it would be completely unacceptable and grossly unjust to place the burden of the claim upon individuals rather than upon his Department in seeking to identify them?

[Mrs. Margaret Beckett]

Thirdly, how far back does the Department intend the repayments to go? The clear implication of the Court of Appeal's judgment is that everything that the Government have done on board and lodging since the freeze in September 1984 has been illegal as well as completely unjust and unworkable and that everybody who has had a claim since then may be entitled in law to a refund. May we therefore have an assurance from the Minister that the cases will be dealt with on that basis? May we also have an assurance that the local authorities, who may have been giving topping-up payments, will have reimbursed to them the several hundreds of thousands of pounds that it has cost them and that they and the claimants will be compensated for all the problems that have been caused?

At this point in this extraordinary saga of incompetence, arrogance, injustice and illegality, will the Minister tell us what confidence anybody can have—indeed, what confidence he has—in the legality of the present regulations, which are also being challenged in the courts and which we have told him repeatedly we do not believe meet the basic issues raised by the Cotton case? Do the Government yet recognise that the nature of the problem is the increase in homelessness and the increase in the numbers who are in need of care and that the Government should be seeking to help, not to penalise, those whose problems their policies have at best exacerbated and often may have caused, especially those who are physically and mentally handicapped, who stand to be affected next April by the present regulations?

Finally, will the Minister tell the House that his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services is now considering withdrawing the regulations—not, as before, in order to do nothing whatever for months and then to rush them through, without consultation, as an emergency at the last minute, but so that he may properly consult his own Social Security Advisory Committee and the many organisations that are anxious to help to solve the problem by tackling its source, not by punishing its victims?

Mr. Newton: May I take the hon. Lady's questions roughly in reverse order. It was precisely because we were concerned to protect those vulnerable people to whom she referred that we sought to introduce fresh regulations a month ago. If the hon. Lady considers both the judgment and what I said when I introduced the regulations last month she will realise that the judgment has vindicated our decision to ensure a clear position for claimants when the judgment was delivered. Otherwise it would have called into question many of the payments that are currently being made to those who are in residential care and nursing homes. In that sense the Government are very aware of the problems expressed by the hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett).

The hon. Lady asked about the legality of the present regulations and compensation for local authorities, an issue that has been raised by at least one local authority. She will know that both issues are the subject of current legal proceedings and the House will understand when I say that I do not think it right to comment further on such matters.

The hon. Lady also referred to the freeze regulations that preceded the April 1985 regulations. I remind her that that was not a specific issue and the position is not on all fours with the April 1985 regulations.

The main thrust of the hon. Lady's points involved the Government's proposals to pay the arrears and their purpose in seeking clarification from the court this morning. The Government intend and expect to be able to identify the relevant claimants from the records. Ever since the original Cotton judgment in July, the Government have ensured, for obvious reasons, that such cases were kept separately marked in local offices so that we could trace and identify cases quickly should the need arise. Arrears have, of course, already been paid in cases affected by the time limits. We shall act with equal promptness to identify cases and pay arrears in relation to the judgment on financial limits.

The Government were particularly anxious to achieve clarification on two particularly important issues, and I hope that the hon. Lady will accept that that was done in good faith this morning. First, we sought clarification as to whether there was any maximum at all in the light of the judgment made last week. As I explained to the House when this matter was last debated in November, it was not entirely clear whether the outcome would mean that the old local limit system under the 1983 regulations came back into effect or whether there would no longer be an effective maximum between April and November. That point has been clarified by the court and there is no maximum between 29 April and 24 November in these cases.

The other point, to which the hon. Lady will probably attach more importance, is that one possible interpretation of last week's judgment was that young people would not qualify as boarders and that they would have to be reduced to the non-householder rate from 29 April to 24 November. It has been established that it is proper for these people to be regarded as boarders and therefore to pay them as boarders and to discharge the obligation on arrears as soon as possible.

Sir Anthony Kershaw (Stroud): While I accept that public money was being extracted by many people, will my hon. Friend nevertheless bear in mind that a minority have suffered gravely as a result of the regulations? The people who have particularly suffered are those who have no family of their own and have made a new family by living for some years in lodgings. I trust that he will remember those people because they need his help.

Mr. Newton: I assure my hon. Friend that we shall bear that group in mind, as we sought to do with the regulations that have now been partly overturned and in the fresh regulations that were brought before the House in November. We shall continue to do everything to protect those people.

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead): On behalf of Simon Cotton, my constituent who took the Government to court over this matter, I thank the Minister for his statement this afternoon.

The Minister must be aware that his policy has been declared illegal and unlawful, twice by the courts and that that policy has resulted in some young people being made homeless, many being underpaid and others moving around the country in an attempt to claim benefit. Will the hon. Gentleman explain what measures he will take to trace the claimants? He spoke about keeping records since the Cotton judgment. What steps is the Minister taking to trace the 60,000 or 70,000 claimants who attempted to claim benefit prior to the Cotton judgment?

I would like the Minister to look to the future. He confidently asserts that the Government's current regulations are lawful, but he must be aware that the Cotton success paves the way for the present legislation to be challenged in the courts. He must also be aware, and should have told the House, that when the Government's lawyers said that they might appeal to the House of Lords, the Lord Chief Justice said that if they had the nerve to return he would reject that application out of hand.

Is the hon. Gentleman aware that on Friday 13 December Camden council obtained leave for a judicial review against the current regulations? There is a large question mark over the Government's current proposals. Surely it would be advisable for the Minister to follow the advice that is constantly offered by the Opposition. In our opinion, he cannot gain the powers by regulation; he needs to seek primary legislation and he will gain the Opposition's support if he deals with the abuse that undoubtedly exists, particularly if he concentrates on the landlords.

Mr. Newton: I thank the hon. Gentleman for the characteristic generosity of his opening remark. However, I did acknowledge, although I did not refer directly to Camden, that there were further court cases in process. That was why I did not feel that it was correct to comment, as they are manifestly sub judice.

I have already explained what action will be taken to trace claimants. Plainly, we cannot directly trace through the records people who did not establish claims, and for whom no record exists. But if cases arise they will be considered, though I emphasise that in these cases, as in others, it is not for Ministers but for adjudication officers to decide what the entitlement may be within the current available guidance on the law.

Mr. Robin Squire (Hornchurch): I welcome the news that my hon. Friend is not proceeding further with legislation in that particular aspect of the regulations. None the less, as other areas of the regulations are being challenged, will he undertake that if or when he is convinced that the current regulations are flawed he will come back either with new regulations or, if necessary, with new primary legislation?

Mr. Newton: I assure my hon. Friend and the House that the Government will continue to ensure that their obligations to Parliament and to the court's rulings in such matters will be faithfully adhered to. As all hon. Members will agree, the Government responded very rapidly in the appropriate cases to the original Cotton judgment. By my statement today I hope that I have made it clear that the Government intend to respond with equal rapidity to the Court of Appeal judgment last week.

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): I also welcome the Minister's statement, although I reiterate the opposition of the alliance to a system that is particularly pernicious in the way that it affects young people.

Let me press the point made by the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field). The Minister said that his Department was contacting the claimants who had outstanding money due. Does that mean that claimants will be written to individually? When will the local offices get confirmation that that is what the Minister requires of them?

Can the hon. Gentleman also say how much money is at stake, as my arithmetic suggests that a considerable sum of public money is involved? In future, when the Minister is considering changes in the system of delivering benefit — everyone can argue about the benefit levels, which can be changed by secondary legislation and nobody objects to that — will he learn a lesson and make changes by primary legislation so that the implications can be properly rehearsed in the House?

Mr. Newton: The hon. Gentleman has made that point in several different forums within the past few hours and he will have heard what my right hon. Friend said to him recently in another forum on that wider matter. We shall certainly do our best to contact claimants by whatever means. Writing will normally be the most appropriate means——

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): What addresses will the Minister send the letters to?

Mr. Newton: I shall deal with the intervention from the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) when I have dealt with the original question.

Writing will normally be the most appropriate means, and that will be a responsibility of our local offices. We are proceeding urgently with the issue of instructions to our local offices, but at present I cannot give the hon. Gentleman an exact time by which those instructions will go out. However, I point to the precedent earlier in the year followng the original Cotton judgment, when we acted within a week to get instructions out and completed the payment of arrears within two months.

For obvious reasons, I cannot at present give the hon. Gentleman estimates of the numbers of claimants who will be entitled to arrears or the amount involved, but he may like to know that, in the case of the time limits, we have paid arrears in 8,500 cases, and the total amount of money involved has been just under £250,000.

Mr. Roger Gale (Thanet, North): Does my hon. Friend recall that the regulations were originally introduced to curb the abuse of a system which was designed to help the elderly but which was being abused by unscrupulous rest home owners? Does he also recall that young people were being exploited by unscrupulous landlords? Many Conservative Members believe that my hon. Friend acted entirely honourably and are extremely grateful for the action that he took last summer. Will he assure the House that he and his Department will take whatever action is necessary to prevent any recurrence of the sort of abuse that we faced last summer?

Mr. Newton: I am grateful to my hon. Friend and I assure him that we shall continue to prevent abuse in this area. I am also grateful to him for acknowledging that, whatever the concern about the policy in the past, it must be right for the Government firmly to hold to their obligations to the courts and the findings of the courts in the way that I have indicated this afternoon.

Perhaps I can do the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras the courtesy of responding to his sedentary intervention. Clearly, we shall seek to correspond with people at the addresses that we have on file, but there will manifestly be a problem if we are unable to trace claimants. However, by making this statement, I hope that they will become aware of what has happened. We are now talking not about people who have necessarily been moved on but about cases in respect of the financial limits.

[Mr. Newton]

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): With my experience of being Parliamentary Private Secretary to the late Dick Crossman 17 or 18 years ago, I have the feeling that Alan Marre or the late Dame Muriel Riddesdell and their lawyers would have warned the Secretary of State. At any time did any of the hon. Gentleman's lawyers or senior civil servants give him some kind of premonition of the Cotton judgment and that what he was doing might be ultra vires? My experience of the Department was that those lawyers, who are jolly clever and competent, would have warned the Minister. Did not they do so in this case, and did not the Minister have an inkling that this would happen?

Mr. Newton: The convention is that Ministers do not normally refer in detail to the advice that they receive, but I hope that the hon. Gentleman will recognise that Ministers——

Mr. Dalyell: Were you warned?

Mr. Newton: In view of the imputation that the hon. Gentleman is seeking to make, I would be grateful if he would listen to the end of my sentence. I hope that he will accept from me that it would be inconceivable—if he does not, I can only assure him with all the emphasis at my command—that neither I, the Secretary of State nor anyone else would deliberately have proceeded to maintain regulations that we were advised were unlawful.

Mr. Tony Baldry (Banbury): Is it not somewhat bizarre that, whenever the High Court rules against a Government Department, the Opposition shout that the Minister concerned has broken the law, as if that Minister had deliberately offended against the criminal code? Surely the reality is that English law is now so complex that there will inevitably be occasions when the High Court will be asked to interpret legislation and the actions of Government Departments. On occasions it will rule against Government Departments and on others it will rule in favour. The protection for us all is that there is a High Court that seeks to protect the interests of all citizens by interpreting the laws and ensuring that nothing unlawful is carried out.

Mr. Newton: I am grateful to my hon. Friend and I agree with what he says. A number of people both inside and outside the House may have overlooked the fact that these regulations were submitted to the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments in the normal way. Their vires were not questioned by the Joint Committee and they were passed by Parliament in an affirmative vote.

Mr. Lewis Carter-Jones (Eccles): In view of the admitted difficulties involved in tracing the claimants, will the Minister give an assurance that he will give generous time limits so that people can claim the arrears?

Mr. Newton: We will expect to deal with this in as open and fair a way as possible to make sure that we pay arrears to those to whom they are due. The House can certainly have my undertaking that we shall do that.

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. This is to do with the answer that we have just received——

Mr. Speaker: Is it a continuation of it?

Mr. Faulds: No, it is a quite different point, but it is relevant to what we have just been told. Can we for once break with the conventions of the House and agree that, since they cannot defend themselves, the response to the question by my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) should come from the Civil Service Box?

Mr. Speaker: The point of order was addressed to me, not to the Minister, and it is not a matter for me.

Colliery Review Tribunal

4.26 pm

Mr. John Ryman (Blyth Valley): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 10, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the continuing failure of the independent colliery review tribunal to deal with urgent appeals relating to collieries threatened with closure immediately after Christmas."

In Bate's colliery in Blyth, 1,400 men will be made redundant if it is closed, as proposed by the NCB. I recognise that I must persuade you, Mr. Speaker, that this matter is so urgent that it should have priority over the business that has already been arranged. In view of recent developments, my respectful submission is that, although this tribunal was set up by the NCB in October this year, since then it has been quite impossible to obtain any information from the Government as to the procedure of that tribunal which will hear appeals against pit closures.

I have asked the Secretary of State for Energy and the Leader of the House several questions about the procedure of this tribunal, but both Ministers, doing their incompetent best, were quite unable to answer them. No one knows how this tribunal will function or even how it will be contacted. We do not know whether it will sit in London or in the region. Consequently, it is quite impossible to make adequate preparations to present a case against pit closure, either by the unions involved or the Blyth Valley council which is vitally interested in the outcome of these appeals. No statement has been made by the Government and no opportunity has been given for a debate, as a result of which the whole thing is extremely unsatisfactory and is surrounded in mystery.

The urgency of my application is demonstrated by the fact that Bate's colliery will close on 27 December, just two days after Christmas Day, and I hope to persuade you —I appreciate the high onus of proof on me—to allow this matter to be discussed this afternoon or this evening, because unless we have some information about the work of the colliery review tribunal, it will be quite impossible to prepare a case.

The NCB has been conducting a deliberate, systematic and fraudulent campaign to delay these procedures as long as possible, in the hope that, with Christmas overtaking events, the coal mining community in my constituency will then not have sufficient time to do anything about it. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to consider this matter seriously before coming to a decision.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member for Blyth Valley (Mr. Ryman) asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that he thinks should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the continuing failure of the independent colliery review tribunal to deal with urgent appeals relating to collieries threatened with closure immediately after Christmas".

I have listened with care to what the hon. Gentleman has said, but, as he mentioned himself, my duty under Standing Order No. 10 is to consider whether a subject should be given priority over the business already set down for this evening or tomorrow. I regret that I cannot find that the matter which he has raised meets all of the criteria laid down under Standing Order No. 10 and, therefore, I cannot submit his application to the House.

Business of the House

Motion made, and Question proposed,

That, at this day's sitting, if proceedings on the Motion relating to Register of Members' Interests have not been disposed of before Ten o'clock:—

(1) Mr. Speaker shall at that hour put the Question on any Amendment which may have been moved, and shall then put forthwith the Question on any other Amendments selected by him which may then be moved, and on the Main Question or the Main Question as amended; and

(2) notwithstanding the provisions of Standing Order No. 4 (Prayers against statutory instruments, &c. (negative procedure)), the Motion relating to Water may be proceeded with, though opposed, for one and a half hours after it has been entered upon.—[Mr. Lennox-Boyd.]

4.29 pm

Mr. David Alton (Liverpool, Mossley Hill): I do not intend to detain the House but this is a unique opportunity to raise an important procedural principle. I welcome the decision to change the order of business this evening so that there might be four Divisions on the amendments that you have selected, Mr. Speaker.

This is an important principle and I welcome the precedent which I hope will be extended to other occasions. We take the view that, apart from the Queen's Speech, which is the one chance every year when we are able to debate a second amendment and vote upon it, we far too rarely have the opportunity to debate and vote on other shades of opinion. Far too often our views are polarised and we are forced to accept black and white issues when there are often many shades of grey. Back Benchers who may hold a dissenting view rarely have the opportunity to table their amendments or debate them, so Front Bench views are often the ones that are set in concrete, and Back Benchers are invariably forced to vote upon them.

The present arrangements do not allow for the multi-party system which now operates. We have a multi-party system but it is stuck in a two-track groove. At present, even though our amendments may be tabled and appear on the Order Paper, they are not printed in the Official Report, thus the public are unlikely to learn of views other than those of the two Front Benches.

This issue was last examined in 1976 by the Procedure Select Committee. At that time, many Labour Back Benchers supported our view. I know that many hon. Members agree that such opportunities should be provided on other occasions. It should not be necessary to bring the Leader of the House here to table a business motion. We believe that such provision could be left to the discretion of Mr. Speaker. The Standing Order could be changed so that Mr. Speaker selects two or more amendments which might be voted upon automatically at 10 o'clock. It would be in the interests of all Members not to be penned in by the practice of always voting for or against set piece positions. If what we are debating today were common practice, it would improve the quality of our debates and political life. I support the motion.

4.32 pm

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): Courtesy requires me to acknowledge what the hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) has said. I am sure he would not expect me to go beyond that except to observe that, the longer I talk at this Box, the more I shall eat into the time available for the debate on Members' interests. I leave it at that.

[Mr. John Biffen]

Question put and agreed to.

Fire Precautions (Amendment)

4.33 pm

Mr. Tony Lloyd (Stetchford): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the Fire Precautions Act 1971 to extend provision to hospitals, nursing homes, elderly persons homes, mental institutions and similar premises; to limit the time available to occupiers or owners under the Act for bringing premises up to standard; to make further provision relating to the installation of sprinkler systems in public buildings and other places of public assembly; to ban the use of polyurethane foam in furniture; and to provide for educational and publicity programmes.

It is a sad irony that it requires a major disaster before the House amends the fire regulations. This year, we have had the Ringway airport disaster and the Bradford football ground fire.

Last Christmas in Bury, Greater Manchester, a family of eight and a family friend died in a tragic fire accident because Christmas wrappings fell into the fire grate and set the suite of furniture ablaze. Thus nine people died because of toxic fumes given off by the polyurethane foam that was used in that suite of furniture. It is a chilling prophesy, but it is likely that this Christmas we shall once again read of young children or indeed whole families dying in fires in similar circumstances.

The Home Office, in its review of fire policy in 1980, argued:

"loss of life through fire is insignificant".

However, in 1984, 700 deaths were caused by fires in England and Wales—550 took place in the home and approximately three quarters of them were caused by the poisonous fumes given off by smouldering polyurethane foam. The Home Office, in its review of the Fire Regulations Act 1971, stated:

"Although our present arrangements may bear favourable comparison with other countries, there is no room for complacency."

That is right, but the sad truth is that the Home Office has been extremely complacent in updating our fire regulations.

The deaths in Bury and, to some extent, at Manchester airport would not have taken place if the lessons of another disaster in Manchester had been learnt—the fire in Woolworth's in May 1979. Ten people died and a further 48 were injured. That disaster led to demands from Members of Parliament and the city of Manchester that something be done to tackle the problem of poisonous fumes as a considerable number of the deaths were caused by the fumes emitted from blazing furniture in the furniture department. It was said that the fire regulations were difficult to enforce and that it was difficult to prosecute Woolworth's because it had not been given time to bring its fire precautions up to scratch.

That is one of the reasons why this Bill would prevent prolongation of the period during which dwelling or company was allowed to bring its precautions up to scratch, thus preventing what happened with Woolworth's.

Woolworth's learnt from that disaster and, on re-opening the store, ceased to stock polyurethane foam-filled furniture and installed sprinklers. The Home Office, having threatened regulations, brought in the modest regulation—the so-called cigarette test—which tests whether furniture will catch fire when a cigarette is dropped on it. The Home Office failed to introduce the other part of the regulations which were promised—the so-called match test.

The regulations which the Home Office brought in, nominally as a result of the Woolworth's fire, would not have stopped that fire taking place. They did not stop the fire taking place in Bury last year. The majority of the 500 deaths due to polyurethane foam-filled furniture could have been prevented, however, by adequate regulations in 1980 and if the Home Office had not acted so complacently.

This Bill would bring in the match test and other more stringent fire precautions for furniture and lead to the banning of the use of polyurethane foam in furniture. The Bradford football disaster is still fresh in the memories of hon. Members. Fifty-two people died but many believe that lives could have been saved if sprinklers had been installed at the ground. That is why my Bill would require the installation of sprinklers in relevant circumstances. There is another simple lesson to be learnt from Bradford. Self-regulation, which Bradford operated, does not work. The Home Office has argued that efficient precautions are the most cost-effective way in which to ensure the safety of people and property, but it is going in precisely the opposite direction by attempting to introduce self-regulation. My Bill insists that regulation should be extended to elderly persons' homes, mental institutions, hospitals and nursing homes.

Most people's thoughts turn to children and the home at Christmas. The House ought to turn its attention to the protection of children by introducing more adequate regulations to prevent the outbreak of fire. The Fire Brigades Union has said that the Bill will reduce deaths and injuries. I hope that the House will give me leave to introduce the Bill as this is an important issue throughout the year.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Tony Lloyd, Mr. Ken Eastham, Mr. Andrew F. Bennett, Mr. Jim Callaghan, Mr. Terry Lewis, Mr. Peter Pike, Mr. James Lamond and Mr. Lewis Carter-Jones.

FIRE PRECAUTIONS (AMENDMENT)

Mr. Tony Lloyd accordingly presented a Bill to amend the Fire Precautions Act 1971 to extend provision to hospitals, nursing homes, elderly persons homes, mental institutions and similar premises; to limit the time available to occupiers or owners under the Act for bringing premises up to standard; to make further provision relating to the installation of sprinkler systems in public buildings and other places of public assembly; to ban the use of polyurethane foam in furniture; and to provide for educational and publicity programmes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 14 February and to be printed. [Bill 50.]

ESTIMATES DAY

[1ST ALLOTTED DAY]—considered

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES 1985-86

Class II, Vote 7

Overseas Aid

Motion made, and Question proposed,

That a supplementary sum not exceeding £1,000 be granted to Her Majesty out of the Consolidated Fund to defray the charges which will come in the course of payment during the year ending on 31st March 1986 for expenditure by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Overseas Development Administration) on the official United Kingdom Aid Programme including capital subscriptions, other contributions and payments under guarantees to certain multilateral development banks and other bodies; subscriptions and grants in aid to certain international and regional organisations; bilateral capital aid and technical co-operation; refugee and other relief assistance; the cost of in-house Scientific Units; assistance, including grants in aid, to certain UK based institutions and voluntary agencies; loans to the Commonwealth Development Corporation; and pensions and allowances in respect of overseas service.—[Mr. Raison.]

4.41 pm

Sir Anthony Kershaw (Stroud): We are approaching the festive season and this is a very good opportunity to discuss the wants of others. The Foreign Affairs Select Committee considered the famine in Africa and visited five countries. We were deeply depressed by much of what we saw and impressed by the knowledge that a great deal of the horror and the disaster could have been avoided.

I say that the disaster could have been avoided, but I do not imply that the Governments or people of those countries have been stupid, negligent or idle. We must not understimate the real difficulties that they face while we are in our comfortable society. Many of them have a climate which is not especially favourable to agriculture and they have been plagued with drought for almost 10 years, which has successively eroded the defences of the people who live there. They have lost their land, their beasts, their houses, their possessions and finally their money. They are in no way able to protect themselves from disasters unaided.

Those factors have been made worse by a rapidly rising population which would have had its effect on what is at best marginal agriculture, even if natural disaster had not taken its toll. Political circumstances after the colonial era have always been uncertain. The roll call of successful and unsuccessful coups and rebellions would have been enough to distract any Government from peaceful and progressive purposes. Political reasons have often determined the distribution of such food as they have. It has often been directed to the urban population and close political supporters rather than to the weak and poor rural populations far away from main towns whose interests have been correspondingly neglected.

They all have an administrative apparatus which is far too weak to withstand the difficulties that they have experienced, and it is often far weaker than they themselves suppose. The Select Committee was struck by repeatedly being told in one country that the administration was so widespread and flexible that instructions from the centre could be transmitted instantly to the furthest villages in the land. I do not know how anybody could have harboured such an illusion. The telephones did not work and communications were disrupted by rebellion. Whatever administrative apparatus that had been left behind by the colonial power had been completely eroded. The skills and communications necessary to run a country which needs a great deal of running simply did not exist. Immensely difficult choices have to be made in these weakened circumstances in such matters as exchange valuations, subsidies and resource allocations—choices that any country might find difficult. Above all, we found that agricultural policies discouraged farmers and made it less likely that they would grow the crops on which the rest of the country depends.

[Sir Anthony Kershaw]

Any right hon. or hon. Member could have divined the problems that I have described, but we are entitled to say that more effective policies shall be followed in future. The Select Committee was encouraged by the fact that the countries concerned now recognise, especially in view of the Harare declaration, that different policies regarding agriculture would be in the interests of all of their countries. I hope that such decisions will now be taken, difficult though they may be. I hope that longer-term development can take priority over short-term expedience.

I was glad that, in their observations on our report, the Government recognised fully the greater importance of development as opposed to emergency aid. To what extent has our development aid programme been lamed by emergency aid expenditure on famine? My right hon. Friend the Minister, whose wise conduct of these affairs we all admire, says that development aid has been affected very little or not at all. He said in July last year that the development programme had not been affected by emergency aid. He repeated that statement in October. I find it hard to share his optimism.

We all recognise that there is slippage in the ODA programme. We cannot expect all of its schemes to run exactly on time and it is necessary to budget for a slippage towards the end of the year. If slippage must occur, however, must it amount to £86·5 million? That rather large slip is the estimated United Kingdom expenditure on famine relief in Africa. However, I freely concede that my right hon. Friend the Minister for Overseas Development could contradict my figures, because they are so difficult to calculate. The figures on which we rely are concocted from different sources and on different dates, so a double estimate or no estimate could cover the same prices.

Nevertheless, it is unreal to say that the £86 million that we have been forced to expend on famine relief will not affect the development aid programme. In the last resort, money for food aid must be deducted from development aid. Certainly part of the money voted to the ODA was originally destined for emergency aid, but not to the extent of £86 million.

The Select Committee on Foreign Affairs concluded that it would only be fair to the development aid programme if new money were brought in. I am sorry that apparently that has not been possible. I say apparently, because it is difficult to follow how the calculations are made. Perhaps the emergency aid has not harmed the development aid programme to the extent that I have suggested. If I am wrong, it is because I cannot understand how the ODA arrives at its figures. I look forward to my right hon. Friend's reassurances.

There was some new money. It was used by the Royal Air Force in its effective airlift to the difficult areas of Ethiopia, which ended today. That exercise cost £8·25 million, and no doubt has done much good in areas that would otherwise have starved. It is a tribute to the RAF that, as usual, the programme was carried out so efficiently. It is a tribute to the Ministry of Defence, which is not everyone's favourite when it comes to charity, that it provided the money.

The European Community Dublin summit vote of 1·2 million tonnes was a new and welcome move. The United Kingdom has participated fully in the delivery of that grain.

We provide more in famine relief to Africa through the European Community than we do bilaterally. This year bilaterally we gave £42 million worth of food aid and £47 million through the European Community. The Community made a slow start and it was rightly criticised by the Committee and others for that. However, the Community has now got its act together. The various titles of EC committees do not suggest by name that they address themselves specifically to these matters, but undoubtedly the problem has been gripped by the organisation and it appears now that the administration is running smoothly. I am sure that that is welcome.

However, I have criticisms of the European Community. It must realise that famine relief is not a method of supporting European agriculture, principally because of the cost. One year's storage of a tonne of grain costs £25. The cost of shipping that grain to Ethiopia is £250—10 times as much, as hon. Members will readily calculate. To store the grain indefinitely, or even eventually to throw it away, would cost only half as much as it would to give the grain to the starving countries. The European Community's preferred policy of transporting European grain is not in the best interests of the needy countries or of Europe.

The second reason why it is better to buy grain abroad, perhaps from the developing countries, is that the aid arrives more quickly. If the grain is bought nearby, it can be transported quicker than by sending it from Europe. If it is bought from a developing country there is a double benefit, because the country is provided with the foreign exchange that it so badly needs.

According to the recent harvest reports, stocks will be available in Africa this year. I hope that the system of buying those surplus stocks and sending them to needy areas next year will be adopted. I believe that the required food stocks will be available, whether from American, European or local sources. Then the main problem will return. The real reason why people starve to death in Africa and elsewhere is not because they are hungry, although that has something to do with it, but because of poverty. India, which is now an exporter of food, suffers as much from malnutrition, and death from hunger, as it did when it was an importer of food. That is a problem with which it is difficult to cope.

My third criticism of the European Community is that it relies too much upon food aid and attaches too much importance to it. If food aid is supplied instead of foreign exchange, that is indeed as good as foreign exchange and should not be despised. But the Government reply to the Foreign Affairs Committee states:

"Most food aid from the European Community is given to recipient Governments to sell in urban markets."

That activity will continue to create more difficulties for the provision of long-term agriculture development. I am glad that

"the Government will continue to press for more rigorous appraisal and co-ordination of non-emergency food aid."

During the past 18 months, we have learnt many lessons from the crisis that has engulfed parts of Africa. One lesson is that he who gives quickly gives twice. I hope that the ODA's emergency unit, which has earned much praise for its flexible and quick action, will be provided with more funds.

The famine in Africa is a nightmare for the world. It is terrible for Africa and we have a guilty conscience because we believe that we should have seen it coming and that we should have done more. It is a blessing that the famine is now receding, but let us hope that our precautions for the future will ensure that it does not return.

4.49 pm

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): The hon. Member for Stroud (Sir A. Kershaw) and his Select Committee have done a great service to the House. They have produced two reports, one of which appeared earlier in the year and provided a detailed survey of famine in Africa. Secondly, there is the report which considers the Winter Estimates and casts some light on the dark and difficult area of Government statistics. The House has been well served also by the all-party group on overseas development, which published its own critical document. I hope that its severe criticism of the Government in some respects will not cause the Government to do anything other than benefit from the challenging thoughts and ideas which it contains.

It has been said by a United Nations official:

"The rains have recovered; Africa has not",

and that is currently the position. A number of the countries most severely affected by drought have experienced considerable improvements in weather conditions. Some of them, by a combination of that and food aid, are now in a much better position for the immediate future than they were months ago. Other countries continue to experience climatic difficulties. All still face the fundamental, long-term problem of dealing with what could be recurring famine and recurring hunger if we do not ensure that proper development assistance is given to them.

Aid at the basic level of subsistence farming is the priority which emerges from the Select Committee's report and from the all-party report to which I have referred. It is upon that that we seek to press the Government, and others may do so in their contributions. A restoration of the priority of basic agriculture work and assistance to the farmer to grow his own food must be the key to the solution of the problem that exists in most of the countries about which we are talking. That has implications for the domestic policies of those countries as well as for the aid which we provide.

Unfortunately, aid has suffered in the very areas in which we should be most concerned. Aid to basic development has suffered at the expense of other considerations, such as trade-related assistance of various forms, which has as its priority as much the promotion of our own trade, however desirable that may be, as the interests and basic agriculture of the country concerned.

The all-party group quoted a ministerial comment that it was to become policy to give greater weight in the allocation of our aid to political, industrial and commercial considerations alongside our basic developmental objectives. I submit that we should not be giving greater weight in the allocation of our aid to political, industrial and commercial considerations, however attractive those are in other contexts. If we do — and we must remember that, even if all our ambitions are achieved, our aid budget will remain limited—we shall not best serve the interests of the poor and hungry in the countries that we want to assist. Our industries and exporters can fight their battles and their campaigns for trade, and they can and should be assisted by various governmental activities, such as export credit, that are relevant. However, such considerations should not be a guiding factor, given the absolute priority of assisting long-term development. It is against that background that there have been cuts, which the Government have admitted, in long-term research staff, long-term development staff and in activities that are most relevant to helping basic subsistence farming. The developing trade-related side of aid activities is one area which has inhibited the basic and important work of development aid, and it is one that should be reversed.

The second factor which has played a part in limiting the amount of basic development aid has been, as the hon. Member for Stroud said when he opened the debate, famine relief itself. I do not think that anyone questions the competence with which the Government tackled the task of providing famine relief when they got down to it. Many of us, including the hon. Gentleman, criticised the Government for the time that they took to get the show on the road. However, when the real commitment was made, the work which was done was excellent. Plenty of tribute is due to the Overseas Development Administration and those who work within it for the way in which the work was carried out.

The criticism that emerges again and again is the effect that the diversion of resources will have on the rest of the work of the aid programme, especially basic development work. In the Select Committee's report on the winter Estimates there is a pointer to the difficulty of identifying what the money would otherwise have been spent on if it had not been diverted to aid. It is the Minister's plea that most of the famine relief moneys were found out of existing development programmes and that the development programmes of other areas of the world were not raided for it. It is claimed that the resources were found from slippage, from money which was not spent on other projects. It is extremely difficult to identify where the moneys would otherwise have been spent. The Select Committee and others who have commented have all said that we must assume that most of the moneys would have been spent on more basic development work of the sort which is so lacking. It is in that area that a greater commitment is required from the Government.

The public are aware of that. They are aware of the general problem and of the specific difficulties which arise. They appreciate the need for basic development work. Voluntary aid organisations have done much to inform the British public of the nature of the problem. Indeed, they are doing more and more all the time. That is another reason why development education work should be supported.

There has been a tremendous out-pouring of public generosity. I have in mind the Live Aid movement and all its associated activities, and the related boost in the work of almost all the voluntary agencies which work in the field. Impressive work has been done by schoolchildren, in many instances of a notably well-informed sort. Associated with studies at school into the conditions of the countries which need assistance, they have undertaken voluntary work to target specific help to particular overseas projects. I find it moving to see how young people and children have become involved in this work and how they have set out to inform themselves and come to understand more about it.

[Mr. A. J. Beith]

I recall the 20,000 who participated in a lobby of Parliament. That is an example of massive public support and commitment. I can remember—I am sure others can as well—the days when one canvassed during elections and found that it was common to meet someone on a doorstep who asked, "Why is all this money being given to other countries? Shouldn't we concentrate on our problems at home?" I find that that is said less and less and more and more people understand that the fate of the hungry in the world is something about which they should be concerned on moral grounds. They understand also that they have every reason to be concerned about the issue if they care about the future peace and stability of the world.

A genuine transformation in public opinion has taken place. There will always be those who take the narrowest and most nationalistic, short-sighted view, but there has been a major change in public opinion upon which the Government, Foreign Office Ministers and Treasury Ministers should build. The task is easier for them now in justifying the enlargement of their budgets than it has been during certain periods in the past. There is a generosity in the public spirit which they should be seeking to match.

It is an improvement that the Minister, in his November announcement, suggested that there would be level funding for the overseas aid budget in the next few years if his inflation assumptions were accurate. I am not convinced about the accuracy of his assumptions about inflation, but the announcement showed some willingness on his part.

Many of us who take part in this debate will want to see Britain move positively nearer to the United Nations target, from which we have slipped back so disastrously over the past few years. If there are signs that we are to move in the right direction, let us seize on them. However, inflation is always higher than the forecasts of Governments, and I fear that we shall not achieve level funding and that we shall not see positive movement in the direction of the United Nations target.

Whatever is to be the amount of money that we spend, it is crucial that we examine how we spend it. We must assert the priority of basic agricultural development work. I accept that many other things are needed apart from the aid that we can provide. The task of tackling the debt problems of the poorest countries is a high priority for international considerations as well as for Britain's. The hon. Member for Stroud made a telling comment when he said that people die not merely because they are hungry, but because they are poor. There is the problem of poor countries and the problem of poor sections of countries' populations. That is one of the reasons why Socialist and Marxist philosophies often have a certain appeal in the poorest countries. Any Government of any poor country who took a narrow view of what the state should do would probably not be serving the interests of their people. However, it is discovered quickly that when Socialist and Marxist philosophies are implemented in some of the poorest countries, they have a tendency to produce an enlargement of rather top-heavy and bureaucratic state machinery and not equalisation or a reduction of poverty.

Mr. Stuart Holland (Vauxhall): What about China?

Mr. Beith: China is engaged in a remarkable process of reform. It is cleaning out its administrative system. It is a process which many of us admire. Labour Members should not be so quick to become defensive. I have raised a problem which they should recognise. Different political philosophies face different difficulties in the Third world. I contend that those which are heavily Socialist in their emphasis tend to end up producing a top-heavy state machinery and buttressing that by curtailing individual liberty to protect that machinery. Many of them do not reduce poverty.

The result is not usually the eradication of that individual poverty which makes many people hungry. Those countries that forswear the Socialist path, stick to a pure capitalist course and make the assumption that the power of the state should be narrowed tend to make no contribution to the eradication of poverty, or make a contribution limited to the success of those who are able to prosper under a capitalist system. No political philosophy has provided a ready-made solution for the Third world. In all the countries new routes have to be found which embrace a recognition of what the state has to do, with some awareness of its limitations and dangers. It is significant that the simple solutions proffered by both sides of traditional politics have not solved the problems.

There are problems of policy for many of the countries concerned, not just in general political philosophy but in areas such as agriculture. The Harare declaration has been mentioned. That is one sign that there is a realisation in some of the countries that agricultural policies designed mainly to produce cash crops were, in most cases, the wrong avenue to pursue. Different avenues will now have to be taken and there will have to be changed priorities.

Although many of the areas of policy will be relevant to the solution of the problem of famine, it will continue to occur in countries where climatic conditions have dramatic effects unless we cater for those problems by contributing to basic agricultural development in a way that allows people to produce their own food and feed their own families. That must be the priority of overseas aid policy, and I urge it upon the Government.

5.11 pm

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): I declare an interest in this subject because I serve as chairman of the British-Somali parliamentary group and of the Horn of Africa Council. Both of those bodies are acutely concerned about the famine in the north-eastern part of the African continent.

In November 1984 I visited the refugee camps along the Ethiopian border with my right hon. Friend the Member for Brighton, Pavilion (Mr. Amery) and a former Member of the House, Colonel Billy McLean. As a consequence of that visit, my right hon. Friend the Minister for Overseas Development was able to announce a £1 million emergency programme for the relief of refugees within the eastern part of Sudan within a calendar month.

The visit brought home to me a fact that will be all too deeply embedded in the consciousness of right hon. and hon. Members, that in so many instances famine is as much a consequence of human evil, of internecine bloodshed, of civil war and politics as it is of the accidents of geography, topography, of agriculture and of climate. It is to the political dimension that I shall address my remarks.

When we visited the camps on the eastern frontier of the Sudan there were, at that stage of the emergency, two clear categories of refugees coming across. They were coming across like ships out of the mist. One saw groups of tattered persons and families, sometimes with animals and sometimes without. The Eritreans had a common story to tell. They had been bombed and napalmed out of their villages and in some instances actually driven out of their villages by the operations of the Ethiopian army. If left to themselves the food problem would have been tolerable but the combination of civil war and an adverse harvest were insupportable and they had to move away into Sudan.

The Tigrean refugees told a somewhat different tale. Most of them were elderly or extremely young. The able-bodied seemed to have been left behind to till the fields but insufficient crops were likely to be grown to support whole families. Within five minutes of our arrival an old man died at our feet. This was the pattern that seemed to be continuing for a long time to come.

Since that visit in November 1984 the political problems within Ethiopia have not improved. It is common knowledge that the Ethiopian Government have been giving assistance to the civil war in the south of Sudan. That civil war, combined with the burden imposed upon the already tottering economy of Sudan, led to the downfall of President Numeiri and the installation of the interim provisional Government in Khartoum. Unfortunately, a political solution has still not been found for the civil war in the south of Sudan in spite of the mediatory efforts made by the new authorities in Khartoum. This is sad and tragic because as a consequence of the continued conflict there are more refugees and there is a continuing relief problem in the south of the country.

In neighbouring Chad the problem is not much better. The climate has taken its toll and the famine has been severe. The news reports from Paris suggest that the Libyan-backed parties in the north are massing their forces again and the Government in N'Djamena are worried lest civil war should break out once more. At the beginning of the refugee movement from Chad into the western part of Sudan a good proportion of the refugees were driven out because of the civil war in Chad.

At the other side of Ethiopia, in the eastern part of the Horn of Africa, there is a continuing difficulty in that self-determination for the Somali people within Ethiopia has not been possible. Some 700,000 Somali refugees were driven out of the Ogaden region. To this day the Ethiopian air force conducts raids across the border and attacks villages in Somalia. That makes it harder to repatriate Ethiopian refugees.

There are serious political problems throughout the whole of the Horn of Africa, which is one of the most impoverished parts of the continent, and I bring those problems to the attention of the House. It is against that troubled and disturbed background that I ask the House to look at Her Majesty's Government's relief efforts and aid programme. It is sad that our gross bilateral aid to Somalia has declined over the past five years. In 1980 total financial aid and technical co-operation was £2·8 million. The figure has moved steadily downwards since that time and is now £2·1 million. There is a similar tale in British gross bilateral aid to Sudan. In 1981 the figure was £32·7 million, rising to a peak of £39·4 million in 1982. The figure for 1984, which is the most recent figure available, is down to £27·4 million. Those two countries, as I explained, have been adversely affected not only by the drought, which has affected the whole of that belt of Africa, but by a huge influx of refugees from Ethiopia.

However, when I look at Her Majesty's Government's aid to Ethiopia it is interesting to note that in 1980 gross bilateral aid to Ethiopia was £1·9 million and rose steadily to £7 million in 1984. I understand that in the exceptional circumstances of the drought Her Majesty's Government have had to take exceptional relief measures, and that is to their credit. Since October 1984 the British Government have disbursed no less than £36·84 million to Sudan. In 1984 they gave £25·84 million and in 1985 £36·34 million for the relief of famine in Ethiopia. That is welcome and good, but we must be realistic.

I am deeply shocked when I read reports in the papers that the Government in Addis Ababa have just banned from Ethiopia the admirable team of French doctors—Médecins Sans Frontières — who have been doing wonderful work not least in the provinces most wracked by civil war, of Eritrea, Tigre and Wollo. I ask my right hon. Friend the Minister, who knows and has visited Ethiopia, to discuss with his right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary whether pressure could be put on the Ethiopian authorities to conduct themselves in a normal, civilised and humane way.

Furthermore, it must be stated loud and clear and unambiguously that the forced transfer of populations, usually by Soviet air force aircraft or, if not, Aeroflot aircraft, from Eritrea and Tigre to the southern provinces of Ethiopia does no good for the relief of famine. Those people are herded on to the aircraft. I have heard it alleged that Royal Air Force crews at one side of an airport will be preparing their relief sorties and relief missions while at the other side of the same airport Soviet personnel and their Ethiopian brethren are herding hapless farmers and rural populations on to aircraft to be transferred to a strange and alien part of Ethiopia. That is intolerable. The Ethiopian Government have been using famine as a weapon of war against what they regard as the dissident populations of Eritrea and Tigre, who are seeking no more than the process of self-determination for themselves and a chance for autonomy in their provinces.

Mr. Tony Baldry (Banbury): There is a danger that my hon. Friend may unwittingly give an alibi to those who would wish Britain to cut our overseas aid altogether on the basis that if the countries of Africa cannot sort themselves out, why should we assist them? I wish to draw to my hon. Friend's attention a letter sent by the assistant secretary-general, based in Addis Ababa, to the editor of The Times in August this year. He said:

> "There is a complete consensus here among representatives of donor countries and voluntary organisations that the Relief and Rehabilitation Commission is doing its utmost to distribute whatever grain has been consigned to it."

The letter said that the United Nations thought that the Ethiopian Government were doing their bit to combat famine and not using it as an instrument of war, although the civil war must be brought to an end. However, it has not been used consciously as an instrument of war.

Mr. Wilkinson: I did not realise that my hon. Friend would read a handout in his intervention. If I had, I would not have let him intervene.

[Mr. Wilkinson]

I led the House's delegation to the General Assembly of the United Nations in October. During that visit we were briefed by Mr. Bradford Morse, who heads the United Nations development programme and who has also been responsible for the United Nations emergency programme for Africa. That programme's document of 1 September 1985 reports an increase in child malnutrition in southern Tigre and says that there is particular concern for the health of orphans, destitutes and old people remaining in the camps. It lays particular stress on the work of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees in Ethiopia for the returnees coming back from Sudan and Somalia, and the United Nations reminds us that next year, too, there will still be a major requirement for emergency food aid.

In no part of my speech did I deprecate in any way our efforts to alleviate suffering and help people suffering from famine in Ethiopia and the neighbouring states. I stated that war and the unscrupulous activities of the Ethiopian Government have made the relief operations much harder than they need have been. It is a scandal and a tragedy, but it had to be exposed. I am grateful to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for giving me the opportunity to do so.

5.26 pm

Mr. Stuart Holland (Vauxhall): I congratulate the hon. Member for Stroud (Sir A. Kershaw) and members of his Committee on their outstanding report. I agree with his submission today that the famine disaster in Africa could have been avoided. The key question now is whether, jointly, we can contribute to avoiding its recurrence. To understand that and learn the lessons from the famine, we do not need a crystal ball.

Unfortunately, the future is already visible in the trend of food production in Africa. For example, from 1970 to the early 1980s in the industrial countries as a whole, as we would expect, food production per head was positive at 1·6 per cent. a year and for developing countries as a whole it was positive at 0·9 per cent. a year, but for Africa it was negative. In the west African countries as a whole it was −0·8 per cent. and in east Africa it was −2·2 per cent. If we look at the long-term trends, we see that from 1961 to 1970, less than six out of 24 African countries vulnerable to a food crisis registered a negative growth or a fall-back in per capita food production, but from 1971 to 1984 only six out of those 24 countries achieved a positive growth of food production per head.

I might come to the same conclusion as the hon. Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson), from a different perspective, about the extent to which certain Governments seem more content to wage war within their own frontiers than to wage war on drought. None the less, even before the recent famine, and since the last major famine in 1974-75, agricultural output per head in Africa has been declining irrespective of drought or wars. That is the underlying issue to which I should like to address myself.

The hon. Member for Stroud, with good reason, drew attention to the fact that while drought self-evidently relates to climatic factors and causes famine, famine affects the poorest sections of the population. Therefore, if we urge the Government to take those measures in their aid programme which will help to avoid rather than simply remedy the effects of dought, the underlying structural problem of poverty should be addressed.

Much work has been done on that by Professor Amartya Sen who is now at the University of Oxford. I am glad to say that much attention also is now being paid to that, not by the economists in the economic research division of the World Bank, who seem to have seen the market work in south-east Asia and have been converted to market forces, but in the international division of the bank, especially by the head of that division, Shahid Javed Burki. Such stress on underlying structural poverty in the African countries can make a major contribution not only to our debate but to the kinds of policies which we should adopt and which we should urge the Government to adopt.

For example, Shahid Javed Burki has drawn attention to the fact that if the very poor are defined as those who ordinarily do not have enough income to obtain sufficient calories for adequate growth or health, against a worldwide increase of that category of up to an estimated 400 million people in 1985, the share of sub-Saharan Africa in that total has risen from 20 per cent., or 60 million people, in 1970, to nearly 40 per cent., or 150 million people, in 1985. In other words, in 1985 nearly half the population of sub-Saharan Africa belongs to the category of very poor — the people who are exceptionally vulnerable to famine when it occurs.

If the House is to address itself to the recommendations to be made to the Government on their aid programme and spending, we must understand that the consequences of famine will be irreversible unless there are sustained policies for intervention in agricultural production and in regional and rural development.

The first effect of famine was identified by the Royal Commission established on the famines in India earlier this century. It might well be called the shoe horn effect. In other words, it has been found that small farmers leave the land during famine and in that phase they almost certainly liquidate the small assets that they have, certainly their herds.

The second phase is that in which such former farmers seek farm employment hundreds of miles from their former grazing or plot areas. Therefore, they become casual labourers often driven into degradation, and too often the women are driven into prostitution.

The third phase is more critical, when depopulation sets in. Entire villages—whole rural communities—abandon the land in search of food. There is a simple logic about that. It swells the urban population while reducing rural farming. The result is less food for more people off the land and a combined rural and urban crisis.

What is needed to cope with the underlying structural problems of rural migration and urban poverty? First, higher food prices alone—I stress "alone"—are not the answer. For one thing, with depopulation and the reduction of the working population in agriculture—and of the land under cultivation—higher prices alone would simply aggravate inflation and shift the price of food further out of reach of the new urban poor. Even lower prices, such as are now registered in many of the African countries following recent rains—a point stressed in a recent article in the New Scientist—give no long-term incentive to migrants during the recent famine to return to the land. The price mechanism alone is not enough to achieve, and certainly not enough to guarantee, a return to the rural areas of those who have come off the land during famine.

Secondly, as is illustrated in the Harare declaration to which some hon. Members referred, we need policies which make possible a better balance between cash crops for export and food for domestic production. The hazards of cash crops for export have been well known for some time and have been often criticised. We know why local Governments pursue that policy. They need the foreign exchange to finance imports, often not only imports of fuel but also agricultural imports such as seeds, fertilisers and agricultural equipment, including spares.

A third major corollary directly links the need for agricultural development to offset famine and the problem of debt. This has been stressed before in the House but we have not had adequate answers from the Minister. We appreciate that the Minister and the Overseas Development Administration have written off some of the loans to less developed countries and converted them to grants, and we are glad about that. But that still leaves us with the crippling problem with which Sudan was faced last year.

Although the Minister was able to give tens of millions of pounds in grants and assistance to Sudan, its total debt last year was $8,000 million. That resulted in the absurd situation that, when Secretary of State Shultz came to the Sudan to see the crisis and what the US agencies were doing, it is reported with some authority that several Ministers were able to drive to the airport to meet him but their staff had to return by public transport because they could not afford to drive back into town. Many of the British public have seen on television the Geldof convoys from the remarkable Live Aid and Band Aid initiatives overtaking convoys that have been stranded in the Sudan through lack of fuel. That is a crucial factor in the aid programme. Aid alone for agricultural equipment is not enough. Even if we were to see an increase in the aid budget, that would not be enough if the debt problem were not tackled.

In that context we urge the Government—especially with the kind of change in the United States Government's attitude which we see from Mr. Baker and which we welcome in terms of increased proposals for World Bank lending—to get together with the Governments of the United States, Germany and other EC countries to fund the long-term debt, reschedule it, and, where necessary, write off the long-term debt of the least developed countries and certainly the sub-Saharan African countries. The official estimate of their debt at $80 billion is, if anything, likely to be an under-estimate. It has recently been reckoned that it is under-estimated by 50 per cent. Any increase in the aid contribution, even if achieved, has to be seen in that debt context.

Zambia is in a straitjacket of debt. It is 95 per cent. dependent for its export earnings on one commodity—copper. With falling copper prices and the rise in fuel prices it is being crucified by long-term debt. Even with the floating of the kwacha, even seeking market solutions in the foreign exchange market, one cannot find adequate sacks to store the new food and the food surplus which in certain products has become available in recent months in Zambia.

Fourthly, the repopulation of rural areas and a long-term stable price structure means the need for intervention in agriculture and in regional development programmes rather than simply market forces. Those in the World Bank, the IMF and the Government who advocate a fuller flourish of market forces neglect the fact that no developed country has ever subjected its agriculture to the rigours of market forces in this century in the way that the World Bank and certain others are advocating for the African countries. The United States, Britain, with its previous deficiency payment system, and the EEC, with its common agricultural policy, would not dream of letting market forces rip with the consequent decimation of agricultural production in the manner in which certain people are advocating simply a market forces solution for African agriculture.

Of course, the market has an appropriate role to play. Of course, there are key issues of appropriate prices to producers. Certainly no Labour Member would argue that the African countries need a common agricultural policy of the kind that we now find in the EEC with its vast surpluses. But the African countries do need donors to work jointly with them to secure policies for incentives, assistance, grants and technical support for agriculture that go beyond the vagaries of market supply and demand and can assure a long-term future for agriculture.

Mr. Ian Grist (Cardiff, Central): Does the hon. Gentleman accept, from those who may know Africa a little better, that if European farmers can produce surpluses from overpriced food, the introduction of prices that the market could fetch would find African farmers producing food just as well?

Mr. Holland: I do not know what the hon. Gentleman means by those who know Africa a little better. He is not addressing himself to my main point. In the depopulated rural areas in sub-Saharan countries there is an outward migration of population to other countries — for example, Eritrea, Tigré, and Sudan. There is massive urbanisation. The market mechanism alone cannot provide sufficient incentives, from just one of two good annual harvests, to attract population back to the rural areas and to deserted and desolated villages.

I may have misunderstood the hon. Gentleman's point about price support. Of course, price support is an appropriate policy. However, a price mechanism alone will not ensure that those who have come off the land, joined the rural poor and are contributing to the urban population explosion will have the courage to return to the land when they lack capital, basic machinery and credit for further agricultural investment.

Fifthly, in any programme priority must be given to the needs of those who produce the most, but are paid the least. In Africa, that certainly applies to women. In east Africa, women work an average of 40 per cent. more than men, but are paid 60 per cent. less.

The Lomé agreement recommends that we should give credit where credit is due—that is to women and to women's co-operatives — rather than simply increase revenue through higher prices paid to male heads of households. It is clear that certain African Governments are willing to support and encourage that, and I should be interested to hear the Minister's comments. Otherwise, increased revenue from higher prices, or even a price support policy, will not go to those who have a vested interest in reinvesting in agriculture.

Sixthly, the role of technical assistance has two dimensions, and that issue has been raised many times in the House. One dimension is water-based technical assistance, copper dams, pumps, wells and so on. The second dimension is seed-based assistance including both dry soils and tropical seed research. This House should admit that the Government's record is deplorable. As my hon. Friend the Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke) has said several times, the Government have cut assistance to the Tropical Development Research Institute in London.

[Mr. Holland]

There is no aspect of that six-point agenda for action in sub-Saharan Africa where the Government are taking a lead rather than following the laissez-faire remedies favoured by the United States Administration.

During Question Time last month, the Prime Minister claimed that the United Kingdom aid contribution was in line with the OECD average. I pointed out that in terms of aid per head per OECD donor country, Britain is twelfth on the list. Indeed, our aid as itemised in the Chancellor's autumn statement will not mean an increase in—or even a defence of in real terms—the current spending levels up to 1987. The probable inflation rate is likely to mean a net decrease in aid as a share of United Kingdom GDP by a further 1 per cent. or even 2 per cent. down to 32 per cent. or 31 per cent. of GDP by 1987.

What is happening with rural development assistance? United Kingdom Government aid allocations for rural development have declined from £10 million in 1980 to less than £0·2 million in 1984. That is a derisory 2,000th part of 1 per cent. of the total United Kingdom aid budget. Will the Minister make a dramatic statement today, perhaps saying that he will double, treble, quadruple, or multiply by 10 times the amount spent on the rural development programme? Even were he to multiply it by 10 times, it would still be only 2 per cent. of the total United Kingdom aid budget. If the Minister cannot show that sort of commitment to longer-term rural development, we cannot take seriously the Government's commitment to these issues.

Hon. Members, including the hon. Member for Stroud (Sir A. Kershaw), spoke of the reshuffling within the aid budget so that the emergency food aid programme of £90 million to £95 million spent on famine relief came from other items of the budget. The net contribution of up to £9 million for the Hercules had to come from a magnificent effort by the Ministry of Defence rather than from the ODA.

I take the point made by the hon. Member for Ruislip-Northwood that many hon. Members heard on the ITN news today about the ending of the RAF's remarkable air lift, which recently has been accompanied by a new aerial assault in Eritrea by the Dergue, who have bombed women and children, hospitals and resettlement camps, and who have waged war on civilian populations—taking lives when the remainder of the world are attempting to save those lives.

The tragedy in Ethiopia is substantially of the Dergue's own making. But for the longer-term tragedy in sub-Saharan Africa, unless the Minister tells us today that despite the opaque nature of the Estimates there will be an increase in the aid budget, a triple indictment must be made—first, that the Government were warned of the coming famine but did not respond soon enough; secondly, that during the famine the Government robbed Peter to aid Paul, rescheduling aid rather than mobilising new aid resources; and, thirdly, that the Government appear to have learnt next to nothing about the underlying, long-term causes of the famine and have taken no clear steps to help avoid its recurrence.

The Government should have shifted new resources to respond to the famine, rather than reshuffle the aid budget. To recover from the famine, the Government—jointly with other countries—need to reschedule the debt of the sub-Saharan countries, to help restructure rural farming and aid a redistribution of resources towards rural areas. Before the famine, the Government proved themselves deaf to the warnings issued in the House. During the famine they often appeared to be blind to the real issues. Nothing in the current Estimates promises anything better for the future.

5.47 pm

Mr. Jim Lester (Broxtowe): Before his peroration, the hon. Member for Vauxhall (Mr. Holland) had made a useful contribution to the debate. Those of us who follow this subject with considerable interest wholly reject his peroration on the Government's actions.

It is a pleasure to speak yet again on this matter in this Session. I spoke in the debate on the Queen's Speech, when hon. Members pointed out to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor the projected figures on aid and said how seriously many Conservative Members were awaiting his autumn statement.

We very much welcome the fact that in the autumn statement the aid programme for 1986-87 and 1987-88 has been increased by £47 million. I know that my right hon. Friend the Minister played his part in ensuring that increase. It would be churlish of anyone to refuse to recognise the part that he played.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson) spoke about the position on the border between Somalia, Ethiopia and Sudan. He also referred to the politics of the issue. With the opportunity to travel the world, we can see the politics of the issue. I, like my hon. Friend, have travelled the famine areas and have taken photographic slides. When one is able to show those slides to schoolchildren and constituents and can share one's experience of what it is like to be in a camp in Darfur, the reaction is, "This is not politics; this is a question of the survival of the people".

I am sure that we all recognise that poverty is the real problem in Africa, as my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Sir A. Kershaw) said. I pay tribute to him as the Chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee. He has led us positively. I am sure that the Committee's work has commended itself to the House.

Things have moved on since the report, and I pay tribute to my right hon. Friend the Minister for Overseas Development. The hon. Member for Vauxhall referred to the article in the New Scientist entitled "Who will buy the surplus?" Some of us moved quickly to get in touch with my right hon. Friend to discuss that policy. It would clearly be disastrous in a climate-led recovery if surpluses depressed farm prices and we were not able to encourage a fragile economy. My right hon. Friend said:

"The United Kingdom has long argued that food aid should, wherever it is practical and cost effective, be purchased in one developing country which has a food surplus and transported to another which has a food deficit. This both encourages local farmers and provides valuable foreign exchange to the vendor country. We are currently arranging just such a 'triangular' transaction under our bilateral food aid programme, with 14,500 tonnes of grain being purchased in Zimbabwe for use as food aid to Mozambique. The European Community also makes use of triangular transactions as part of its very large food aid programme, and the United Kingdom has urged it to do so more frequently."

This shows that, contrary to the suggestion of the hon. Member for Vauxhall, my right hon. Friend the Minister is alert and aware of the changing problems and that he is trying to solve them.

Many of the Select Committee's members were concerned that the warning signals had been evident in the poorer African areas but, when the famine struck, many people were surprised. The United Nations had already warned the developing nations more than 23 times that a famine was developing. The Committee recommended that staff in overseas posts in countries where there was a risk of famine should conduct their own assessments independently of other organisations. My right hon. Friend the Minister wrote to the Committee saying that the arrangements had been made. Officers posted to countries where there is a risk of famine will be briefed on how to interpret the information and guidance notes have been distributed on the assessment of the food situation for the benefit of officers already in those countries. Those are two positive ways in which my right hon. Friend has reacted to the Committee's recommendations.

That makes me all the more sad that my right hon. Friend the Minister has not been able to respond to another point to which attention has been drawn in the Supplementary Estimates — the additional funds for famine relief that should have been provided. I am totally unconvinced by the argument that this is slippage and that no long-term development programme has been affected. One need only look at the average of the contingencies fund over the years to defeat that argument. The average has been about £13 million. In 1983 it was £30 million. We spent £80 million in 1984 and £87 million in 1985 on famine relief. If the average contingency reserve is £13 million and we spend the total budget, one cannot sustain the argument that the additional sums have not damaged the long-term development programme.

I am prepared to accept that a specific programme has not been stopped through slippage and that aid for an established programme has not been discontinued. It is obvious that programmes have been delayed and postponed. Had it not been for the famine problems, those programmes would have begun this year or last year. The Government are wrong to sustain that argument. It would be more sensible if they honestly admitted the truth. The Committee said that it was not acceptable that the entire cost of the United Kingdom's response to the crisis should fall on the previously agreed aid budget. We said that the emergency was of such a degree that it had to be regarded as a new situation and that substantial new money had to be provided to help with it. All Committee members stand by that position. It would be better if the Government admitted that that was the case rather than pretended that some strange formulation in the aid budget has produced additional contingency funds without diverting money from projects that would have gone ahead anyway.

The hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) referred to the working party on United Kingdom aid to African agriculture of which I was the chairman. The report was a frank analysis of what we have been doing for African agriculture. The working party decided to be as constructive as possible to analyse those areas in which long-term development had, or had not, been operating efficiently and the required changes. I am sure that all hon. Members recognise that the fragile climate-led recovery in many parts of Africa is just a hiccup. The rainfall this year has been much lower than the average in previous decades. It would be a mistake to imagine that this year's rain and production levels mean a new pattern. We have been given a window of opportunity to rethink, restate and refinance our aid programme for assistance to African agriculture.

I would very much welcome my right hon. Friend taking up the Committee's suggestion and, early in the new year, making a new policy statement on the Government's stand on their aid programme and the share that will go to the poorest countries.

The working party stated:

"We believe that the ODA should maintain a specific long-term development aid programme which is inviolate. It should be equipped with a small provision for emergencies, and when a larger response is needed, this should be funded on the basis of additionality from one Government's contingency reserve and not from departmental funds."

I hope that my right hon. Friend will consider that suggestion and make it part of any future policy statement.

None of us—certainly no one who has been out in a field frequently — pretends that this problem can be easily solved, because we are concerned with the poorest people in poor countries, who are many miles from the population centres, road and rail systems and the means of support that would normally be necessary to sustain life.

It is difficult to maintain schemes in those areas. It is asking a lot of our aid people to spend long periods— frequently longer than six months — in such an environment, especially if they have families, because there is a lack of schools and other facilities. It is difficult also to persuade the nationals of these countries to do so. One might like to think of the bright lights of Khartoum, although I must admit I have yet to find them in my visits. I am sure that the bright lights of Kassala, El Fasser or Nyala are much dimmer. One should not pretend that it is not difficult to establish schemes for the rehabilitation of the peasant farmer and the nomad. Anyone who criticises the aid programme should recognise that. We must work together more positively with proper financing and skilled manpower, whatever its source, to begin schemes. We must recognise that politically the schemes are not popular because they do not produce immediate results.

Having examined carefully the schemes that exist, we found that, instead of looking at three-year or four-year programmes within the lifetime of a Parliament or even a Government, to be successful in areas such as this, one needs to look ahead 15, 20 or even 25 years and to a sustained programme of manpower and support.

All sorts of high-flown ideas are proposed of what is needed to help peasant farmers. We now have examples of what it takes to encourage farmers to produce. For example, in Zimbabwe there has been a remarkable recovery by peasant farmers, and that has come about not by over-elaborate schemes. The farmers there have grown enough to feed the whole population by receiving high-yielding seed, fertilisers at the right time, credit when they needed it and, at the end of the day, a price for their crops that gave them an incentive to grow a surplus and plant for a second year.

I urge the Minister to listen carefully to what is being said in the debate and to note the work that is being achieved by the Foreign Affairs Committee. He can rest assured that we shall return to this subject time and again, and certainly until we are satisfied that Parliament and the Government reflect the opinions of the members of that Committee and Back Benchers who are interested in these issues.

[Mr. Jim Lester]

6.2 pm

Mr. Tom Clarke (Monklands, West): The hon. Member for Broxtowe (Mr. Lester) made a thoughtful and powerful speech, especially when dealing with the Government's contingency arrangements—or the lack of them—and I am sure that he spoke for hon. Members in all parts of the House when dealing with that issue..

My main purpose in intervening is to refer to the Grindlays address that was given by my right hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan) on 25 September of this year in Jersey, when he made what I consider to have been a major contribution on subjects which are highly relevant to this debate. In that address my right hon. Friend pointed out that the situation in Africa was an enormous tragedy but not an inevitable one. It was not the result of an inability to feed the world's growing population or to fight disease and poverty. It was, rather, a question of meeting Africa's desperate need for assistance.

The size of the problem that we are debating dwarfs the present level of aid, and without a substantial increase in aid the economic challenges that confront the Third world will be insurmountable. We witness the ludicrous situation of net capital and interest payments flowing from the Third world to the west instead of the other way around. Certain African countries have been forced to adopt export policies which place too much emphasis on industrialisation and producing cash crops for export instead of improving farm practices and growing food for local use.

Before we condemn such policies we should attempt to evaluate why they are occurring. Without the revenue and foreign currency that accrues from such exports, countries cannot afford to purchase fertilisers or fuel for the next crop. Nor can they pay the interest on their indebtedness to other countries.

My right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition, during a visit to Tanzania, quoted Julius Nyerere as having said that he had to choose in his country between paying his debts and feeding his people. That, alas, is the choice we place before the leaders of many African countries, leaving little hope for them to be able to improve the lot of their people. My right hon. Friend noted when in Tanzania that that country's debt service obligations amounted to more than its foreign exchange earnings for the whole year.

There are, in all of that, implications for the western world, including Britain, in connection with unemployment and the job potential that we seem to be ignoring. Unemployment in the industrialised west represents stagnant development in the Third world and something for them and us which is far from a separate problem. Significant problems affect us all because of the way in which we approach these matters. Indeed, when I think of the problems of the Third world and of the possibilities of job creation which we ignore, I am reminded of the speech, which my hon. Friend the Member for Vauxhall (Mr. Holland) will recall, of Mr. Ben Bella at a meeting initiated by the late Frank McElhone in which Ben Bella said:

"Your unemployed are our dead."

That is true, and we should be contributing more to the Third world to avoid such a calamity. It is a scandal, as we view the poverty in those countries, that in Britain men, mills and machinery are standing idle.

These problems are intrinsically linked by an economic relationship from which no nation can completely isolate itself. The industrial nations will not gain if there is an increasing wealth gap between them and the developing countries. Their poverty directly affects our welfare, just as our recession limits their development.

One in 20 industrial jobs in Europe and one in six in the United States depends on exports to the Third world. If the people of the Third world cannot afford to buy what we make, unemployment in the industrial west will grow.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth pointed out in his Grindlays address that by the year 2000 world population was expected to be 6·1 billion, three times higher than it was at the turn of this century. In the western industrialised nations, population growth would be relatively low when compared with Africa, though even in the United States there would probably be 20 per cent. more people than there are now, making it a problem, though not such a great one as that faced by African countries, because Africa's population would almost double, from 476 million in 1980 to 877 million by the year 2000.

My right hon. Friend pointed out that those developments were occurring at a time when access to fertile land was decreasing and poverty was on the increase and more Africans were estimated to be under-nourished than was the case a decade ago, with 20 per cent. less food being produced for every African today than was produced in 1960. If present trends continued, by the year 2000 the continent of Africa would need to import 44 per cent. of all its food requirements, but many of the countries so affected would not be able to afford to do so. That is the nature of the problem that the world must prepare for and attempt to defeat. Without improving on present standards, we shall have to produce 30 per cent. more food by the year 2000 just to meet the demands of growing numbers of people. That can be done only if aid is increased and directed to where it is manifestly required.

Every year, massive amounts of arable land revert to infertile desert, over-grazing and poor irrigation techniques, and the large-scale cutting down of forests contribute to the problems that Africa and other countries face. Short-term relief is not enough. The Government have presided over an 18 per cent. cut in their aid and development budgets since 1979. That includes a cut of £40 million this year and represents 3 per cent. in real terms. I am sure that the public, which has been so generous with its contributions, regards those reductions as being utterly repugnant and unacceptable. It is deplorable that the Government should leave the needs of the African people to the mercies of the market.

This year the United Kingdom has donated a record low amount—0·33 per cent. of gross national product—to overseas aid. The Government have not made the slightest attempt to achieve the 0·7 per cent. United Nations target which many other countries, less fortunate than us, have already reached or exceeded. That tells us everything about the Government's aid objectives. [Interruption.] I agree that the Government's policy is nonsense. The 20,000 people who lobbied the House not so long ago showed that they agreed with me. A massive increase in overseas aid positively directed towards meeting human needs and encouraging long-term self-reliance is required. Aid for farmers to reclaim land from the desert and to facilitate the planting of new forests are two possible ways of encouraging the self-reliance that we would welcome for African economies.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth reminded us of how Ernest Bevin seized upon the Marshall plan after the war because he recognised that economic development and human freedom went hand in hand. The process was of benefit not just to the European countries but to the vastly productive economy of the United States. Today, we lack the political will to solve the problem. The price of such folly and the failure to tackle world economic problems in a way that will lead to recovery contribute to falling living standards throughout the world, especially in the poor south.

We should be investigating better ways of bringing recovery and not recession to Africa in particular and the Third world in general. That requires development aid rather than austerity programmes. It is a challenge to us all which has not been answered. We thrive together or decay separately. Bevin and Marshall had the vision to recognise that fact in the 1940s. It is staring us in the face in the 1980s and we ignore it, not so much at our peril but at the peril of millions of starving people whose plight it is possible to avoid.

6.12 pm

Mr. Bowen Wells (Hertford and Stortford): I agree with much of the analysis made by the hon. Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke) of the position in Africa. There is good and bad news. I wish to speak in a balanced way about the aid budget. We must, therefore, consider the positive as well as the negative side.

My right hon. Friend the Minister for Overseas Development has done an extremely good job, which is recognised by most nations, in conducting the aid programme in relation to the famine in Africa. Much of that aid programme has gone through the EEC. I have found, as the House will be aware, much difficulty in obtaining information from my right hon. Friend on what was being done by the EEC with over half the money spent on Africa. I was fortunate enough to go to Brussels and find out much of the information for myself.

One of the gratifying things that I discovered is that my right hon. Friend, almost unknown to the country and the House, contributed not just a Hercules in Ethiopia where the RAF has done such sterling work, but chartered a Hercules in a joint programme organised by the EEC delegate in the Sudan. It was used to carry food from the east of Sudan to the west of Darfur. That was referred to eloquently by my hon. Friends the Members for Broxtowe (Mr. Lester) and for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson). The rains had come and lorries could no longer pass across the desert where there are no roads. The refugees from Chad and the Sudanese on the western border of Darfur were starving because the European and American aid could not be transported there despite my right hon. Friend's efforts to have the railway rehabilitated. That was the only alternative way of carrying the grain from east to west.

My right hon. Friend contributed a charter Hercules. The Italians, the French, the Dutch and the Germans also contributed an aeroplane. In that way, the EEC transported the grain and food, including American food aid, to the west. That is a programme and achievement of which we should be proud, and we should congratulate my right hon. Friend on it.

I also congratulate my right hon. Friend on his defence of the aid budget. He managed to see that it was not reduced, as the Government had planned. He has always tried to conduct the aid programme to provide effective and efficient economic assistance to the poorest countries.

I must come to the other side of the story to which my hon. Friend the Member for Broxtowe has referred. I wish to reiterate the points in some detail. They relate to how our efforts in Africa have been funded within the aid budget. The members of the Foreign Affairs Select Committee have been playing a game of blind man's buff with the Overseas Development Administration. We are sometimes faced with a budget which is 30 per cent. unallocated when presented to Parliament. That raises the important point of whether Parliament has any control over the budget. Most of that sum is included in the bilateral programme. The matter becomes important when the Government try to hide behind verbiage such as:

"The emergency aid so far provided has not involved cutting"—

we must consider carefully the words used—

"any planned development activities in the remainder of the aid programme."

That beggars belief, because on the most recent aid statistics published by the Department emergency aid represents £95 million. It is part of the bilateral country programme of £434 million from which much of the aid comes. That means that about 20 per cent. of the budget has been extraordinarily spent without affecting—let me use the words carefully—"any planned development activities."

Before my right hon. Friend says that at least half that sum was spent by the EEC and, therefore, did not come out of the bilateral programme, we will accept that the figure was 10 per cent. Those are huge figures and it is a huge proportion. If that is the case, the House should ask how the aid budget is being planned. What are the long-term development plans which have not been affected? Is it because we are budgeting from month to month that we are not committing the money to the long-term agricultural developments about which my hon. Friend the Member for Broxtowe spoke? Is it that the slippage is so great that we cannot spend it properly on planned long-term developments? We have always spent the complete aid budget, even when there was no emergency or contingency. The aid budget is spent on long-term development objectives when slippage occurs. It is not planned formally because one cannot foresee the events that will take place in a year. The fact that the money is not invested in long-term development is important, and I shall give the House two examples of where it has not been invested.

The money has not been invested in the United Nations development programme. We have cut severely our contribution, which is voluntary and not ratcheted to GDP. The programme undertakes the initial investigation into long-term agricultural projects which may eventually produce an agricultural answer to the famine-struck regions of Africa. Therefore, to argue that we are not affecting long-term development projects by taking money from other projects is a sleight of hand. It is unworthy of my right hon. Friend the Minister to use that argument, and I hope that we shall persuade him to desist from deploying it. It undermines the credibility of his argument.

[Mr. Bowen Wells]

I conferred with my friends in the Caribbean about cuts in the aid budget. The Minister went to hear their arguments on 1 August at the request of the Organisation of Eastern Caribbean States. They find that the aid budget is rigid, and that they cannot spend it properly on long-term developments because of the way in which it is presented, and they want a discussion on how that can be improved. The unallocated section is defended, with some justification, by my right hon. Friend the Minister and the ODA because they need flexibility within the budget to take account of the difficulties of disbursing that aid. However, they cannot have a flexible approach from Parliament, and administer aid inflexibly into the host countries in such a way that we do not get economic development but receive a minus quantity of good will from them. There must be something wrong with the administration of our aid if that is the net result. That is also an illustration of the way in which the aid budget is being cut by the diversion of money to famine in Africa. Caribbean countries have certainly suffered because they have not had the additional money which would otherwise be available through the bilateral programme.

It is essential for the credibility of the aid programme that at least £100 million — that is not a large sum, considering the whole sum — is put back into the aid budget as additional money to handle this serious crisis. We should also use it to begin to invest in the research, development, management and technical co-operation necessary to find the way to enable the people of the Sudan, Ethiopia and Chad to sustain their population and cattle in those arid areas. They can succeed in that.

The ODA and the EEC have two excellent research projects in the western Sudanese areas devoted to that. Would it not be a magnificent gesture by the Government to give additional money and resources to enable those programmes to ascertain how we can help other people to help themselves and in that way to help us?

6.23 pm

Mr. Eric Deakins (Walthamstow): This must be the best informed debate that has ever taken place on foreign affairs in the Chamber, for two reasons. First, never before can such a high proportion of those taking part have visited the countries concerned and, what is more, in the recent past. Therefore, hon. Members are aware of the problems from first hand. Secondly, we have before us two reports and other information.

We have the Select Committee report. Whenever I read a report by the Select Committee I regret that I am no longer a member of it. Perhaps happier days will come, if not before the general election, then after it. We also have the excellent report of the all-party group on the development of African agriculture, which is extremely detailed and well informed. As usual, we have the well-informed mailing from the world development movement, and we have the benefit of a paper prepared by two people —one from Oxfam and the other from Christian Aid— on food aid and cereal surpluses. The paper also deals with the underlying agricultural problems in sub-Saharan Africa.

In addition, we have the benefit of two further documents. The first is published by the Catholic Institute for International Relations and is entitled "Africa's Development Disaster". The other is a recent lecture given by Robert McNamara, who for a long time was a superb president of the World Bank, entitled in which he deals with the problems that we are debating today—the famine in Africa, and what should be done about it.

"The challenges for Sub-Saharan Africa",

Everyone, including experts and those who have not travelled in that part for some time, agrees that there are several factors in relation to the famine, and hunger and poverty have already been mentioned. They also include the domestic agricultural policies of the African countries concerned, which range from being merely unfortunate to disastrous in terms of raising agricultural production for local people — I am not referring to cash crops for export. Other factors include the decline in recent years in overseas aid for agricultural projects. We should not criticise only the British Government—we have a right to criticise them because the debate is partly about that — but all the other major aid donors to sub-Saharan Africa. They have been reducing their spending on agriculture as a proportion of their total aid to that area. I do not know why, as the signs have been there for a considerable time.

A further factor contributing to the famine is that there has been no effective development strategy for sub-Saharan Africa. One can to a certain extent justifiably blame the World Bank, and to a lesser extent the International Monetary Fund for that. The World Bank is the major multilateral institution for co-ordinating development plans, and for injecting vast sums through the International Development Association. The World Bank must take some criticism, and I hope that those who have access to it in Washington DC and elsewhere and its various executive vice-presidents will heed our remarks.

There is a problem in increasing food production for the immediate consumption of the population of those parts which is extremely technical. I do not wish to bore the House, as the information is available and need not be put on the record. Various matters have gone wrong, including the pricing structure, which, as my hon. Friend the Member for Vauxhall (Mr. Holland) pointed out, has both disadvantages and advantages. There has been no concentration on rain-fed crops, only on other crops. The role of women in agricultural development has been disregarded. The state marketing organisations are often inefficient and do not encourage farmers to produce. When they do produce, they do not always succeed in marketing their produce correctly, either in their own countries, or in the rest of the world.

These are all factors which, while we can deplore, we have to leave to the African Government concerned to put right. At the same time, our aid policy could be much better directed towards increasing African agricultural production for domestic consumption and feeding the growing population. Those factors have been going wrong in the past 20 years of agricultural development in Africa. The experience of successful schemes funded by development projects such as ours should be used as an example and encouragement to African countries and Governments to get on with the job themselves. I hope that we shall not have to wait too long for African Governments and aid donors to get the agricultural situation right in sub-Saharan Africa.

There are other factors besides agriculture in famine and hunger. One, mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke), was financial flows to sub-Saharan Africa. Unquestionably, these have been reduced. My hon. Friend pointed out that net capital flows generally to the developing world from the developed world have been falling. In the case of sub-Saharan Africa, they have almost got to a negative stage in net repayments on the interest charges on the debts, which are not large by world standards but are by comparison with the GNP of the country. They are an enormous burden on small countries struggling to prosper and do the best that they can for their people. The burden of debt repayment is more than outweighed by the reducing amount of aid going to those countries. They are becoming net contributors to us in the rich countries. I am talking not about the rest of the world, where there are other problems, but about sub-Saharan countries. The capital is not flowing there but outwards. Donors have, for reasons that escape me—none of the publications from which I shall quote has the answer—reduced aid to this part of the world, even those countries with a much better aid record than ours. That is obviously a problem.

Mr. McNamara in his lecture on 1 August suggested that a massive injection of funds was needed. That is in line with the Brandt reports, and the recent report with which my hon. Friend the Member for Vauxhall had much to do called "The Global Challenge". It concerned ways of revitalising the global economy in ways that will help the poor countries, particularly those in sub-Saharan Africa. Mr. McNamara reckoned that all donors should immediately step up their aid by no less than 30 per cent. That does not sound such a large figure. It would be large if applied to our total aid budget, but we are talking only about aid to sub-Saharan Africa. Lest it be forgotten that Mr. McNamara was president of the World Bank, he also had harsh things to say about that institution. He has suggested that it needs to quadruple its investment and lending under IDA and other windows of World Bank lending to sub-Saharan Africa to cope with the problems.

In his lecture, Mr. McNamara had a whole section on population. I was glad that the hon. Member for Stroud (Sir A. Kershaw), the Chairman of the Select Committee, mentioned this, as did my hon. Friend the Member for Monklands, West. We cannot debate the problems of famine in Africa without some passing reference to the population problem. I shall quote from Mr. McNamara's lecture. He said on page 12:

"Sub-Saharan Africa, already the poorest region in the world, now has the highest population growth rate in the world, even exceeding that of the rest of Africa. It is 3·2 per cent. a year. Were that to continue, the population would double in 22 years, quadruple in 44 years, and increase eightfold in 66 years."

The year 2025 is not far away and certainly is within the lifetime of all the children in Africa aged up to 12, whom we hope will survive. Mr. McNamara says about that year:

"By the year 2025 . . . the population of sub-Saharan Africa . . . will have risen from 363 million to 1,201 million."

That is 1·2 billion people, almost four times the present level.

I was struck by the report "Africa's Development Disasters" by the Catholic Institute for International Relations. It is no secret that the Catholic Church has fairly strong views about artificial contraception. A number of hon. Members and I recently went to see Cardinal Hume, the senior Catholic prelate, to express our concern about some of the things that the Pope has been saying both in Africa and Latin America recently. Nevertheless, the CIIR, in its excellent report, had some interesting things to say about population. I regard this almost as the turning of the tide. It says:

"For Africa as a whole, though total income has risen, the greater growth of population meant that by 1983 income per head had declined to 4 per cent. below its 1970 level."

That is, in 13 years, income per head in sub-Saharan Africa had decreased in one of the poorest parts of the world.

My hon. Friend the Member for Vauxhall quoted the following figure in his interesting speech. The report continues:

"In most countries, food consumption per head is now less than it was in 1970 . . . The 24 African countries classified as most seriously affected by drought and famine in the period 1983-85 registered a reduction in grain production per person of around 2 per cent. a year between 1970 and 1984 . . . With an overall rate of population growth of 3 per cent. per year, Africa will have a population of 1,100 millions by the year 2010. This means that Africa will have to achieve a rate of economic growth of 3 per cent. a year just to stand still. Clearly, if Africa's economic decline continues it is difficult to see how such a population can be sustained."

I welcome those comments from the CIIR, because they show, for the first time in any Catholic publication that I have seen, a recognition of the damage caused by too fast rises in population when food supply is not organised and is deteriorating fast.

One of the lessons of this well-informed debate is that we have to take account, as I hope that the ODA and the Minister will, of the need not merely to consider increases in total aid, and within that increases in the amount of aid going to proper agricultual projects that will ensure that food is available to the poorest people, but of the ecological conditions. Some of the agricultural projects previously encouraged by the development agencies have been an ecological disaster.

There is much to do in terms not merely of increasing aid to agriculture but of ensuring that when we talk to these Governments we point out to them that one of the ways in which they can help themselves, apart from putting their own house in order both agriculturally and administratively, is to do something positive about tackling their growing population problem.

What worries me more than anything else is that eventually, as famine inexorably follows famine—if not next year but the year after that and the year after that because of population pressures and ecological degradation in this part of Africa—people in the rich countries will wake up and say, "Just a moment; we are being asked to give more and more aid just so that we can save people from starvation. We are not doing anything to increase the prosperity of these countries by improving their rate of economic growth." I am sure that all hon. Members wish that to be avoided. As one of the major donors, with great experience in this part of Africa, there is a great task ahead of Britain to show what can be achieved by the policies that we adopt. I hope that this debate will help to achieve that aim.

6.42 pm

Mr. Ian Grist (Cardiff, Central): The hon. Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Deakins) referred to qualifications for speaking in this debate. I base mine on the fact that after leaving university my first two jobs took me to Africa: to the rain forests, about which great appeals are now being made, to the great grasslands of the Cameroons and to the sub-Sahelian near deserts of Chad and northern Nigeria. Therefore, I have a little experience of these areas. The love of my life has been to follow African affairs, but what a sad story it has been for so long.

[Mr. Ian Grist]

I concur entirely with the hon. Member for Walthamstow's fears about overpopulation. When I first went to Nigeria the population was estimated in the last census that was taken in 1972 — because everything from idiotic administration to fears and jealousies has prevented any other since then—to be 40 million. It is thought that the population is now 90 million, give or take 20 million either way. By the turn of the century it will be 150 million and it is estimated that eventually it will steady at 500 million to 600 million. A more dangerous scenario I cannot paint.

A country of the size and power of Nigeria with that kind of population is likely to be a danger to its neighbours, as on occasion it has already proved to be. I am referring not to colonies but to the mismanaged economies of independent countries. It was in independent, not dependent, Africa that food production fell. There has been corruption on an almost unimaginable and unexampled scale.

If one wants an explanation of why some aid projects have failed, it is because the host countries did not believe in helping the peasantry and in producing food for themselves. They believed in the crackpot idea of industrialisation and urbanisation. They thought that this was the way to create a modern society. They did not believe that one could have a modern, rural society. Many people fail to understand that the United States is one of the biggest primary producers in the world and that it is also the greatest industrial nation. I believe that it was the London School of Economics that encouraged this chaotic idea. It resulted in subsidised food for the urban masses. The subsidies have failed because of failing economies. Consequently, starvation has broken out in the towns too. There have been wars, civil wars and coups. The record is catastrophic.

I do not know how many hon. Members read the article by Professor Michael Beenstock that was published in The Times on 31 October 1985. It is headed "Drought compounded by folly." He said:

"Government policies of keeping agricultural prices at artificially low levels have reduced smallholder incentives to produce basic foods. So there have been food valleys rather than mountains and shortages rather than plenty. Sahelian Governments have operated this inverted policy in the hope that it would keep the relatively well-off population happy with cheap food from the countryside. As a result, the farmers have hardly had the capacity to cope with normal weather conditions, let alone drought."

At the end of his article Professor Beenstock said:

"Charity should begin at home: Sahelian Governments should give agriculture a chance. Aid from Western governments will most probably do little more than support the current official impoverishment of agriculture. Instead of marching on Westminster to demand more aid we should be marching on the Sahelian embassies, calling for the removal of anti-agricultural and pro-industrial biases in their policies."

That is the truth of the matter and that is the aspect of African life that the Overseas Development Administration has to face.

That has been recognised by many Africans themselves. There was an excellent article in the magazine West Africa that looked at 25 years of Nigerian independence. It was written by Nnamdi Anyadike. He said:

"the 'urban-based' development that characterised Nigerian's investment patterns led to a gradual deterioration in the quality of life in rural areas, forcing the most able-bodied to decamp to the towns. Those who were left, usually the elderly, less educated or those otherwise unable to leave the villages, could hardly keep pace with production to feed the expanding population in the towns. This exodus to the cities became a stampede when oil started to overtake agriculture as the mainstay of the country's economy."

All hon. Members know what has happened because of the value of oil during the last few years. Mr. Anyadike gave an instance of what happened to production between 1970 and 1982. He said:

"Cocoa has declined by 43 per cent., rubber by 29 per cent., cotton by 65 per cent. and ground nuts by 64 per cent."

Hon. Members can probably remember the photographs, taken before the first world war, that illustrated our geography books of gentlemen standing in front of mountains of ground nuts in Nigeria. But Nigeria has begun to import ground nuts. As for palm oil, upon which Unilever was based, and also Lord Leverhulme, Mr. Anyadike said:

"Nigeria moved from being the world's largest exporter to being a net importer, primarily from Malaysia."

Malaysia is another Third world country that has got its act together better. There is a moral for Africa if it looks at the far east.

Which countries in west Africa have not been affected in this way? The Ivory Coast contains three times the number of Frenchmen that were there at independence, and it has come to terms with the International Monetary Fund. It does not suffer from starvation. It feeds its people.

The Cameroons was the host to thousands of refugees from the civil war in Chad. Nobody heard very much about that problem because the Cameroons could feed those refugees. That country grew and still grows its own food. In President Ahidjo the Cameroons had a person who came from the countryside and who wanted to promote the welfare of small farmers. Therefore, the small farmers of the Cameroons always received a reasonable price, and they were encouraged thereby. Marketing arrangements were established for small farmers. Roads were built and the farmers were able to produce food for the people of the Cameroons and also for the displaced people of other countries.

Aid must, of course, be continued for cash crops. I remember how welcome it was in the grasslands of the Cameroons when the villagers found that they could grow coffee. They also found that the coffee plants brought in cash with which they could pay for water supplies. They found that by having a cash crop they could help themselves. It is not right to decry cash crops, particularly when they become the mainstay of a country like Ghana which, when it was the Gold Coast, was the greatest producer of cocoa in the world. However, its production has slumped and the Ivory Coast next door, aided by smuggled cocoa from the lower paid Ghanaian farmers, is now the greatest producer of cocoa.

Mr. Stuart Holland: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Grist: No, not at this stage.

We ought to provide assistance for power stations. We have provided such assistance to the Sudan. The people in those countries deserve electrical power, if only to provide power for their hospitals. If one goes into hospital in Lagos, the power, because of Nigeria's economy, may be turned off.

These people live in modern states. They need roads and vehicles with which to transport food. Ought we to provide aid to transport food around a modern country? Ought not the roads to be in place and the vehicles to be there? Should not the appropriate skills be there, too, so that when vehicles break down they can be repaired? Should not there be money from cash crops, be they cotton or cocoa, to buy the tyres with which to keep vehicles on the road? Is not that the better kind of aid? Is it not better to try to promote skills and to ensure that these countries understand what is needed? They must be helped to understand that they must help their farmers to help themselves and their countries. My hon. Friend the member for Broxtowe (Mr. Lester) referred to the bright lights of Khartoum. One thinks of the old saying:

"How do you keep them down on the farm
Now that they've seen Paree?"

One has to ensure that the villages provide sufficient attractions to keep people in the countryside. Provided that farmers in rural countries receive a fair price, they will produce food themselves, just as the European Community farmers, or farmers anywhere else in the world, can nose out a profit and go for it.

The Chinese have discovered that moral. Since the Chinese peasants were given a price incentive to aim for, China's food production has rocketed in the past five years. Precisely the same is beginning to happen in Africa. Drought was a terrible disaster, but it was exacerbated ten times by the policies which the African Governments have put into place. Heaven help the African Governments if they have not learnt that, although the West can do much to help them, they must have sensible policies and not those which have led to the creation of urban masses, Mercedes cars and other forms of corruption. Their policies have not helped the Africans, the people that I came to know in the villages and countryside so well and whose welfare I hold deeply at heart.

6.51 pm

Mr. Guy Barnett (Greenwich): Like the hon. Member for Cardiff, Central (Mr. Grist), I have lived and worked in Africa. Unfortunately, in view of his speech, that is about all I share with him.

It is too easy to assume that all the mistakes that have been made in the African continent are the responsibility of Africans and that the West and the East—the rich world—have no responsibility for Africa.

The hon. Member for Cardiff, Central was correct when he said that after independence serious mistakes were made. Sometimes these mistakes were made with the full encouragement of the West and some of them were as disastrous as the hon. Gentleman has described. On the other hand, the hon. Gentleman should bear in mind—and I am sure that he knows this from his own experience — that we handed over power to one African Government after another but did not hand over the administrative training that was necessary to run the African economies.

I was a teacher in Africa and I remember the speed with which my pupils rocketed to the top of the civil service because they happened to be in just the right generation to do so. My pupils found themselves taking on enormous responsibilities in the civil service, in parastatals and other institutions where they had very little experience of running such enormous organisations or carrying out the required administrative work.

The hon. Member for Cardiff, Central referred to the attraction of bright lights, but he must know that that attraction was already a serious factor during the colonial period. I recall the mounting problem in the back streets, in the slum areas and the shanty towns on the outside of cities such as Nairobi that arose because of the attraction of urban life.

On previous occasions, I have said that in many ways the West has all too readily given the impression that the answer to Africa's problems was industrialisation and the urban community. The West may not have stated that explicitly at times, but by our actions we have given the impression that that is the case.

The West often blames African Governments for failing to take sufficient notice of their remoter areas. I remember visiting the Ghanaian Ministry of Education and one of the officials asked where I had been. When I told him that I had been to Tamale in northern Ghana, he was amazed. He was even more amazed when I told him that I had actually been as far as Bolgatanga. He said that he had never been to Bolgatanga and he never expected to go there.

It is all very well for the West to be critical of the Africans in that respect. It so happens that I have been neither to Lands End nor John O'Groats. It is, therefore, not surprising to find officials in the civil service in Accra or in any other capital in the world who have not travelled the length and breadth of their countries. It would be relatively easy for me to get to Lands End, John O'Groats or other remoter parts of the United Kingdom, but the areas that we are now discussing are so remote that it would be difficult, if not impossible, to grow cash crops.

Many of the West's aid policies have been aimed at encouraging Africans to develop cash crops which the Africans felt they needed in order to deal with their worsening economic circumstances. The Africans hoped that such aid would help them to produce more and more coffee, tea, cocoa and other crops. The world prices of those commodities often fell and they had to increase production in order to balance their payments and to import machinery and equipment from the industrialised world. In many respects the West has forced those problems on Africa. Much of our aid programme has been successfully directed towards the production of cash crops.

Sir Anthony Kershaw: The hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Barnett) is not being entirely fair when he blames the colonial powers for not having trained the colonial territories before their departure. I recall hardly any protests from either side of the House about our not staying long enough in the colonial territories. Nor was it suggested that it was not right to leave until adequate training had been given. No one protested about that at the time. It was the fashion to get out, and get out we did.

Mr. Barnett: I do not claim for a moment that we should have remained in the colonial territories longer than we did. The political circumstances were such that we could not. Perhaps we should have foreseen the need for Africanisation of the civil service long before we did. In India we at least handed over responsibility to a Government where there was a measure of experience in the states and in the government of India itself, but I could quote case after case in African countries where such skills were not present.

[Mr. Barnett]

Recently the British Council has made possible the training of Kenyan district commissioners in this country. The council is providing the training needed to raise standards of district administration in Kenya.

There is no doubt, however, that we should have foreseen the need for that training and the handing over of responsibility. We should have been more capable of predicting the probable dates of independence. Indeed, the Colonial Office told a colleague of mine shortly after the war ended that the probability was that no African country would become independent until the end of this century. That was the accepted wisdom of the Colonial Office.

There has been an over-concentration on cash crops, often in the areas that are well endowed with good soil, good rainfall and good climate. One exciting aspect to arise from the tragedies in Africa is the realisation that has been expressed over and over again in the debate of the need to concentrate on the remote, semi-arid areas. That need is becoming increasingly apparent both to the African Governments and to the West.

The hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) and others referred to the great increase in public interest in overseas development. I should like to mention one interesting figure. When the Brent lobby took place in 1981, everyone was astonished that 10,000 people should lobby the House of Commons on behalf of people other than themselves. The lobby that took place in October consisted of twice that number. That is another example of the enormous growth in interest.

I believe unquestionably that the reason for the growth in interest is that people have been affected by the appalling pictures of the famine in Sudan and Ethiopia that they witnessed on their television sets. But there was something more than a quantitative increase in people's interest. For many years people were concerned about the effect of famine, and their natural reaction was, "We must feed that child and that family". But there is now a great realisation among the public of the need for long-term development in the semi-arid areas.

Mention has already been made of the report "UK Aid to African Agriculture". I was a member of that working party, which was chaired by the hon. Member for Broxtowe (Mr. Lester). I wish to refer to only one part of it, because it is relevant to our debate. We discovered in our researches that the contribution that Britain makes to agriculture in Africa as a proportion of our aid to that continent is far smaller than it should be, and that our contribution to the semi-arid areas is very poor indeed.

Having quoted figures, the report says:

"It emerges from these figures that there has been little movement on UK aid to African agriculture despite the growing crisis of food production in the region."

We are talking of four countries that we visited. It continues:

"The share of UK bilateral aid directly or indirectly to agriculture varied between 26 per cent. and 35 per cent. of UK aid to Africa allocable by sector, or between 23 per cent. and 29 per cent. of total UK bilateral aid to Africa".

The report then goes on:

"The amounts have decreased in real terms."

That is the first point that must be made. The second is that we have concentrated a large percentage of that aid on the more favoured areas and on cash crops, and we have made very little contribution to the kind of rural development projects in the semi-arid areas that could do most to help the people who are most vulnerable to the possibilities of famine in the future.

It has been said that this area of development is perhaps the most difficult. It is an area in which we shall have to make a contribution over many years before we begin to see the result. But if we are really responding to the mood of this country, that is where we expect the Government to make an increase and to ensure that a larger percentage of their aid is devoted to it. That is what the British electorate wants.

Many African Governments are realising the necessity for that, and, despite the difficulties that might be involved, it is important that we develop in those areas so that in future they become less vulnerable to the possibility of famine and the failure of the rains.

7.4 pm

Mr. Robert Harvey (Clwyd, South-West): The House can draw some relief from the fact that the December rains are now coming to ease the famine situation. It can also draw some relief from the fact that emergency European Community and other aid has in the end more than matched the problem. We should congratulate those voluntary organisations that have also helped. The western world rose to the challenge, and the response was magnificent.

However, three things are to be regretted. First, as the Select Committee report points out, in rising to the challenge, the Government found the necessary funds from within the existing aid budget and did not increase the overall provision. If anything justified a one-off emergency increase in funds, it was surely this. We do ourselves no good by appearing to be begrudging and ungenerous when we are not and by failing to understand the importance of aid in securing respect and influence throughout the world.

Secondly, the House should wholeheartedly deplore the attitude of the eastern countries, which throughout the famine provided their allies with generous quantities of arms but no food.

Thirdly, we should recognise that there is a limit to what can be done in the long term to lessen the effects of a disaster which is part natural and climatic and which is due also to agricultural policies practised in Ethiopia by a Government who place a greater premium on killing their own citizens than on saving them.

Another disaster to which other hon. Members have already alluded affects the development of these countries and their future defences against famine. It is man-made, and western Governments bear a responsibility, even though it is a responsibility of accident rather than the conspiracy theory that is so often suggested by the Opposition. I am referring to the debt crisis which is squeezing the life out of Africa and Latin America.

The dimensions of that crisis cannot be exaggerated. For nearly four years, real incomes in those two continents have fallen sharply after two decades of sustained economic expansion. In the shanty towns of the non-Asian Third world, where once there was hope, there is now an average loss of income of about 20 per cent. Malnutrition, infant mortality and crime are on the increase. Where once income flowed from the richest countries to the poorest, billions are now being shipped the other way. The non-Asian countries are no longer underdeveloped—they are undeveloping.

The reasons for the debt crisis are well documented and go back to the 1979-80 oil price shock which sucked about $600 billion mainly out of developing world economies, but also out of industrialised economies, to swell the coffers of a few oil-producing nations. Those oil producers could not spend the money fast enough and put much of it on short-term deposit with the commercial banks. The commercial banks could not find a home for those funds in the developed world, which was practising very restrictive economic policies, so they sent their loan managers to the Third world to offload money there.

The scale of the irresponsible lending of those days beggars belief. Some of it went on worthwhile projects or to correct balance of payments deficits that were badly interrupted by the oil price shock, but of the $300 billion or so that went into Latin America during that period at least $100 billion went straight out again into foreign bank accounts. In big cities such as Lagos in Nigeria and Santiago in Chile, much of the money went into short-lived property booms. It all came to an end very quickly.

A fair measure of blame must attach to the irresponsibility of the local Governments—most of them unelected—who borrowed the money. But the major western financial institutions that made it all possible also bear a large part of the responsibility, not to mention the western Governments that failed to regulate them. It is at least a consolation that most British banks were so much wiser and more cautious than their American counterparts.

But, setting responsibility to one side, let us consider the way out of this financial holocaust for the Third world. For the West's ill-equipped financial regulatory institutions it has been a holding operation, of sending for the IMF with its prescriptions for putting economies right and of insisting on as many debt and service payments being met as possible. Yet the holding operation may no longer be sustainable and, indeed, may be becoming downright dangerous. The United States may no longer be able to run up the huge trade deficits which have allowed those countries to correct their balance of payments deficit.

The risk of one country engaging in a sudden default or joining other countries in a concerted default have grown. In Peru a president has been elected who has effectively defaulted. For President Alfonsin of Argentina, for the democratic President of Brazil and even for the unelected President of Chile, the instant popularity that may be derived from standing up to the gringo bankers is pretty tempting. Even conservative opinion in those countries now considers that default is preferable to generating larger and larger balance of payments surpluses merely to keep the debt from growing in real terms.

There is a considerable danger that the debt is playing into the hands of extremists in those countries. The debt problem is not easing for those countries in spite of the sacrifices that have been made. After four years of belt tightening the Latin American debt burden has grown from £200 billion to nearly £300 billion.

For Africa, which lacks Latin America's financial muscle, the situation is desperate. Between 1973 and 1983 Africa's debt increased by 22 per cent. per annum which greatly exceeded the growth of output or exports. At the end of 1983 the total debt burden was £58 billion. In addition, £5 billion was owed to the IMF and short-term debt and arrears amounted to £18 billion. This puts the total debt at £81 billion. Unofficial estimates of the debt range from £107 billion to £150 billion. The growth of the debt has not been matched by an increase in Africa's capacity to pay. Over the past decade all the main debt indicators deteriorated sharply. The debt service ratio increased from 9·2 per cent. to 22 per cent. When payment of short-term debts and arrears of payment to the IMF are included, the debt service ratio exceeded 50 per cent. in Africa. For some countries it exceeds 100 per cent.

In Africa, as in Latin America, very little investment or modernisation is taking place. This can only prolong their recessions, diminish their competitiveness and create the conditions which have allowed famine to spread in Africa. In Africa the foreign exchange reserves have fallen to less than the value of one month's imports. Between 1980 and 1983 the level of new commitments to Africa fell by 45 per cent. Authoritative projections suggest that, even if there is a sustained recovery in OECD growth, Africa cannot expect to see any improvements in living standards over the coming decade and can probably expect to see the situation getting much worse.

In the view of many economists, default in Africa and Latin America would clear the air. Today, with the possibility of default hanging over Latin America and Africa, no banker in his right mind is lending anything other than to ensure that his debts will be repaid. Economists argue that once default takes place Latin America and Africa's growth prospects will be improved as those countries will be relieved of their debt service burden. After defaulting once, out of dire necessity, debtor countries will be concerned to re-establish their credit-worthiness and a second default can be ruled out in the medium term.

The present bail-out policies have only served to prolong the uncertainty in the world financial markets. That is unhealthy for all. It makes sense to act before default. All kinds of mechanisms have been suggested. Reference has been made to the Baker plan, and that plan is a step in the right direction. The long-term solution is for the American Government and Governments like the British Government whose banks have some exposure in the Third world to step in with a once-and-for-all cash guarantee for those banks that undertake to write off most of their debts. This would be inflationary, but it would be containable at a time when world inflation is under control. This would, at a stroke, end the world debt uncertainty. It would win the West friends throughout the developing world and undermine extremists. It would allow those countries to resume their development which is beneficial to the world economy.

Such a rescue must not be unconditional. The banks need to be penalised to some extent for the profligacy of their lending and should be required to contribute a percentage of their capital to the write-off. Measures should be taken to ensure that no bank is again permitted to expose itself in sovereign risk lending at past levels. The Governments and central banks should urge commercial banks or possibly development banks to resume lending to the developed world on a more modest scale for projects that guarantee profitability. Governments and central banks, while guaranteeing domestic deposit holders, might consider penalising overseas depositors to a degree that the retention of confidence in the banking system allows. This would get at both the exporters of capital from the Third world and the oil producers whose accumulation of financial surpluses, often at the expense of the developing world, led to the mad spending spree in the first place.

[Mr. Robert Harvey]

The growing impoverishment of the Third world cannot continue. The poorest third of mankind cannot go on transferring money to the richest in punishment for offences which they should never have been allowed to commit. It has been said that a third of mankind is being crucified on a cross of debt. If the burden proves fatal, the ground will tremble under the feet of the crucifiers. It is time for the western Governments to assume responsibility for the matter, or they risk not just famine but political and economic upheaval which they may not be able to control.

7.16 pm

Mr. Reg Freeson (Brent, East): It gives me pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Clwyd, South-West (Mr. Harvey). What the hon. Gentleman and other Members have said requires some response.

I, like others, have raised some of the issues over previous months and years but we have been—I say this bluntly—fobbed off by replies, not necessarily from the Minister. The replies of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to my questions on the debt question have not been satisfactory.

We have had a kind of holding operation but it cannot hold much longer. There must be some suggestion from the Government as to their policy and their aims in terms of a fundamental restructuring of the debt problem. If there is a restructuring, achieved by the write-off of debts, it needs to be coupled with a restructuring of the financial institutions and their relationship with the countries in Africa and elsewhere that they have funded. I emphasise the word funded. This will be a difficult and long-term problem to resolve.

Time does not permit me to speculate or explore these matters. I wish to discuss one or two other points to which I have listened with great interest and concern this evening and which I have followed elsewhere on previous occasions. The level of aid has been referred to time and again. Even if we were to reach the United Nations target, that would not be good enough. The Labour Government, of which I was a member, did not do enough either, but the present Government have nearly halved the level of aid. We are entitled to a response on that.

What is to be the level of support, under whatever heading, for agricultural development? I have sat through most of the debate and listened with great interest, but there has been hardly any mention of the relationship between the limited resources going on development aid and the obscenely huge resources going on arms trading and arms programmes. Arms trading is no longer a marginal acivity. It is essential to Britain and is becoming increasingly central to the industrial economies of ever more countries.

Unless we recognise that relationship in moral terms —by heaven, that is good enough—and in economic terms, we are hypocritical if we put our hands on our hearts and say that we really want to resolve the problem of hunger. The problem could be resolved. Unless, however, we are prepared to redirect resources away from arms trading, which increases instability and therefore insecurity and the threat of war, we shall achieve nothing. The criticism does not lie just with the Soviet Union in Ethiopia—it extends to Britain and other countries in the middle east, Africa and other parts of the world. Unless we are prepared to take on board that economic, political and moral link, we are hypocritical in saying that we want to end hunger.

That is all that I want to say today. I hope that we shall get a genuine response from the Minister to the issues that I have summarised, having listened to most of the debate.

7.23 pm

The Minister for Overseas Development (Mr. Timothy Raison): The right hon. Member for Brent, East (Mr. Freeson) has widened a fairly wide-ranging debate still further and I cannot guarantee to answer all of the points that he has raised. However, I shall try to cover as much ground as possible in what has been, by general consent, an excellent debate. The hon. Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Deakins) said that it was the best informed debate on a foreign policy subject that he had heard in the House. I do not think that we ought to congratulate ourselves too much, but it can be said quite fairly that it involved people with a great deal of knowledge.

Debates on aid have increased in quality in the past few years. Perhaps the House is matching the growing interest that is to be found among the British public. I have found it interesting to listen to our debates.

I pay tribute to the Foreign Affairs Select Committee and especially to its Chairman, my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Sir A. Kershaw). The Committee has served us well with the care with which it has studied these issues. My hon. Friend asked whether our development programme has been lamed by famine—a vivid phrase. He talked a little about the role of the European Community in famine relief and food aid and of the need for agricultural policies which will encourage food production. That was another of the debate's motifs.

My hon. Friends the Members for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells) and for Broxtowe (Mr. Lester) and the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) and others mentioned resources. The hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed made a passionate plea that commercial considerations should have nothing to do with the aid programme. I could not help noticing that the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) popped in a few moments ago. Did he mention the word "Westland"? I wonder whether there is a concerted Liberal party line on these matters.

In paragraphs 12 and 13 of its first report, the Select Committee argues that if the money from slippages had not been spent on famine relief in Africa it would have been spent on development projects and that it is not possible to establish how the ODA's expectation, as opposed to firm plans for the disbursement of the ODA programme, has been altered to allow for this provision of £27·75 million of famine relief in this financial year. It says that much of what we have spent on famine relief would otherwise have been spent on development activities. My hon. Friend the Member for Stroud seemed to imply that it would all have been spent on development activities, and talked of £85 million—the spending rate this year—if it had not been for the emergency famine relief operation.

I do not claim that none of the money spent on famine relief might in other circumstances have been spent on longer-term development. I have never claimed that and did not do so in our response to the Select Committee. I said:

"Most of our relief aid to famine-affected countries in Africa during the last twelve months has come from allocations already agreed for food aid, for disaster relief and for emergency action under the European Development Fund. None of our long-term development assistance programme has been cut to make room for emergency assistance; there has been unavoidable slippage of expenditure which has enabled some funds to be switched to emergency use."

It might be helpful if I were to say what was available in 1984-85 when we spent £95 million on famine-related operations in Africa. It is easier to take that financial year because it is over and the figures are available. We provided £17 million from the in-year contingency reserve in the aid programme, £15 million from our annual bilateral food aid allocations—we have repeatedly said that emergency food aid should have first call on food aid budgets—£47 million for food aid and famine relief contributed through the EC, £10 million, not £86 million, allocated as a result of unavoidable slippage in other activities in the aid programme and £6 million of additional money from the Ministry of Defence last year towards the cost of the Ethiopian airlift.

It is clear that the great bulk of that money would not have been spent on development if there had been no famine. No bilateral or multilateral programme has been reduced in 1984-85 or this year to make way for emergency assistance. Cuts in planned activities seriously disrupt any attempt to run a long-term development programme and we are anxious to avoid them. By flexible management of the funds available, however, we have succeeded in avoiding cuts and concentrating on greatest needs. In 1984-85, only £10 million of the slippage money could have been expected to go to development work, although not necessarily. Some of the contingency reserve might also have been directed to that area. The essential purpose of the contingency reserve is to deal with emergencies and the unexpected, not with long-term development that clearly requires planning.

Although I acknowledge that some of the money could have gone to development, from the facts it is clear that we have not knocked a huge sum of money off the development programme to provide for famine relief. We have used our resources to best effect. I repeat that the Community is now increasingly, although belatedly, targeting its food aid programme to areas where there is real hunger rather than pursuing the indiscriminate and untargeted food aid policy for which it has been criticised for a long time. We are now making progress.

Mr. Stuart Holland: The Minister is seeking to excuse slippage because it is small, but the House is worried that the aid budget is too small and is concerned about cuts.

Mr. Raison: That is a different point which is open to debate. The Select Committee's charge is that there has been a substantial diversion of funds. I believe that the facts that I have given to the House dispel that accusation.

Mr. Bowen Wells: Will my right hon. Friend explain whether the £47 million worth of food aid through the EC would have been expended in a year in which there was no famine?

Mr. Raison: Almost all of the sum would have been expended. I shall write to my hon. Friend on the details of that if he wishes. That amount is our share of Community action, of which we pay just under one fifth.

I shall say a few words about the areas of Africa where famine poses the greatest threat. For understood reasons, Britain has concentrated on Ethiopia and the Sudan. That does not imply that other countries do not face and continue to face serious problems, but multilateral institutions and the French, because of their relationship with francophone Africa, have concentrated their efforts in those areas. Britain has contributed an enormous amount to Ethiopia. As the House would wish, I must refer to the marvellous effort, which is ending this week, of the RAF Hercules team in Ethiopia. It returns amid the plaudits of everyone.

Of the 1·3 million tonnes of food aid pledged, more than 1 million tonnes has been delivered to Ethiopia. The shortage of road transport vehicles that was very bad earlier is now much relieved by the establishment of a new truck fleet under the auspices of the world food programme. Sufficient money has been pledged to cover the operating costs of the new fleet. There has been considerable improvement.

The prospects for 1986 look brighter, but it cannot be said that the famine is over, and further assistance will be needed. The recent Food and Agricultural Organisation's crop assessment mission's first rough estimate of the harvest recently collected is that the total food crop will be about 6·3 million tonnes. That is about 13 per cent. below the normal level in the early 1980s of 7·3 million tonnes. On those estimates, 5·8 million people will continue to face food shortages and about 950,000 tonnes of food aid will still be required for Ethiopia. I cannot give the House details, but the signs are that the required amount will be met by pledges, which have not yet been delivered, from the United States, the European Community and Britain. We must ensure that that happens. The international community is committed to ensuring that that is the case.

It is not possible for us to turn our attention away from the basic food aid programme, but we can consider the next phase of rehabilitation. As I told the House recently, we are providing £2 million for agricultural rehabilitation and £1 million to improve the water supply in Wollo. The EC is also setting up a rehabilitation programme.

There have been and still are great problems in the Sudan. I intend to visit the Sudan shortly after Christmas to see the circumstances myself. I shall not give the House details, but the essence is that there has been a good harvest. However, there will be a problem getting the food from where it is grown to other parts of the country that are in desperate need. I do not need to remind the House of the terrible difficulties that have been experienced in transporting food in the Sudan during the past year, but there are signs of improvement. I assure the House that we are deeply concerned about what happens in that country and we shall do all that we can to help.

The longer-term problem of assistance to basic agriculture has marked the debate. Hon. Members on both sides of the House have mentioned the importance of population policies, which are interwoven with the problem. It is vital to help basic subsistence and peasant agriculture. I have heard some wise words about cash crops. The mania about cash crops that occasionally arises is nonsensical. Cash crops have an important place, but it is essential to ensure that the basic agriculture of developing countries is helped. That is a major part of our aid programme. I should like to couple that view with what has been said about debt. I cannot go into much detail, but I shall give a topical instance of the way in which we are doing our best, through the aid programme, to deal with those major problems.

[Mr. Raison]

Zambia has had enormous economic difficulties because of its dependence on the copper industry, which is in serious decline. Zambia is faced with severe debt problems but it has great agricultural potential, which is not being fulfilled. A meeting is taking place today in Paris, organised by the World Bank, to tackle Zambia's specific problem. At the meeting, our representatives have undertaken to provide a further £13 million worth of aid for Zambia's requirements during 1986. That sum consists of £8 million from our regular funds and £5 million in association with the World Bank's special facility. Those amounts are grants and we recognise that Zambia is not in a position to undertake new loan obligations. We propose to provide a special grant of £1·5 million to permit the clearance of arrears of payment on aid loans made some time ago, which the Government of Zambia owe the British Government, up to the end of this month. We have pledged almost £30 million to Zambia in six months. I hope that other donors will respond in the same spirit. I believe that other donors will respond in the same spirit. I believe that that shows that the Government can mount a well directed substantial aid programme that will be widely appreciated.

My hon. Friend the Member for Clwyd, South-West (Mr. Harvey) and the hon. Member for Vauxhall (Mr. Holland) mentioned the problem of debt. In effect, my hon. Friend and the hon. Member called for the writing off of Africa's debt.

Mr. Stuart Holland: My request concerned at least a major share of the debt of the lesser and least developed sub-Saharan African countries.

Mr. Raison: I accept that. No doubt my hon. Friend would have made a similar qualification. The Government do not believe that that sort of global approach to debt is the right solution. We do not believe that writing off debt in a massive way lays the foundation for a lasting solution to Africa's problems. It could have a dramatic short-term effect, but in our view it would not meet the fundamental needs of Africa. We believe that the debt must be tackled in the light of each country's circumstances and in the context of basic policy reform and adjustment measures. We believe that this can normally be achieved best in conjunction with support from the IMF and the World Bank.

Debt rescheduling is being faced by the Paris club arrangements. As the record shows, they have proved responsive to the needs of individual countries and seem to be the right approach. We do not believe that the answer lies in global solutions, which inevitably will undermine the confidence of the banking community as a whole. It is no good saying, "What does that matter?", because it is that community which produces the money. It is no good going for a massive global panacea. We must have a realistic policy, and that is what we are pursuing. It must be coupled with the policy reforms which are being recognised increasingly as the essence of what has to be done in Africa.

The House knows that there is a great measure of agreement between the principal donors, both institutional and national, about policy needs, such as pricing policy for agriculture and realistic currency valuation. That is all to the good. Particularly encouraging are the increasing signs of acceptance in African countries that what I have described is that which needs to be done.

Mention has been made of the Harare declaration. I add to that, perhaps to my own surprise, that the communiqué at the end of the OAU summit meeting in July included some remarks about the development of agriculture in Africa. I do not wish to be patronising, but that seemed to show very good sense. The remarks of the OAU are much in line with the policies that we are advancing. I accept fully the argument of those who say that the problems that must be faced are of enormous size. No one can doubt that, but there is emerging gradually a form of coherent strategy. It is a painful process, but a strategy is emerging. If we have the guts to pursue it and if we can persuade the African Governments to pursue it, there is hope that we shall get somewhere. The Baker plan at Seoul was in line with that, and we have studied it with great care and sympathy.

I believe that the debate has been of real value to the House, especially to myself. I am grateful to all those who have participated in it. I hope that the House will accept that the policies that we are pursuing are those that stand the best chance of working to deal with the grave problem of which we are all aware.

It being three hours after the commencement of proceedings on the motion, the Question was deferred pursuant to paragraph (2)(c) of Standing Order No. 19 (Consideration of Estimates) and to the resolution [12 December].

Register of Members' Interests

Mr. Speaker: I have selected amendment (b) in the name of the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) and others, amendment (d) in the name of the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) and others, amendment (e) in the name of the hon. Member for Wealden (Sir G. Johnson Smith) and others, and amendment (g) in the name of the right hon. Members for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) and for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams).

I propose that there should be a joint debate on the main Question and on the selected amendments. At 10 o'clock, in accordance with today's business of the House motion, I shall call upon Members to move their amendments formally in the order in which they appear on the Order Paper. When the amendments have been disposed of, I shall put the main Question.

Many right hon. and hon. Members wish to take part in the debate, and as it will continue for only a relatively short time I appeal for short contributions.

7.44 pm

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): I beg to move,

That this House takes note of the Report of the Select Committee on Members' Interests in the last Session of Parliament; welcomes the intention of the Committee stated in paragraphs 7 and 9 of the Report to keep under review both Parliamentary lobbying and the appropriate scope of the declaration and registration required of Members who are so engaged; emphasises that it is the personal responsibility of each Member to have regard to his public position and the good name of Parliament in any work he undertakes or any interests he acquires; confirms that the scope of the requirement to register remunerated trades, professions or vocations includes any remunerated activity in the fields of public relations and political and parliamentary advice and consultancy; and in particular agrees with the Select Committee in its statement in paragraph 10 of its Report in regard to the registration and declaring of clients that the services which require such registration and, where appropriate, declaration: 'include as well as any action connected with any proceedings in the House or its Committees, the sponsoring of functions in the Palace, making representations to Ministers, Civil Servants and other Members, accompanying delegations to Ministers and the like.'.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that I may be the first to conform with your exhortation for tolerably brief contributions. I believe that the motion is drawn to enable a reasonably wide-ranging debate on Members' interests. I shall deal first with the modest proposals of the Select Committee and then turn to the wider issues. I shall speak very briefly to meet your wishes, Mr. Speaker.

The Select Committee's report made three specific recommendations which the Committee believed would lead to greater openness among those with access to Parliament—for example, Lobby journalists, research assistants and officers of all-party groups. These recommendations are contained in amendment (e) in the names of my hon. Friend the Member for Wealden (Sir G. Johnson Smith) and others. The motion does not propose acceptance of these specific proposals, and the reason is straightforward. I think that the major current public interest concerns the interests of Members. Therefore, I do not recommend acceptance of amendment (e). I emphasise that my view is related more to timing and tactics than to the merits of the argument.

I turn to the aspects of the Select Committee's report which relate to Members. The Committee undertook to keep under review parliamentary lobbying and the appropriate scope of the declaration required of Members engaged in this activity. Furthermore, the Committee set out a clear definition of the type of services which, if performed for individual clients, would require the registration and, where appropriate, declaration of these clients' names. This definition made particular reference to the sponsoring of functions within the Palace, making representations to Ministers, civil servants and other Members, and accompanying delegations to Ministers. This clarification is embodied in the motion. This will make clear what constitutes lobbying activities which are expected to be registered. It will also sustain the register as a support for the formal declaration of interest which has been the means whereby the House has been able to judge these matters in debate over the decades.

Traditionally, proceedings in this place have worked on a basis of trust and honour among Members. The way in which the practice of declaring an interest has developed is a clear sign that declaring and, more recently, registering can work only in an atmosphere of co-operation.

In 1969, the Select Committee on Members' Interests recommended that the requirement to declare one's interests during any proceedings of the House or its Committees, or in any communication with Ministers, other Members and civil servants, should be reinforced by a resolution of the House.

That resolution was passed on 22 March 1974, when a decision in principle was taken that there should be an additional requirement to register. The continuing original requirement to declare as well as to register is a sign that the register is intended to buttress the practice of declaring and not to replace it. Indeed, declaration in debate and in the proceedings of Select Committee work remains central and crucial in enabling the House to assess and evaluate any interest.

Some have argued that the register is vitiated because it is incomplete. The resolution of the House sets out categories of interest that should be registered; but the interpretation is left to individual Members. Given the nature of the register and the assumption on which it is based, I think that this degree of self-regulation is a common sense approach.

On the other hand, a small number of Members have declined to co-operate and to file a return of interests. Hitherto, the House has not attempted to exact any discipline for this disregard of a resolution of the House. I believe that a Member who avowedly disregards a resolution of this House of Commons diminishes his parliamentary stature.

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West): He has resigned.

Mr. Biffen: Some have suggested that a register might have statutory force. I believe that this proposal encounters the most formidable problems of definition, and would compound rather than ease our difficulties. The House, I think, has been modest but realistic to require declaration and registration within the framework of a resolution of the House.

Of course, I agree that the register has only limited objectives. Even so, I think that it has a valuable role, taken alongside the practice of declaration. That role is clearly enhanced by the full declaration by Members of the required information, and by the frequent updating of that information. I believe that the Select Committee will continue to pay attention to those matters and to advise and remind Members accordingly. Meanwhile, the House would be well advised to take realistic measures that will add to the authority of the register, and I believe that it has that opportunity this evening.

[Mr. Biffen]

I wish to refer to the wider issues of interest which properly concern the House.

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): While we are talking about wider measures, some of us would like to raise the matter of the value of such contacts with outside business interests or with investments being included in the register. Last Thursday I intervened in business questions and asked the Leader of the House whether the Prime Minister would be coming to the debate. I suggested that if she did not attend, it might be because she is more interested in pursuing local authorities such as Liverpool and less interested in pursuing the antics of Lloyd's, because one in eight Tory Members is a member of Lloyd's. The Leader of the House accused me of low-grade McCarthyism when I made that point. I take this opportunity to apologise to him. I had my facts entirely wrong. It is not 47 Tory Members who are members of Lloyd's, but 55. Therefore, one in seven Tory Members is moonlighting in the House when his real interests lie in business outside.

Mr. Biffen: As ever, I appear as an inadequate alternative to the Prime Minister. I can judge only on the extraordinary moderation of my language last Thursday. I shall now continue with the issues of interest that go wider than the register.

Amendment (g) in the name of the right hon. Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams) reminds us of those wider considerations. It is 10 years since the matter was debated in the House. Thus, I think it is wholly understandable that the right hon. Gentleman should seek to have further consideration on issues such as the declaration of the financial nature of an interest, and whether an interest should affect the right to vote on public Bills, as well as the declaration of interests during Question Time.

Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse (Pontefract and Castleford): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Biffen: Please allow me to go a little further. I shall not detain the House too long, but I should like to place on record my view of the general issues.

Some hon. Members have argued that Members should not be permitted outside interests. I do not share that view. I believe that there is advantage in the House having Members with outside paid interests. I think that it adds to the experience and judgment of the House. However, I also believe that such a tradition of outside interests can proceed only if we have an effective convention of declaration.

I believe that the House is best served by the declaration of interest in the proceedings of the House in the traditional sense covering debate and the work of Select Committees. I believe that it can operate only if there is mutual respect between Members and an acceptance of good faith and propriety. That somewhat traditional view of declaring an interest has been supplemented with the use of a register. The register should be sustained for its supportive role to declaration.

Mr. Lofthouse: Can a register mean anything if it allows people to get financial gain from a particular company and, providing he registers that gain, can continue to lobby in the House and cast votes? I believe that a person who has vested interests in obtaining financial reward from a company should not be able to vote for that company.

Mr. Biffen: I understand the hon. Gentleman's point. I said that I would give my own view on that issue and that I would say whether it is appropriate, whatever may be my view, for the matter to be referred to the Select Committee for further consideration.

Sir Kenneth Lewis (Stamford and Spalding) rose——

Mr. Biffen: I shall not give way.

In my view, our current convention involving declaration and register strikes a balance between openness in declaring the source of the interest and legitimate privacy by not expecting the Member to declare the financial extent of that interest. It is a balance that has served the House, and I do not favour its disturbance. Furthermore, I take that view not only on account of privacy. I believe that the practical problems of definition would frustrate the objective of recording the financial scale of interests.

However, I recognise the general interest in that question and, having made my own views clear, I am content with amendment (g) in the name of the right hon. Member for Swansea, West, which suggests that the Select Committee should pay particular attention to the amount of remuneration contained in an interest.

The second major problem that arises from the amendment of the right hon. Member for Swansea, West concerns whether interest should limit a Member's ability to vote on a public Bill. It has long been held that interest precluded voting on a private Bill, but there have been no corresponding inhibitions on a public Bill.

Once again, I think it is reasonable to seek the opinions of the Select Committee on the matter and I am certainly content that the House should so decide. None the less, I feel that Members' interests and the ambit of legislation run so wide and are so elastic as to make it near impossible to devise a workable rule in those matters. Even so, as with the amount of a remunerated interest, the House could be misunderstood if it was not prepared to have those broad matters generally and constructively considered by the Select Committee.

I feel that I have said sufficient to open the debate. I conclude by thanking the Select Committee for its report and by asking the House to endorse its helpful recommendations on Members' registration of lobbying interests.

I ask the House to desist, at least for the time being, from extending the register to the lobby and research assistants. I acknowledge that we should refer to the Select Committee the matters of interest and parliamentary questions, of quantified financial interest, and restrictions on voting. The House should be seen to be prepared to have considered all those matters, although I have made my own views clear on their merit and practicability. However, above all, I hope that the debate will assert our concern that Parliament will continue to be helpfully served by interest and that the existence of interest will be proclaimed in such a manner that hon. Members will properly describe the reality and the forum of the House.

7.57 pm

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West): I beg to move——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think that the right hon. Gentleman must have misheard me. He should move his amendment at the end of the debate.

Mr. Williams: I wanted to be sure that we would debate all the individual points. I shall be as quick as possible and I shall forgo any attempt to wind up because I want as many hon. Members as possible from both sides of the House to be able to take part.

We should emphasise that this should essentially be a House of Commons debate, not a party debate.

Mr. Tristan Garel-Jones (Watford) indicated assent.

Mr. Williams: The Whip seems to agree.

In making our points, I hope that we shall not make a football of the reputation of the House. I was reminded of that in a rather amusing way by a telephone call that I received yesterday morning from a charming young lady from a television channel that I shall not identify. She asked me what line I would be taking in the debate on behalf of the Opposition. After I had explained, she said that I had been very reasonable but she asked whether I would mind if she interviewed someone else instead.

I accept the conclusion of the Chairman, the hon. Member for Wealden (Sir G. Johnson Smith), and his colleagues in the early part of the report of the Select Committee on Members' Interests that it would be inappropriate to have an exclusive register of lobbyists, not because we do not want to know who the lobbyists are, but because we would be creating an elite who would gain a commercial advantage from the existence of such a register even if it could be properly defined. The conclusions of the report are well reached and well argued.

I shall deal with the proposals in the report as embedded in the amendment in the name of the Chairman. On the section relating to the lobby and the Press Gallery, I welcome the steps that have already been taken by the lobby through its practice notes to try to ensure that it limits the misuse of information that is available to it. We must bear it in mind that the lobby enjoys early information, often well before hon. Members enjoy it. They enjoy easy access to Ministers, hon. Members and off-record briefings.

For that reason, it does not seem unreasonable to me that we should adopt the recommendation in paragraph 1 of the amendment of the hon. Member for Wealden (Sir G. Johnson Smith), which requires the declaration of relevant interests. That is an important point to emphasise. We are asking not for information that is irrelevant, but just for relevant information in relation to lobby journalists' privileged positions.

The amendment also refers to secretaries and researchers. I accept that there are some abuses, although with most secretaries and researchers there is no such allegation from either side of the House. However, I wonder whether the hon. Member for Wealden's amendment goes a little too far. I should welcome his comments. He requires relevance for the lobby journalists, who have greater privilege and preference in access in the House, but for secretaries and researchers he requires registration of any gainful occupation. I do not think that it matters if the secretary does a little work on a Saturday afternoon, typing for the retailer at the end of the high street. While I am sure that that is not what the hon. Gentleman intended, I suspect that that is what is captured in the amendment. The same applies to the all-party and registered groups. I agree that there should be registration and disclosure, but I wonder why the Committee chose to exclude the use of the word "relevant" in those two cases. The amendment would have been strengthened if relevance had been required in all three categories.

I am grateful to the Leader of the House for his support for the amendment in my name and that of my right hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore). It is an attempt to take us a step ahead. We are not attempting to prejudge or predetermine the outcome, but there are areas of key concern that have been voiced on both sides of the House that merit investigation. That is all that we are asking for—that the Committee, on behalf of the House, gathers together all the evidence and brings up to date the recommendations that it would like to put before the House.

The first issue is voting. I readily accept that there are problems. For example, what do we do on Second Reading if an hon. Member has a nominal interest in one subsection? Is he debarred from voting on the whole Bill? That difficult issue needs to be looked at. I do not want to go into specific instances, but the difficulty is more acute in the context of a Standing Committee or a Select Committee when there is a relatively small number of votes and people have vested interests. Therefore, we should consider whether in some circumstances we should extend the current restrictions in relation to private legislation. I hope that the hon. Member for Wealden's Committee will take that on board.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): I intervene not on the basis of party politics. However, we know that several hon. Members are sponsored by a trade union. It would be absurd if they could not vote on industrial relations legislation or legislation connected with an industry in which they were sponsored. How would the right hon. Gentleman phrase any such legislation or a recommendation to prevent that happening?

Mr. Williams: The hon. Gentleman is asking me to do the very thing that I have tried not to do and asked the House not to do — to prejudge the issue. I accept readily, and have said to my hon. Friends, that if we are not careful, the measure could rebound to the disadvantage of both sides, inappropriately. We need to bear that in mind.

A formula has been suggested for parliamentary questions involving taxable income. That would be for the Committee to look at and it is not for me to give snap judgments on the basis of no evidence or information.

Mr. Terry Lewis (Worsley): This point should be answered. There is a great difference between a sponsored Member of Parliament who receives nothing through being sponsored by a trade union—the pittance that he is paid goes to the constituency party — and a Member who receives £8,500, which was quoted in a recent television programme. That amount was received by a Conservative Member representing a Channel tunnel company.

Mr. Williams: I am not dissenting from the basis of my hon. Friend's point, but all that he is doing is emphasising the need for the matter to be examined coolly and outside the rather overheated atmosphere of the Chamber. Indirect or non-monetary interests will have to be considered. Benefits in kind need to be taken into account and evaluated. All that we are asking is that the Committee should look at that.

With regard to parliamentary questions, we must bear in mind that a question can attract as much publicity as a speech. A question costs money and can provide rapid access to new information or be an easy way of supplying processed information to the questioner. It is a valuable service for those who have access to it. I float this as an idea. This option might be difficult for supplementaries, but there would be no problem in having a second box on the question form where one puts an "x", as we do when we want a priority written answer, when one submits a question in which one has an interest. When the question appears on the Order Paper, whether it is written or oral, there would be an asterisk showing that an interest has been declared. That would resolve the problem. It is done in the European Assembly, but I hardly dare mention that as an example.

Our amendment also refers to the amount of remuneration. That matter is of particular concern to my hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick). He wanted to be here but, as the Leader of the House understands, there are unavoidable reasons preventing him from being present. We must recollect that declaration of amounts was rejected in the Select Committee report 10 years ago. We accepted that evidence, but we should look at it again. There have been changes and an expansion in the interests of the House. In the context of the study that we are proposing, it would be appropriate to study whether the amount should be declared and, if so, what the guidelines should be and how they should be arrived at. An example is the value of a share in an unquoted company, and the value of benefits in kind.

I do not want to appear to avoid the crunch question of enforceability. It is not in our amendment. Like many hon. Members, we lived under what proved to be the illusion that the register is unenforceable. I should welcome the guidance of the Leader of the House. I read the speeches of the then right hon. Member for South Down, Mr. Enoch Powell, in 1975. A specious argument was put forward at the time. I ask for the Leader of the House's guidance on whether the register as it stands is enforceable. No one suggests that a resolution of the House should supersede statute law, which is what Mr. Powell claimed in 1975. The resolution is not intended to do that. Paragraph 37 of the Committee's report in 1974 is headed:

"Enforcement of the Requirements to Register".

It states:

"As the Clerk of the House pointed out, 'The ultimate sanction behind the obligation upon Members to register would be the fact that it was imposed by Resolution of the House . . . There can be no doubt that the House might consider either a refusal to register as required by its Resolutions or the wilful furnishing of misleading or false information to be a contempt'."

On that basis, it seems that the same remedies are available in our internal disciplines in the House as when, for example, Mr. Speaker deals with other issues relating to contempt of the House.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Grantham): The right hon. Gentleman has been fair, but I ask him to look at amendment (d) in the name of his hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) and others. Is not that a disqualification? If an hon. Member does not declare in the register, he may not take his seat. Is not that a matter for primary legislation, not resolution of this place?

Mr. Williams: I looked at the amendment closely. My name is not on it because I do not have the hon. Gentleman's advantage of being a lawyer. I could not make up my mind whether it is as he describes. If my hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) wants to deal with that himself, I am only too happy to relinquish the responsibility to him. I suspect that it is unnecessary, regardless of whether it is correct or incorrect, although I would welcome the guidance of the Leader of the House on whether my proposition is valid.

Is it necessary, as the Select Committee suggested in 1975-76 in the House of Commons document 479, that the House should render the resolution binding by incorporating it in the Standing Orders? As the matter stands now, does it have any mandatory basis? If the Leader of the House can give satisfactory answers when he replies on that aspect, it could preclude us from seeking to divide the House on certain other issues.

Mr. Robin Maxwell-Hyslop (Tiverton): What the House can do does not depend on memoranda written by Clerks. From time out of mind when the House has passed a resolution saying something is a contempt, that does not have to be embodied in Standing Orders and so it remains until and unless the House alters that resolution. The House can expel hon. Members who place themselves in contempt of its resolutions. It does not need a memorandum from the Clerk to make that known to each and every hon. Member.

Mr. Williams: I quoted what the Clerk said because it seemed to me that he would stand in greater repute on legal matters than I and it was contained in the report that came to the House.

It seemed to me that the resolution was already enforceable and that is why I asked the Leader of the House whether he would make it clear whether the recommendation made in 1975-76 was necessary. My reading of the matter is that the resolution as it stands is already enforceable.

Mr. Robert Adley (Christchurch): On a point of order Mr. Speaker. As you have selected amendment (b) in the name of the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen), two of his hon. Friends and three Members of the Liberal party, not a single one of whom has had the courtesy to turn up in the House, is it your intention that that should be voted upon?

Mr. Speaker: They may turn up, and in any event I have already announced my selection.

8.12 pm

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith (Wealden): May I take your advice, Mr. Speaker, and, I hope, be given your help? The right hon. Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams) made an interesting comment about my amendment and suggested that the insertion in two of the recommendations of the word "relevant" might make them acceptable to the House. Would it be all right if one of my hon. Friends—I know that one is present—moved a manuscript amendment later today so that the word "relevant" could be inserted? Although the recommendations are sound, it might make for greater acceptance if that were done.

Mr. Speaker: May I consider the hon. Gentleman's point before I rule on it?

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith: I am obliged to you, Mr. Speaker.

I thank the Leader of the House for finding time to debate the Select Committee's report. It is the first time that we have had one of our reports debated and I am thankful for that. I also welcome his comments and the fact that he endorses so much of it, but naturally I am sorry that he does not agree with our three main recommendations. However, I understand his reasons and I am sure he would equally understand if I pursue the matter. I also express my gratitude to the right hon. Member for Swansea, West for the way in which he has received the report in even more generous terms.

It is particularly important for the Select Committee to have an opportunity to test the opinion of the House. The cohesion and strength of purpose of the Committee depends on its understanding of what the House will or will not bear. There is little value in producing a report which impinges so personally on hon. Members if the Committee ends up either hopelessly divided or completely out of touch with the feeling of the House. That is no way to make progress. I hope that the House will note that the Committee has met, deliberated on the matters and presented a unanimous report.

I welcome the debate for a wider reason. The House is conscious, and rightly so—my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House made this point—of the need to maintain its integrity. It recognises the fact that to do so it is essential that hon. Members are indeed honourable and open and honest with one another. Whatever political differences divide us, we know that this place depends on trust and that it is trust in one another's integrity which unites us as well as maintaining our confidence in our proceedings.

Equally—it is a point worth making in view of the interest shown by the media—we are answerable to the electorate who recognise our need to demonstrate to the public our concern and so earn their confidence in us and in the good name of Parliament. I think that we can all agree that the Select Committee is just one part of that process. It cannot do the whole job. That is why in 1969 the Select Committee recommended that the House make the declaration of interest mandatory and the register was set up in 1974. I emphasis the word "mandatory". The need to declare is not, as has often been said, and most recently repeated ad nauseam in the media, a voluntary requirement; it is mandatory. So far only one hon. Member——

Mr. Patrick Cormack (Staffordshire, South): Ex-Member.

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith: —one former Member has refused to declare and register his interests. We all know that nothing has happened as a consequence. The resolution of the House has not been enforced. We have invited the House on previous occasions so to do but it has decided not to enforce it. If that is the view of the House, the Committee would be most happy to reconsider the matter. Undoubtedly the present system is cumbersome and unwieldy and is sometimes described as a sledgehammer to crack a nut.

Be that as it may, in 1977 the Select Committee recommended to the House that we might pursue the matter of enforcement through a Standing Order and the Standing Order——

Mr. Cormack: Does my hon. Friend agree that if he accepted the amendment in the name of the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) the problem could be solved?

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith: It is one way of solving it. I have great respect for the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) who is a hard-working Member of the Committee. I would prefer not to pass any judgment but just to draw to the attention of the House the fact that there is another way of dealing with the matter through the Standing Order procedure.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: Making it a Standing Order does not deal with it. The only thing that deals with it is a motion proposed by my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House to take enforcement action against a Member who has divided, whether it be a Standing Order or a resolution. Merely making it a Standing Order does not deal with it if the Standing Order is not enforced.

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith: It seemed to the Committee in 1977 a rather less cumbersome and simpler way of enforcement than going through the procedure of asking the House to agree to a resolution and therefore to bring a Member into the contempt of the House. Those are matters we are only too happy to look at.

I hope that right hon. and hon. Members will forgive me if I say one or two things that may be obvious to some but not to others and less so perhaps to those who read our affairs and those who are involved in public relations, lobbying and other practices. Therefore, I hope that I may have the indulgence of hon. Members.

We well accept that the report is limited in scope. No Committee members considered that it was the last word on the subject of lobbying or Members' interests. However, contrary to what some may think, once the Committee produces a report it is not just disbanded. It can consider representations and complaints and to keep matters under active review.

I am grateful that the motion of my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House acknowledges and welcomes the fact that we intend to keep these matters under review. The motion says that it "welcomes the intention of the Committee . . . to keep under review both Parliamentary lobbying and the appropriate scope of the declaration and registration required of Members who are so engaged."

Surely that is right.

Among the duties laid upon us by Standing Order No. 107 is the duty

"to consider any proposals made by Members or others as to the form and contents of the Register . . . to consider what classes of person (if any) other than Members ought to be required to register and to make recommendations upon these and other matters which are relevant."

Some three years ago the Select Committee decided to consider whether classes of person other than Members should be required to register. The Select Committee had previously considered that question in 1974 and concluded that registration should be restricted to hon. Members only. However, the Committee envisaged that, with the passage of time, the balance of advantage might change. Indeed, with the passage of time we have become aware of the growth in lobbying, that access to the precincts of this House has become more sought after, that the number of all-party and registered parliamentary groups has increased and that there has been a veritable flood of research assistants, notably this summer, who invade the House——

[Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith]

Mr. Adley: Haunt it.

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith: I would not say that they haunt it — indeed, some of them are extremely attractive.

The committee embarked upon its inquiry into whether the register should be extended——

Mr. Nellist: Will the hon. Gentleman take on board the fact that there may be people — especially outside the Chamber — more interested in the fact that 55 Tory Members of Parliament are moonlighting by working here when their real interests lie outside the House? The right hon. and learned Member for Hexham (Mr. Rippon) holds the chairmanship of 29 companies and a further three directorships. I do not know how he manages to attend the House at all. Remarks about secretaries and research assistants pale into insignificance—[Interruption.] Come on, Mr. Speaker, let me have a bit of protection.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will sit down. He intervened to ask a question, but he appears to be making a contribution to the debate. He must put his question.

Mr. Nellist: Do not remarks about secretaries and research assistants pale into insignificance compared with the number of Tory Members of Parliament who moonlight by turning up in this Chamber when their real careers lie outside the House?

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Does the hon. Gentleman moonlight when he is here or when he is serving as a county councillor?

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith: The hon. Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist) is not following my argument. If he shows a little more patience, I am sure that he will find that everything that should be put into its proper perspective will be so put.

While we are conscious of the growth of professional lobbying during recent years, we are also aware of the risk of conflict of interest where hon. Members are professionally engaged in that area. We all recognise that an hon. Member must be free to discharge his duties on behalf of his constituents and the country at large. Equally, it is the right of any citizen to represent his interests through his Member of Parliament and to lobby. Whether they are companies, trade unions or charitable bodies, they all do it; it is part of the democratic process.

It was in trying to balance those considerations about lobbyists, both in terms of difficulties of definition and the wish not to appear to give any group special privilege, that the Committee rejected the idea of a register. I am grateful to have the endorsement of my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House on that point.

On whether to extend the scope of what hon. Members are currently asked to declare, the Committee decided that the balance struck between openness and privacy was about right. Nevertheless, it had received worrying evidence about doubtful practices, so it undertook to keep the matter under review, together with any further developments in lobbying techniques. The right hon. Member for Swansea, West will gather from what I have said that keeping the matter under review is exactly what we mean. Indeed, the Committee decided that it would be reasonable to consider some of the current practices and whether the constraints imposed upon voting intentions and the amounts earned should be declared.

The Committee considered whether to extend the register to other classes of person. It found that unexpected use was being made of the privileged access to Parliament by some of those holding passes to the Palace. Allegations were made that those with access to the building were providing a paid service to people who were other than their stated employers. That is why the Committee recommended that, for example, journalists should register other interests.

The Committee received evidence that some of those engaged in professional public relations work secured passes as Members' research assistants and secretaries to gain full and prompt access to parliamentary papers. The Committee said that they should declare their interests if they were earning over and above what they could earn for the express purpose stated for their attending the House. It is important that when hon. Members talk to a lobby journalist or research assistant they should be sure that they actually work here and do not represent some other interests.

It was not strictly within the Committee's competence to consider the use of subterfuge. However, many people find it disagreeable, as did the Committee, that the use of subterfuge is necessary to be able promptly to obtain parliamentary papers. It is clear that the solution is to provide a parliamentary bookshop with public access. I know that one is planned for the new building, but that is some years ahead. In the meantime, I hope that my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House will consider setting up a temporary bookshop.

The Committee considered the question of what to do with all-party groups — now called registered groups, although they are not always registered. It discovered that some of those groups received support from outside organisations, but that that was not always declared. It felt that the House should know about that, and recommended that the groups should declare any outside sources of income. If the groups had working for them someone who was not an hon. Member but someone representing another organisation, the House should know about that also.

The Committee's recommendations are set out in the amendment and are designed to secure openness. What we are requesting should be registered is far less than that which Members are asked to declare publicly. The register would not be made public, but maintained for the use of hon. Members. I am sure that the officers of all-party and registered groups would be happy to furnish the necessary information, and the representatives of secretaries and research assistants have expressed their willingness to register.

Curiously enough, and I do not wish to offend the powerful fourth estate as many of them are friends of mine, to date it has been only the representatives of the Lobby and Gallery — those journalists who are demanding that the Members' register should be extended — who have objected to being asked to register the gainful uses to which they put their privileged access to the House.

I should like to refer to the Committee's future work and put it into perspective. I hope that the right hon. Member for Swansea, West heard the message, when he was at the far end of the Chamber, that we shall look into his suggestions. The Committee has already discussed informally and agreed to an hon. Member's request that we should consider whether an hon. Member should be called upon to declare the amount of remuneration as well as the source. It will not be easy to determine this matter, especially as some hon. Members who have put their names to one motion believe that Members should rely solely on their parliamentary salaries.

I do not want to debate the issue but shall make one point as an illustration of the problems that we are likely to face. Due to the vagaries of the election process, there is a rapid turnover of Members. Members come here knowing that their life expectancy in the first round is probably only four or five years. It is not surprising that some people with family responsibilities, knowing that they have a short spell ahead of them, cling to the lifeline of an outside interest, and I think that we should be generous in that respect. We all know that Members' needs and personal responsibilities vary. There is no career structure, no merit award system, no grading of salaries for seniority, experience or responsibility, and no demerit awards for garrulity. Minister, too, are subject to the vagaries of parliamentary fortune. They, too, can fall from grace through a mistake, a change in the election or a leader's whim. We all know that this can happen.

Constraints on voting are normally matters for the Select Committee on Procedure. However, if the Select Committee on Members' Interests is asked to consider this issue, I would expect those constraints to come within our terms of reference, providing they are discussed in a financial context. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House will give some advice on that.

We all know that the constraints under which a Minister of the Crown operates are tightly drawn. Ministers of the Crown can have no outside interests. They can draw only one salary. We all know the reasons for that. In contrast, a Back Bencher has no executive powers. In that respect, he has less power than some councillors we know. However, Members have influence — some more than others — although it is subject to all kinds of scrutiny, not least by Members themselves who have an uncanny knack from time to time of judging the merits of the influence or value of the advice of one Member against another. If it is right not to devalue that influence, it is surely common sense not to exaggerate it either. The same goes for lobbyists, who sometimes like to claim that they have more influence than they know to be the case.

The House is full of checks and balances. It is only by recognising the need to preserve the balances without weakening the checks on abuse and failing to see the need for new ones that the Select Committee on Members' Interests can proceed and earn in its own right the confidence of the House and, I hope, of those outside.

8.33 pm

Mr. Roy Mason (Barnsley, Central): I should like to refer to the 14 Select Committees which were established after the 1979 general election. The parliamentary Labour party was foolish to continue manning them after the 1983 election. The Labour party has about 200 Members of Parliament. We have difficulty in manning the Standing Committees on Bills and the 14 extra Select Committees. They take about one quarter of our parliamentary strength. I suppose that, after the 1983 election, some Members of Parliament wanted the glamour of being on a Select Committee. It was an innovation, a chance to get at the Executive, to have a few swans abroad and to pick current newsy political topics for examination, followed by a burst of publicity and then, usually, a 24-hour blurb in the press.

Select Committees meet 40 per cent. of the time the House is sitting — hence empty Chambers and snide remarks from the press, making it easier for Ministers because there is less interrogation and pressure. Above all, the Government take little notice of the reports and recommendations and, apart from the reports of the Committee of Public Accounts, fewer than 5 per cent. of the Select Committee reports since 1979 have been debated.

I suppose that too many parliamentarians have a vested interest in Select Committees continuing, useless though they are. No doubt there are some more knowledgeable parliamentarians, especially those who take the subjects seriously, but only about 60 per cent. attend regularly. They get swamped with bureaucratic bumf; some do not read it all; and Ministers, civil servants and industrialists know when questioned whether the Member of Parliament has done his homework.

I have appeared before and sat on Select Committees and therefore have some knowledge of them. Now we also have a civil servant-like structure propping them up — clerks, secretaries and typists, plus an established career structure. Those people do not want Select Committees to be curtailed or abolished either. An alliance has therefore been formed.

The 14 Select Committees represent a massive investment of money, time and travel for practically no return. Whitehall is full of dust-covered Select Committee reports which will never be heeded or debated. It is a national system — a national boring system — employing hundreds of Whitehall civil servants and House of Commons clerks, a paper-grown empire of relatively worthless activity. I believe that the Select Committees should be abolished.

This brings me to our report and the question whether it will be heeded. We are not one of those 14 Select Committees. We are not shadowing or stalking a Department. We do not have money to travel. We are a Housebound Committee examining Members' interests and how they affect the House. We sat for more than 18 months examining witnesses, lobbyists, members of the Press Gallery and others. The Committee does not have a totally free hand, because many of the in-House activities are covered by the Services Committee and complaints about Members using House facilities must be referred to that Committee.

We have prepared a report which has three main recommendations. According to the motion in the name of the Leader of the House — on this occasion, the mouthpiece of Government — the Government have decided to ignore the lot. Why have we been sitting for two Sessions? What a sheer waste of time. The Government are laughing their heads off, tucking Members away so they cannot cause any trouble. We are to be treated like the rest of the Select Committees. The Leader of the House regards our report just like the vast majority of others—as dustbin material.

[Mr. Roy Mason]

We recommend that, because of nefarious, dubious, money-making activities by some journalists and research assistants using, abusing and exploiting facilities in the House through the use of their job passes, three registers should be established—for lobbyists, Gallery journalists and research assistants. If there is to be a clean-up—if that is the "in" phrase—let them register their extra press jobs, public relations activities and extra-mural commercial dealings.

Of course I respect the integrity of the vast majority of our press men. There is no doubt that the majority stick to the Lobby and Gallery rooms and work solely for the paper accredited on their pass. I ask the House not to be diverted too much by the recent hoo-hah by a handful of Tory Members involved in the Channel tunnel contracts. They have been flushed out anyway and have suffered politically as a result. By concentrating on that aspect of our parliamentary affairs, the press is shrouding its own misdemeanours. Look at last Sunday's headlines: the Sunday Telegraph—

"The real issues of MPs' extras";

The Sunday Times—

"New bid to make MPs come clean"; and The Observer—

"MPs must come clean on lobbyists".

There was no mention of our report or our recommendations, and no mention of cleaning up the press.

I shall support amendment (g), which was probably tabled because of the hoo-hah in recent days. The Tories swept into power in 1983 and brought in many young men who had never expected to be Members—executives, directors and those involved in public relations and advertising. They are not giving up their jobs, because they fear going out at the next sweep. They are not registering their remuneration. Their constituents would like to know, because it proves that they have no faith in staying here.

I warn my right hon. Friend the Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams) that there is a Biffen trap here in relation to trade union-sponsored MPs. The Committee may be given terms of reference to look at that issue—for example, how much a trade union pays a sponsored MP or his constituency party; whether the trade union employs his secretary and research assistant; how much of his general election expenses it pays; and how much it gives for weekend schools and conferences? Do the trade unions want all that revealed? On the basis of remuneration revealed — substantial sums may be involved — the Conservatives will have not a 140 majority on trade union legislation; they might have a 240 majority because we should be barring some of our own trade union colleagues from voting. We should beware of that.

Lobby and Gallery journalists have facilities made available to them on the strict understanding that they are used solely for the dissemination of news to the general public through their newspapers, news agencies, radio and news magazines. It is an abuse of Gallery and lobby membership for a member to pass on material gained through being a member, using his parliamentary press card, to interests outside journalism; in other words, to other outside interests.

This House is used by some journalists—we do not know how widespread is the practice—as a base for feeding information to non-news outlets, to commercial and industrial organisations, and it can be a very lucrative business. What do the Lobby and Gallery do about it? Nothing at all. It is a big cover-up, a closed shop. They know it exists, and they probably know the culprits. They can besmirch a Member of Parliament and this House, but do not want it known that they have black sheep in their family.

I urge the House to read the evidence given by Mr. Russell, the Deliverer of the Vote, beginning at page 74 of the report. Answering questions, he said:

"We have a number of the press and Lobby correspondents, whom again we can identify, as using the resources of the Vote Office for their own sidelines in public relations. Those two categories are quite easily identifiable. . . . I am talking about professional parliamentary services given to groups".

When asked about research assistants, he said, revealing something similar:

"The same thing does arise in cases of members of the press, yes. There are several organisations, one particular one which we regard as extremely suspect in regard to its activities within the House because we do not believe that they do in fact perform the correct duties of Lobby correspondents—they are acting as an agency and obtaining an enormous amount of documents from us . . . In March of this year one particular press organisation, which has seven accredited members to it, took a total of £850 worth of documents other than Votes and Proceedings from the Vote Office—in the month of March."

What a racket. He had to chase them week after week to force them to pay that back, because he recognised that he had to be able to defend himself should he have to appear before the Committee. There is no doubt about what is going on, and if Mr. Russell knows, the journalists know, too.

That is why our Committee wants a register for the Lobby and Gallery. They have privileged access for commercial gain. There is no telling who outside is benefiting. They could be feeding embassies and other not so friendly organisations, disseminating special material, sometimes well ahead of the time when it would normally be available to them. Some organisation will pay handsomely for that. That is why we would like to see them registered, just like Members, and that is all.

The research assistants and secretaries agree, especially the latter. At page 79 of the report hon. Members will see that Mrs. J. Griffin-Smith, on their behalf, stated:

"Yes, of course we will comply; it is less than you are asking Members of Parliament to do."

We simply ask for a register on which to declare any other remunerated occupation, yet the Leader of the House will not accept that. I should have thought that the House would regard that recommendation of ours as a prerequisite to Members being called on to declare what remuneration they receive, because those in the Gallery and Lobby who besmirch Members on that score are as guilty themselves. Their purpose in recent weeks has been to attack hon. Members, taking the spotlight away from themselves and diverting the investigative Committee reporting of their lucrative undercover operations.

What will the Leader of the House and the Serjeant at Arms do about it? We have revealed what is happening and the evidence is there—and that was part of our terms of reference. If no notice is taken of our report, the Committee might as well pack up and the Members' Register be abolished, too. We ask of others only what we are obliged to do.

"providing political advice and intelligence for reward"—

8.46 pm

Sir Peter Tapsell (East Lindsey): In one of the newspaper articles by which he mainly supported his family during the 1930s, Winston Churchill wrote that historians tended to overlook the not unimportant fact that politicians and their families had to eat, like everyone else.

As we know, some of our greatest statesmen have been beset by financial difficulties. Benjamin Disraeli solved his problems by marrying a rich widow many years older than himself, and Pitt the younger by not marrying at all and dying in his forties. Such drastic solutions are unlikely to commend themselves to every hon. Member, and after careful consideration I rejected both of them myself.

Many of us at some stage in our parliamentary careers have had to worry about our bread and butter, if only to guard against the possibility, as my hon. Friend the Member for Wealden (Sir G. Johnson Smith) pointed out, of losing our seats—a fate that overtook both of us at about the same time.

There are, broadly, only three categories of hon. Member for whom the financial problem does not arise. They are those with inherited wealth or rich wives; the brilliant or lucky who quickly attain ministerial office of such a prestigious nature that it guarantees them subsequent commercial employment for life; and those who are so dedicated and ascetic that they are happily prepared to accept considerable material sacrifice for themselves and their families for the honour of serving their country and constituents here.

One of our strengths in this House is that we are a broad church. There will always be many hon. Members who do not fall into any one of those three categories but who have a real contribution to make to our discussions.

The hon. Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist) stated his position with his usual clarity and force, and let us be under no illusion that a great many people outside the House whose general political views might be less radical than his nevertheless sincerely hold the view that hon. Members should not have any sources of earned income other than their parliamentary salaries.

Indeed, that is the general view held throughout the United States. When I go there, as I did last week, people expressed astonishment on hearing that I had a modest commercial career as well as being a Member of Parliament. It is something to which those of us believe that it is important that we should retain the tradition of outside interests should apply our minds. We cannot allow the argument to go by default. It is to that rather broader aspect of the problem that I wish to address my remarks. My hon. Friend the Member for Wealden has already dealt extremely authoritatively with the technical aspects of the report of the Committee that he chaired.

If we followed the policy of not allowing Members to have outside earned incomes, it would eventually produce a membership of the House which would be unrepresentative of the country. Above all, this is supposed to be and always has been a representative assembly.

Mr. Nellist: Given that there are 5 million people without jobs, 8·5 million people in work who are below the poverty line and 13 million people dependent upon some form of supplementary benefit to eke out an existence, does not the hon. Gentleman think that the House is already a little unrepresentative when one in seven Tory Members of Parliament has at least £100,000 cash to enable them to walk through the doors of Lloyd's, and start up as a name in a gambling syndicate?

Sir Peter Tapsell: I have from time to time expressed my views on how we could deal with the unemployment problem. I have applied my mind to how one can acquire the money to become a country member of Lloyd's, although I am not such a member.

If we abolished outside interests as we at present understand them, one of the rather bizarre results that the hon. Member for Coventry, South-East should recognise is that we would, as in the United States, become heavily overweighted in this House by the rich. That is what has happened in the United States.

When I was in Cleveland, Ohio, last week I was talking to the campaign manager of Senator Gary Hart, who told me that Senator Hart was one of the few top politicians in the United States who was not a rich man. It was a big problem for him. It is now virtually impossible to have a major political career in the United States unless one is rich. That is one of the results of abolishing outside interests there.

We would not just have a House of Commons which was over-weighted by the rich; there would come to be an unduly high proportion of cranks and crooks in the House. The sad fact is, as experience in many other countries has clearly shown, that the full-time professional politician with little money of his own is peculiarly susceptible to corruption and a target for the potential corrupter. Those who advocate the banning of honest, declared——

Mr. Douglas Hogg: My hon. Friend has the reputation of being one of the more independent Members of the House. Does he agree that the possession of an external interest enhances the independence of Back Benchers? If we prohibit them, Back Benchers will be even more dependent than they currently are on the favour of the Whips' Office; that is in no one's interest.

Sir Peter Tapsell: It has occurred to me occasionally, as I have become less poor in recent years than I was when I first entered the House, that I should not, perhaps, have been able to maintain my customary high morale for 26 years on the Back Benches if I had had nothing else to do except to look at the denizens of the Treasury Bench, intriguing though so many of them sometimes are.

Those who advocate the banning of honest, declared outside business interests on the premise that it is the only sure way to maintain impeccable standards of behaviour among Members of Parliament have a mistaken grasp of human psychology. Honesty springs from the man and not from his method of remuneration.

There is another important consideration. The House will be aware of the definition of an economist as someone who knows 70 different ways of making love but has never met a woman. I cannot believe that it would be in the national interest to have a House of Commons consisting entirely of Members who knew 70 different ways of raising taxes and 70 different ways of spending other people's money but who had never made or lost any money for themselves.

There is already some danger that we are moving in that direction. When I first entered the House there were quite a few Members on both sides who had done or were doing something fairly worthwhile outside the House. There were captains of industry, trade union leaders and distinguished barristers. There were those who had held high rank in the armed services—Jacky Smyth had won a Victoria Cross — or held high rank in the colonial service.

[Sir Peter Tapsell]

In the Labour party, there was a large and greatly respected group of men who had spent many years at the pit face before coming to the House to represent mining constituencies. On the Tory side, there were the knights of the shires, the genuine article which is almost extinct in the House today. The miners and the knights usually paired with one another, drank together and shared a mutual scepticism of their Front Benches, which they never expected to join. They did not much interest themselves in arcane matters such as proper management of the economy. They provided a ballast and set a tone which is not always evident today. Above all, they were honest. They did not need to be told the difference between right and wrong by young men drawing on the full weight of their experience at polytechnics and advertising agencies.

Of course, this place needs and always has had plenty of full-time politicians. It would not work without them. They perform an invaluable service to the country. They must be catered for by proper salaries and allowances and, I would argue, by much better pension arrangements for them and their widows. But to limit membership of the House entirely to full-time professionals would be to lower its quality, to reduce the variety of its knowledge and to weaken its collective wisdom.

I should, perhaps, interpose here, in view of the intervention of the hon. Member for Coventry, South-East, that I do not think that I have an interest to declare tonight, because I am at least as well equipped to abandon all my outside commercial interests as the next man. I forbear to do so only out of pity for my party Whips.

No one is more repelled by financial dishonesty or by the shady and underhand conduct of affairs than I am. I detest and despise those of that ilk in the House and the City, and always have. I remember my Presbyterian grandfather, in whose home I grew up, saying when I was not more than five years old, "Never be funny about money." That simple phrase has stuck in my mind ever since, and I have always acted on it.

In any group of men, and perhaps even women, although it is more unusual among women, there will always be a few rotten apples in the barrel, but that is no reason to stop eating apples. There must be full and open disclosure of outside commercial interests. How they can best be declared and if necessary controlled is a matter for discussion, but declared they must be. That has long been the rule and the practice. I much prefer the traditional verbal convention to the written register, but if the register is here to stay, it must be made compulsory. Certainly, the Select Committee of Privileges should proceed sternly against any hon. Member who is found deliberately to have concealed a relevant outside interest. Yet it would be a black day for the House and the country if no hon. Member had any outside interest to declare.

9 pm

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): The irony of the debate is that, while we are demanding an end to self-regulation in the City because of a deterioration in standards, some hon. Members are arguing that self-regulation is sufficient in the House, where there has also been a deterioration in standards. The truth is that some hon. Members have allowed inducements to influence their judgments, and increasingly we are hiding behind the term "honourable Gentlemen" to disguise what is in reality an erosion of the standards expected of us. The public are worried and ask, "What will Parliament do about it?"

My hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Mason) argued adequately and with great subtlety for the Select Committee's recommendations, particularly in respect of journalists, research assistants, and all-party groups. I wish not to rehearse those matters, but to deal with the terms of my narrow amendment, which to some extent goes to the heart of the problem. The problem is that we are simply not enforcing the register. It is not only that one hon. Member has failed to declare his interest, as the hon. Member for Wealden (Sir G. Johnson Smith), the Chairman of the Committee, said. During the past one and a half years there have been many occasions when hon. Members, including some of my hon. Friends, have refused to sign the register and declare an interest. The reason is simple. Unless the register is enforced for those who deliberately set out to avoid it, they will not comply with it. I refer specifically to Mr. Enoch Powell.

When hon. Members are asked about the credibility and integrity of the register, they always refer to the position of Mr. Enoch Powell. The House has been unwilling to find the right hon. Gentleman in contempt of our House. In a speech in a debate on Members' interests, Mr. Powell made his position clear. Referring to the rule of the House, which the House was about to decide on, he said that it "is ineffective and degrading . . . unlawful and unconstitutional."

I shall deal with the arguments that he deployed. Mr. Powell commenced his speech with a cautionary note expressing the view that the issue — the excesses of some hon. Members—was being generated only by the press. He argued that the rule would be ineffective, and said:

"A sufficient number of hon. Members know very well quite enough about the background of their colleagues . . . This is a place where, whatever we may individually think, we walk about as naked and visible as if we were under some kind of imaginary X-rays.

So the idea that the register will disclose astonishing facts about Members of this House of which the rest of us have been ignorant and which, either dishonourably or in a fit of amnesia, those hon. Members have not happened to mention, is really an absurdity."

I would say that his view was an absurdity, because the register has provided an abundance of information. It has done the reverse of what Mr. Powell was suggesting.

Mr. Powell then said that it was degrading to have a rule whereby Members are required to register. He said:

"we degrade ourselves by implying that our honour and our traditions are not adequate to maintain proper standards in this House."

That is equally absurd. Definitions of the code of honour are highly subjective. It might be said that when the right hon. Gentleman, accused the Prime Minister of being treacherous as he did the other week, he offended my sense of honour. It might be that my comments about the right hon. Member for Waveney (Mr. Prior) last Friday and his interest in GEC may have offended the code of honour or understanding of honour adopted by the Leader of the House or Conservative Members.

The point is that honour is a highly subjective assessment. What constitutes honour? Our duty is to create some form of benchmark. The code or rule sets the benchmark.

Mr. Powell then argued that the introduction of a rule on registration would be unlawful and unconstitutional. He said:

"it is the representation of the people for which we are seeking to legislate by a resolution of the House. We are saying that no one should seek to be a Member of Parliament, and no one is fit to sit and speak and vote as a Member of Parliament who does not comply with the condition of completing an entry in a register. That is something that the House has no power to do. We have no power to alter the law of the land by a resolution of the House." — [Official Report, 12 June 1975; Vol. 893, c. 742-45.]

That has given birth to all the arguments about the need to legislate for the register if it is to be fully enforced.

I am not saying that no one should seek to be a Member of Parliament unless he has complied with the register. People are free to stand and be elected under my amendment. The hon. Member for Belfast, West (Mr. Adams) is a Member of Parliament, although he has not taken the oath. He has stood, has been duly elected and is known as a Member of Parliament. He is able to carry out his functions as a Member if he so wishes, to some extent. All that we are saying under the rules of the House is that, if he wishes to participate in the Chamber, past the Bar, he must apply our rules and before taking the oath comply with the register. That is what my amendment would seek to do.

Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark (Birmingham, Selly Oak) rose——

Mr. Douglas Hogg rose——

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I am sorry, but my hon. Friends would like to speak, and I wish to finish my speech.

According to "Erskine May", 20th edition, page 283, a Member who has not taken the oath is nevertheless "entitled to all the other privileges of a Member, (but not his salary)."

Therefore, he can receive his mail, correspond with Ministers, enjoy the services of the House, be provided with accommodation, use our cafeterias and bars. He can even come into the Chamber as long as he does not pass the Bar, the white line. Indeed, he can attend meetings of our Committees and speak, although he has not taken the oath. We are not preventing, by way of a rule, a Member being a Member of Parliament. We are simply preventing him from participating in the Chamber.

There is a precedent for this. On the same page of "Erskine May" there are these precedents for hon. Members who formerly did what I have referred to. It says:

"On 13 April 1715 it was resolved 'that Sir Joseph Jekyll was capable of being chosen of a committee of secrecy, though he had not been sworn at the Clerk's table.' On 11 May 1858, acting upon this precedent, the House added Baron Rothschild, who had then continued a Member for eleven years without having taken the oaths, to the committee appointed to draw up reasons to be offered to the Lords for disagreeing to the Lords' amendments to the Oaths Bill, at a conference of which he was appointed one of the managers. On 11 May 1880 Mr. Bright was appointed a member of the Parliamentary Oath Committee upon which he served and voted, before he had made his affirmation."

There is adequate precedent for hon. Members to come to the House and participate fully in all aspects of our activities. They are precluded only from engaging in debate in this Chamber. All that we are doing is denying access to a particular location.

There is even a precedent for this. There is a precedent for exclusion areas within the precincts of the Palace of Westminster. There is a precedent for conditionality to the performance of a parliamentary function. That is in the case of an opposed private Bill Committee where a declaration by the Member that he has no personal pecuniary interest must be made prior to the Member serving on that Committee. There are, therefore, other areas of this House that are forbidden those who fail to submit to the rules of the House.

I am simply maintaining tonight that that is the precedent. To talk of legislation is to mislead the House. In the event of my amendment being carried at the end of this debate, we shall have added another rule. We shall have prevented nobody from being elected to this House. Such a person will enjoy all of our facilities, apart from one. He will not be allowed into the Chamber unless, prior to taking the oath, he has signed the register and declared his interests.

9.12 pm

Sir Ian Gilmour (Chesham and Amersham): The House has just listened to an interesting and extremely tortuous argument by the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours). I cannot help thinking that he plays into the hands of the former right hon. Member for South Down, Mr. Powell. He is proposing a form of disqualification that this House cannot impose. If it is important that there should be an enforceable register of Members' interests, why on earth does not the House legislate to overcome the difficulties that were put forward by Mr. Powell? If it is so important, there would be no real difficulty because, as far as I know, there is only one hon. Member who would oppose the legislation. The Government could therefore legislate, which would avoid the tortuousness of the argument of the hon. Member for Workington.

I very much approve of the Select Committee's approach and that of my right hon. Friend the Member for Shropshire, North (Mr. Biffen), but there is one point about which I venture to disagree. The suggestion that there should be a register of professional lobbyists has been dismissed. The Committee had some doubts about dismissing it, but I think that my right hon. Friend had fewer doubts about doing so. I do not believe that the definition problem is very important because those who know who are professional lobbyists are the professional lobbyists themselves. If a professional lobbyist is found to be lobbying professionally but has not registered, he will be in an even worse position than hon. Members who get into certain difficulties and he will be exposed. In any case, it is not too difficult to define a professional lobbyist, so I hope that the Committee will look again at this matter. It is a little artificial to refer to giving privileges to people. If control is ever to be exercised, there must be a register. If it is right that there should be a register for hon. Members, there should also be a register for professional lobbyists. Therefore, I hope that my right hon. Friend and the Committee will look again at this matter.

I do not go quite so far as my hon. Friend the Member for East Lindsey (Sir P. Tapsell), but I should like to deal briefly with two of the fallacies about interests and people's worries about those interests. A number of people seem to think that if an hon. Member has an interest, that interest disturbs the general judicial judgment which all hon. Members bring to bear on all matters. If one does not have an interest, people tend to think that we consider the matter and immerse ourselves in the subject and become very well informed and so produce our judicial judgment unswayed by anything.

[Sir Ian Gilmour]

All hon. Members know that we do not do that and there has not been a debate in that sense in the House this century. An interest is not a piece of mud thrown into an otherwise clear, limpid pool; it is a piece of mud thrown into a lot of other mud.

Hon. Members have many different interests. Hon. Members on both sides of the House are very intent on pleasing the Patronage Secretary. That is a reasonable thing to do as he is a very good man and a very good man to please. But such an interest is likely to sway an hon. Member's judgment, as with a number of other matters. For example, other hon. Members may be swayed by a desire for publicity.

It is a fallacy to say that if an hon. Member has a pecuniary interest in a matter his judgment will be far worse than that of another hon. Member. If there were such people—and there may be one or two in the House—it is not my view that they would be better than an hon. Member who has no interest at all, as such a Member may well be a crank or a fanatic. I would prefer hon. Members to have interests rather than to be cranks or fanatics.

There are some hon. Members who are completely dominated by ideology, and I am not being unfair if I cite the example of the hon. Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist). I believe that most hon. Members would agree that the hon. Gentleman is a useful Member of the House. However, most hon. Members would agree that if the House were composed entirely of hon. Members like the hon. Gentleman there would be too many of his kind.

Mr. Nellist: Unlike the Tory Members who are too busy with directorships and consultancies to play a full role in the House, I bring the experience of spending two years six months out of three years on the dole before I came to the House. The House would be a lot better if there were far fewer business men, consultants, bankers and members of Lloyd's and more people who have had direct experience of the Tory Government's mass unemployment policies and who have lived in some of the housing in which the Government have condemned people to live.

Sir Ian Gilmour: I agree that the experience of the hon. Member on the dole is highly relevant. That is not something one would choose to have experience of, but I respect that experience. The hon. Gentleman will agree that the Labour party has enough difficulty choosing its own members without him trying to choose members for the Conservative party.

The majority of the Labour party has always been very sound on the interests point. That is why they have the block vote. As Sidney Webb said, they needed many trade union people with interests to control the madmen in the constituency Labour parties. It has been a tradition of the Labour party to understand the value of interest.

A great deal of nonsense has been written in the press about the Channel tunnel. Nobody thinks that the Channel tunnel question will be decided by the House. It will be decided by the two Governments involved and all hon. Members will dutifully vote for it and a little lobbying here or there will make no difference to the outcome. The question of the Channel tunnel has been greatly exaggerated.

It is important that there should be disclosure and I have made one or two suggestions to increase that disclosure, but the press should calm down, and hon. Members should also remain calm.

9.19 pm

Mr. Paddy Ashdown (Yeovil): It was a great pleasure to listen to the elegant speech of the right hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham (Sir I. Gilmour). I part company with him on his central point—the question of interest—because although his points were fairly made, we are here talking about pecuniary interest.

This was the first Select Committee on which I have served, and it was a pleasure to do so under the chairmanship of the hon. Member for Wealden (Sir G. Johnson Smith). The report now before us touches on a narrower aspect than the debate in which we are now engaged. It touches on the specific aspect of lobbying, and it has come up with a sensible set of recommendations that were fairly outlined by the hon. Member for Wealden.

The report is a sensible and commendable first step in dealing with a developing problem. Many will say that it does not go far enough, and many would wish to have seen temporary as well as permanent research assistants brought within the register proposed by the Select Committee. Many others might feel that the amount that Members of Parliament receive for their lobbying activities should be listed. But hon. Members who have sat on Select Committees will know that these matters require delicate balance in order to receive the support of the whole Committee.

Some may say that the report does not go far enough, whereas others may feel that it goes too far. But, as the right hon. Member for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Mason) effectively said, many members of the press believe that it goes too far in its recommendations relating to them, judging by the intemperate and wholly inaccurate comments that have been made. This report should be seen as a first step to be built on later, no doubt in the light of the comments made in this debate.

I totally support the view that the declaration of financial interests should be made obligatory. That declaration is in danger of being reduced to the level of a farce if it is not made obligatory by some means or other. I listened with care to the interesting, though slightly Byzantine, speech of the hon. Member for Workington, (Mr. Campbell-Savours) and although I would have preferred the amendment in the name of my right hon. Friend the Member Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen)—[HON. MEMBERS: "Where is he?"] That amendment has not been selected, and having listened to the interesting arguments of the hon. Member for Workington, I think that his proposal is better. I am glad that it has been selected, and I shall support it.

Another amendment in the name of my right hon. and hon. Friends requires that we should declare all sources over and above parliamentary salaries, including the amounts received. The Select Committee considered whether that would infringe the privacy of Members of Parliament or their clients, but in my view when a person joins this House he is involved in the business of public affairs and must therefore relinquish some of that privacy. It is right and proper that such a person and others with whom he is in contact should be prepared to forgo some of the privacy so that the affairs with which we are dealing can be seen to be more open.

Privacy often leads to secrecy, and secrecy is the blanket behind which corruption can take place. I do not say that it does. I therefore believe that there is a need to declare all sources over and above parliamentary salaries. Personally, I would go even further. There is only one loyalty that Members of this House have, and that loyalty is derived from the vote cast in the ballot box. It is that which makes their loyalty signally and exclusively to the British people.

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): The British School of Motoring.

Mr. Ashdown: In the interests of brevity——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Mr. Ashdown.

Mr. Ashdown: I will have to answer that challenge. We hear some curious sophistries from the Labour party about how union funds which are passed not into its hands —not into individual hands or members' hands—but to constituencies in no way need declaration and that they do not intend to corrupt a Member of Parliament's judgment and need not be declared. What a curious piece of sophistry. The British School of Motoring fund was a contribution not to a Member — [Interruption] — of Parliament or to his constituency but to a party.

Mr. Speaker: Order. There is so much noise from below the Gangway that I cannot hear myself.

Mr. Ashdown: I merely draw attention to the fact that, when the amendment upon which this farrago was based — relating to driving instruction — came before the House of Lords it received Liberal and SDP support and Labour party support. This is a matter upon which, I am delighted to note, Labour Weekly recently commented — perhaps more honestly than Labour Members of Parliament. Labour Weekly said:

"We apologise unreservedly to BSM and its Chairman . . . and we are happy to take this opportunity to put the record straight."

It is a great pity that Labour Weekly seems to have more honesty in this matter than many Labour Members of Parliament.

If I may now return to the substance——

Mr. Terry Lewis rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman said that he would mention that slightly contentious matter. Could he now be heard in silence?

Mr. Ashdown: I hope that hon. Members will forgive me if I try to make some progress.

I believe that there is one primary loyalty, which is exercised exclusively and which derives from the ballot box. Any other source of paid employment must create conditions which—I do not say "necessarily result"—encourage, if not corruption certainly dilution of that primary loyalty. This is an opposite view to that taken by the right hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham but it is an honestly held individual view.

The hon. Member for East Lindsey (Sir P. Tapsell), who is not now in his place, talked about the need to pay Members of Parliament effectively and sufficiently if they are to answer only to that primary loyalty. In my view, it is not a question of Members' salaries, which are in themselves adequate, but allowances for secretarial and research assistants, which are not.

Mr. Allan Rogers (Rhondda): What about pension?

Mr. Ashdown: I have one salary which I receive as a Member of Parliament and I have neither pension nor any other outside remuneration. Furthermore, I wish to make it clear that I have to spend more than £6,000 of my parliamentary salary for my research assistants and the resources that I need to do my job effectively. We need —[Interruption.]

Sir Kenneth Lewis rose——

Mr. Ashdown: I can see the time. I have a point to make and I intend to make it. I see the hon. Member for Staffordshire, South (Mr. Cormack) looking at his watch. Just at the moment, I am on my feet and I intend to stay on my feet and make those points even if I have the whole House baying at me. The result is that other hon. Members who have something to say will not be able to do so. I suggest that they might learn to sit back and listen. That might be an appropriate way for them to behave in the House. They dishonour the House by such behaviour as this. I shall continue so long as I get a decent hearing.

Paying Members of Parliament at the present level is appropriate for their needs, but we also need adequate resources to pay for the staff that we need to help us do our job effectively, and we do not have sufficient resources for that at the moment. In this regard, we have something to learn from the United States. I understand that representatives of the people there are not entitled to any other outside payment.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: They are paid enough.

Mr. Ashdown: Precisely. They must be paid adequately for that to happen. It is true that the United States system is corrupted by the process of campaign funds. Just as they look to our system of campaign funds and wish that they had a similar one to prevent corruption, we might look to their system of paying representatives adequately so that, in service, they cannot be corrupted.

It has been made quite clear that I am in a minority. I fully recognise that, but I take strength from the belief that what I have advanced will prove to be the prevailing view. I understand that it was Ibsen who said that in a democracy, the minority is always right. I think that my party sometimes takes comfort from that.

The amendment is a first step. It does not end up where I should like it to but I hope that it will be accepted. The Government have lectured the country about values but the Government's values have elevated private greed to a public virtue. We have seen how those values have infected the City of London with corruption and how it has spread like a cancer into Lloyd's. Those great institutions are in danger of descending into a cesspit of sharp practice and corrupt dealing. It would be all too easy for those values, created by the atmosphere that the Government have fostered, to spread into this House. Many people outside, having seen such dramatic programmes as that which was recently shown on "Newsnight," I believe that that is in imminent danger of happening. I believe that such fears are groundless and that the House and the

[Mr. Ashdown]

Members of it are still worthy of the title "honourable." It is up to us, however, to come to terms and to be seen to come to terms with the threat that is now posed.

The Select Committee report is a useful start in a limited area. I commend it, not as a solution but as a first step in a continuing process to put our own house in order and to ensure that our integrity and our right to represent the people of Britain is protected and unsullied.

9.33 pm

Mr. Robert Adley (Christchurch): The hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) will forgive me if I do not follow his tortured deliberations. I agree with him in one respect. My hon. Friend the Member for Wealden (Sir G. Johnson Smith) chaired the Committee extremely agreeably and satisfactorily and all of us who served on it thank him.

I strongly agree with the right hon. Member for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Mason) that the Select Committee's conclusions undoubtedly upset the press, which has tried to ridicule our proposals and divert attention from the contents of our report. It is clear from this evening's proceedings that the press has no shortage of willing helpers.

I shall deal with three false assumptions which I believe overlie most of the public discussion on hon. Members' interests and connected matters. The assumption of several Opposition Members that money affects the behaviour of hon. Members more than any other factor is rubbish. One Opposition Member has been persistent, and properly so, in his representations to the Committee about declarations of interests, but he is not present this evening because he is facing a reselection process in his constituency. No one could pretend that the pressures that he faces from those who control his destiny bear any resemblance to the pressure brought about by moneys that hon. Members earn through activities outside the House. No one could suggest that outside earnings exert more influence over the behaviour of hon. Members than constituency Labour parties.

Many of us understand what some hon. Members sponsored by the National Union of Mineworkers went through during the miners' strike because they were unable to state publicly the views they held privately about Arthur Scargill. That pressure has not been mentioned tonight, but it is more insidious than sums of money.

The second assumption is that hon. Members have outside interests only to pursue parliamentary campaigns. That is rubbish. Many hon. Members, whether they are business men, professional people or whatever their occupation, have given years of their lives acquiring experience which is not only of value to those they serve but which enriches the advice that they lend to the House.

For many years, since before I came to the House, I have been involved with a hotel group. A few years ago I was offered a senior position in that company on condition that I left the service of the House. I declined. It is nonsense to perpetuate the assumption that Members of Parliament pursue outside interests only to influence other hon. Members and Ministers.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Chesham and Amersham (Sir I. Gilmour) has already touched on the third assumption. During the current discussion on the Channel fixed link, it was seen that Ministers on occasions have to deal with decisions that could benefit commercial companies. Those occasions are extremely rare. The reality is that many lobby organisations take money from their clients under false pretences. They pretend to their clients that by hiring the services of a parliamentary consultancy the companies will gain the inside track and the ear of hon. Members and Ministers to influence decisions. Generally, that is absolute nonsense. It suits those organisations to exaggerate the influence of Back Benchers. We should have nothing to do with that.

We should examine further some of the proposals that have been put forward tonight. I utterly reject the proposition that hon. Members should not have outside interests, for many of the reasons already put forward by my right hon. Friend the Member for East Linsey (Sir P. Tapsell). If no outside interest were allowed, many with real ability might refuse to stand for Parliament and that could not be good for the country.

If changes are to be made, let us not only consider the United States example. Recently a delegation from Hungary visited Britain. None of its Members of Parliament is paid and all have outside occupations. Perhaps we should consider receiving no pay, but continuing with our outside occupations to bring the experience of trade union leaders or business men to bear. However, that would probably be unacceptable.

Perhaps a slightly odd suggestion would be that Members' pay should be related to what they were earning before coming to the House and not to a fixed sum. At least that would separate the sheep from the goats. The other alternative to outside interests is to pay Members a going rate on the basis of other legislatures. I do not want to share the United States experience, which would mean that one would have to be rich to become a Member. That would be wrong. On the whole, we have an open and honest society. Let us examine some of the propositions that have been made this evening, but let us not get carried away on a wave of hysteria which bears no relation to reality.

9.40 pm

Mr. Merlyn Rees (Morley and Leeds, South) The hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Adley) raised two issues that rang bells in my mind. First, I was reselected last Friday by a party which accepts disagreement with me and believes that that is part of political life. The hon. Gentleman mentioned Members of Parliament in Hungary. I am advised that they meet six days a year. I agree very much with the amendment of my hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours). If we vote in favour of it this evening, the 15 Ulster Unionist Members, when they return in the new year, and among them Mr. Enoch Powell, will be hoist by the words of my hon. Friend's amendment.

As for the hon. Member for East Lindsey (Sir P. Tapsell), I observe that it is not only eminent statesmen who are short of money. I have known Members of this place with private incomes who have been cranks and sometimes barmy. It is not only those with another income who are independent of political forces. It is not only country gentlemen who can look sceptically at their Front Bench.

The hon. Member for Christchurch raised an issue briefly and then dismissed it, but I am concerned about the Channel tunnel, especially during the next five or six months when it is discussed in this place. It is an issue that will not be covered by the register. If all those concerned registered their interest in the firms involved in the project, my concern would not be removed. The motion emphasises that it is:

"the personal responsibility of each Member to have regard to his public position and the good name of Parliament in any work that he undertakes or any interest he acquires".

If I have learnt anything in this place, it is that many so-called parliamentary consultants and lobbyists obtain money for doing precious little. There are so many in industry who believe that they are receiving a service of importance, and one that, in fact, cannot be delivered. However, that is their fault. It is a measure of the lack of knowledge of the way in which Government works that they are prepared to pay so-called consultants and lobbyists.

Last week, the Secretary of State for Transport said that it had not been decided whether there would be a fixed link nor which of the four schemes was preferable. He mentioned the four valid proposals and said that they would be assessed by the Anglo-French group. He told us that after the President of France and the Prime Minister had made a decision, a White Paper would be produced. He explained that the hybrid Bill procedure would be adopted and that then the House would decide.

Only rarely in Government, as an Army Minister or an Air Force Minister, did I ever decide anything about the provision of equipment for the armed forces. As Home Secretary, I certainly did not decide who was to build a prison. That was certainly not the position in Northern Ireland, because there one decides who will not build a prison.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: The House will not have the chance of deciding between one project and another. The choice will be merely yes or no on the only choice before us. That is rather different.

Mr. Rees: I understand that, but the House will decide and that is why we stupidly get Christmas cards from Channel tunnel promoters. I believe that two companies have done that. If I was making the decision, those are the two companies that would not get the contract because the people running them must be daft if they think that that will influence anybody in the House. That important issue will influence the south of England and ports in other parts of the country, and we shall play a part in the decision.

I believe that no Member of Parliament should receive any payment for acting as a consultant lobbyist for any one of the four Channel tunnel schemes. It was said this evening that under the private Bill procedure one must sign a statement to the effect that there is no pecuniary advantage. There is an element of private Bill procedure in the hybrid arrangements for discussing the Bill. If that is good enough for the private Bill procedure, and the private Bill procedure is embedded in the hybrid procedure, the same thing should apply. It would be wrong for any hon. Member to receive anything for being involved in lobbying for something on which we are to take a decision.

In addition to that, at the end of the day it is the Government's job to provide information about the four schemes. It should not come from lobbyists. If I want to interest myself in the four schemes, I do not wish to go to a lobbyist to find out about them. If I were a Minister I would obtain information from officials on which to decide about the four schemes. There would be procedures in the cinema downstairs and one would spell out the advantages and have people in to discuss the scheme. I have raised the issue, albeit briefly, because in the past week or 10 days, having read through all the Select Committee's reports, it has struck me that a register by itself will not do. The register simply asks hon. Members to list those things in which they have an interest.

Before the register there must have been occasions in private Bill procedures when hon. Members had an interest—for example when the railways and the canals were built in the 18th century.

The House and the Government must do something because too many people are asking whether I saw the "Newsnight" programme the other day, showing the way in which people are obtaining money on an issue for which the House is directly responsible. That is not the sort of thing that the hon. Member for Christchurch mentioned —money for doing nothing—because industrialists and people in commerce do not know what they are doing. That is for real and we should do something about it.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): One of the current problems in the register is that it is filled in at about this time of the year. Some of the issues such as the Channel tunnel can suddenly come up halfway through the year, and they have been debated and decided by the House before the register has been completed.

Mr. Rees: I understand that nowadays the register is filled in monthly—[HON. MEMBERS: "Weekly".] If I am to be involved in anything, I write upstairs to tell them what is happening. I do not think that there is a problem in that respect. Indeed, the film on "Newsnight" showed that one hon. Member, it having been revealed that he was receiving money, then filled in the form.

That one issue is not covered by the register. The House will play a part by contracting in a different way. I accept that. It will be similar to local government. There are rules in local government in that respect and there should be rules about the Channel tunnel. It reflects badly on hon. Members if we do not act in time.

9.49 pm

Mr. Peter Griffiths (Portsmouth, North): The Select Committee was charged with examining, on behalf of the House, whether it would be possible to protect the reputation of the House and its proceedings by developing the way in which the declaration of relevant financial interests has operated since 1974.

One thing that the Select Committee was not prepared to do and was never asked to do was to pander to idle curiosity or reverse snobbery. Its task was to look specifically at the ways in which the reputation of the House could be protected. Two potential routes could have been followed. One would have been to increase the complexity and severity of the requirements that are placed upon Members of Parliament, but it was not chosen, one reason being that the moment that one starts to pry more closely into the affairs of any Member of Parliament, the question arises as to the extent to which one should look at the interests of hon. Members' families. That raises a new series of questions about how far the House is entitled to pry into hon. Members' private affairs.

I have a nil declaration in the Register of Members' Interests. I take no pride in that, and it is no cause for pleasure. However, it is important that the register is as complete as possible, and it should be enforced. The Committee decided that there were other people in the House in a privileged position to obtain information and access to Members of Parliament, and that those people should have drawn regularly to their attention the responsibilities that go with their privileges. That is why the Select Committee made three major recommendations, which are included in amendment (e).

[Mr. Peter Griffiths]

I profoundly disagreed with my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House when he suggested that now is not the time or the tactical moment to introduce those restrictions. If we do not ensure that all those in a privileged position in the House are treated similarly, it will not give us a proper base from which the Committee can move to see whether there are further loopholes or areas in which it is necessary to tighten up the present restrictions.

Therefore, I trust that hon. Members, having entrusted to the Select Committee the task of making recommendations, will now recognise that the Committee has deliberated carefully and has put forward modest but sensible and positive proposals. Right hon. and hon. Members should consider most seriously whether they should reveal that they have a basic confidence in the Committee, and should support the recommendations in the amendment.

9.52 pm

Mr. Biffen: It is no disrespect——

Mr. Nellist: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Is it a point of order or a complaint?

Mr. Nellist: It is a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I realise that in a brief debate you have difficulties in calling hon. Members, but when the House selects 12 or 13 hon. Members to form a Select Committee, draw up a report and bring it back to the House, is it in order that six out of the nine Back-Bench Members who were called were members of that Committee and that those who might wish to criticise the report did not get a chance to speak? Why should we send those hon. Members away to the Committee when they are the only ones called to talk about the report when they come back?

Mr. Speaker: The Chair seeks to achieve a balance in all such matters. I took into account the fact that the hon. Gentleman rose to intervene on numerous occasions. That was one of the reasons why he was not called tonight.

Mr. Biffen: I feel fraternal sympathy towards the hon. Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist) as a member of the endangered species. His departure would be much regretted. By making interventions, he demonstrated that there are more effective ways to speak even than making speeches.

My anxiety is that I have but a few moments to answer the debate. I have deliberately restricted myself to so disciplined a time because I felt that the best service that I could pay would be to give rise to the widest possible debate from the Back Benches and for the Front Benches to be suitably disciplined. Therefore, I want to construct my remarks around the four amendments called for possible Division.

The amendment tabled by the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen)—[HON. MEMBERS: "Where is he?"] A warm toast to absent friends. Were he here he might have convinced me otherwise, but in his absence I have to say that he is inviting the House to make its own judgment about the desirability of the registration of the amounts of financial interest without having the benefit of the study, judgment and reflection of the Select Committee. I advise the House to reject that approach and to take a much more measured policy in those matters.

The amendment in the name of the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) was spoken to with great skill. It was of necessity complex. One hon. Member below the Gangway referred to it as Byzantine. I would not go that far, but it is a complex argument to deal with a novel situation which is suggesting that a resolution of the House might have the effect of preventing a Member from taking his seat until the register had been signed. This is a complex constitutional issue, touching upon the rights of taking one's seat. After all, the oath is taken under the Parliamentary Oaths Act 1866, so this would be prescribing something which did not have constitutional enactment. Therefore, it is only proper that my hon. Friend the Member for Wealden (Sir G. Johnson Smith) has said that he would be prepared for the Select Committee to consider the matter further. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will withdraw his amendment and we could go forward on that basis.

The right hon. Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams) asked about a Member who does not sign the register. The position is set out fairly in the 1974-75 report. It is clear that the House could determine what action it took subsequently, but it is a question of measuring the sanction against that rare quality common sense, and there the matter must and will remain until we resolve otherwise.

I said clearly that I wished to reject the amendment in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for Wealden but I am not a Stalinist in my role as Leader of the House and I found that there was not a single friend for it; thus I had that unique minority situation of Ibsen, so we understand from the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown). Therefore, although I said that my opposition was based purely on timing and tactics, I realise that the mood of the House is for the acceptance of the amendment and I am content that that should be the decision, swayed also as I was by the powerful advocacy of the right hon. Member for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Mason). Doubtless, as hundreds of research assistants file a nil return in the coming months, they will reflect that I am following the Mason line.

Amendment (g) in the name of the right hon. Member for Swansea, West seeks to establish two things—the primacy in the use of the Select Committee as our guide in these matters and the need not to rush precipitately into anything until and unless it has been properly and in measured form considered by that Select Committee. Going on from that principle, he has established three areas where he thinks matters need to be reconsidered. It is not that the reconsideration is in any sense novel. I am sure that he will be the first to agree that these issues have been examined by the Select Committee in the past, but after a passage of 10 years or so it is perfectly legitimate that the House should think that the matter might be further considered. In particular, there has been some public comment, and we are properly sensitive to that.

I say "properly sensitive", because we are not here to pry into each other's codes of conduct, although that is obviously a pleasing and enjoyable part of the Tuesday and Thursday knockabout We are all here as collective guardians of the reputation of the House of Commons, of understanding how it works, of knowing that often the most effective methods of control operate by other than mere mechanical or legalistic fashions. Therefore, we want to test what we understand to be outside interest with our own knowledge of our own selves and our own faith in our own procedures. One way in which we can do that is the proper use of the Select Committee. On that basis, I commend the right hon. Gentleman's amendment and my substantive motion.

Amendment (b) proposed, in line 2, leave out from 'Parliament' to end and add

'but believes that their recommendations will be meaningless unless Right honourable and honourable Members declare all sources of money received over and above their Parliamentary salaries, including the clients of any Parliamentary consultancies held, and the amounts of money received from each source.'.—[Mr. Alton.]

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

The House proceeded to a Division—

Mr. Adley (seated and covered): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. We have had a serious and earnest debate, and my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House has responded magnificently to the mood of the House. We are now being asked to vote on a proposal by right hon. and hon. Members, not one of whom had the courtesy to address the House and only one of whom has been present for only part of the time. I think that the behaviour of the leaders of the SDP and the Liberal party is an abuse of the House and a gross dereliction of good manners.

Mr. Speaker: I selected the amendment, which was properly moved by the hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton).

Mr. Michael Stern (Bristol, North-West): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. With respect, when you selected the amendment you were not to know that the leader of the SDP would show such utter contempt for this House, not only by not bothering to be here to move his amendment, but by not even bothering to appear in the debate at all. Do you have no power to reconsider your selection in order to demonstrate that hon. Members must show more respect both for this House and for your authority?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman must know that it is perfectly in order for an hon. Member whose name stands on the Order Paper in support of an amendment to move that amendment.

The House having divided: Ayes 63, Noes 213.

Division No. 30] [10.00 pm

AYES

Ashdown, Paddy
Atkinson, N. (Tottenham)
Barron, Kevin
Beith, A. J.
Benn, Rt Hon Tony
Bennett, A. (Dent'n & Red'sh)
Bruce, Malcolm
Caborn, Richard
Campbell-Savours, Dale
Clwyd, Mrs Ann
Cook, Robin F. (Livingston)
Corbyn, Jeremy
Cox, Thomas (Tooting)
Davies, Ronald (Caerphilly)
Dixon, Donald
Dubs, Alfred
Eadie, Alex
Eastham, Ken
Evans, John (St. Helens N)
Forman, Nigel
Freeson, Rt Hon Reginald
Freud, Clement
Hamilton, W. W. (Fife Central)
Hancock, Mr. Michael
Hardy, Peter
Home Robertson, John
Howells, Geraint
Hoyle, Douglas
Hughes, Sean (Knowsley S)
Hughes, Simon (Southwark)
Johnston, Sir Russell
Kennedy, Charles
Lewis, Terence (Worsley)
Livsey, Richard
Lloyd, Tony (Stretford)
Madden, Max
Maxton, John
Maynard, Miss Joan
Meadowcroft, Michael
Morris, Rt Hon A. (W'shawe)
Nellist, David
O'Brien, William
O'Neill, Martin
Parry, Robert
Patchett, Terry
Pendry, Tom
Pike, Peter
Powell, Raymond (Ogmore)
Prescott, John
Roberts, Allan (Bootle)
Rooker, J. W.
Ross, Stephen (Isle of Wight)
Short, Ms Clare (Ladywood)
Skinner, Dennis
Smith, Rt Hon J. (M'kl'ds E)
Spearing, Nigel
Strang, Gavin
Straw, Jack
Tinn, James
Wainwright, R.
Wallace, James
Wareing, Robert
Wilson, Gordon

Tellers for the Ayes:
Mr. David Alton and
Mr. John Cartwright

NOES

Adley, Robert
Alison, Rt Hon Michael
Amess, David
Ancram, Michael
Atkins, Robert (South Ribble)
Atkinson, David (B'm'th E)
Baker, Rt Hon K. (Mole Vall'y)
Baker, Nicholas (Dorset N)
Batiste, Spencer
Beaumont-Dark, Anthony
Biffen, Rt Hon John
Boscawen, Hon Robert
Bottomley, Mrs Virginia
Brandon-Bravo, Martin
Bright, Graham
Brittan, Rt Hon Leon
Brooke, Hon Peter
Brown, M. (Brigg & Cl'thpes)
Budgen, Nick
Butcher, John
Carlisle, Rt Hon M. (W'ton S)
Cash, William
Chalker, Mrs Lynda
Chope, Christopher
Clarke, Rt Hon K. (Rushcliffe)
Cockeram, Eric
Cope, John
Cormack, Patrick
Crouch, David
Currie, Mrs Edwina
Durant, Tony
Emery, Sir Peter
Fenner, Mrs Peggy
Fletcher, Alexander
Fookes, Miss Janet
Forsyth, Michael (Stirling)
Forth, Eric
Fowler, Rt Hon Norman
Fox, Marcus
Fraser, Peter (Angus East)
Freeman, Roger
Gale, Roger
Galley, Roy
Gardiner, George (Reigate)
Garel-Jones, Tristan
Gilmour, Rt Hon Sir Ian
Goodlad, Alastair
Gorst, John
Gow, Ian
Gower, Sir Raymond
Gregory, Conal
Griffiths, Peter (Portsm'th N)
Grist, Ian
Ground, Patrick
Hamilton, Hon A. (Epsom)
Hamilton, James (M'well N)
Hamilton, Neil (Tatton)
Hampson, Dr Keith
Hanley, Jeremy
Harris, David
Harvey, Robert
Haselhurst, Alan
Hawkins, Sir Paul (N'folk SW)
Hawksley, Warren
Hayes, J.
Hayhoe, Rt Hon Barney
Haynes, Frank
Hayward, Robert
Heathcoat-Amory, David
Heddle, John
Henderson, Barry
Hickmet, Richard
Hicks, Robert
Higgins, Rt Hon Terence L.
Hind, Kenneth
Hirst, Michael
Hogg, Hon Douglas (Gr'th'm)
Holt, Richard
Howard, Michael
Howarth, Gerald (Cannock)
Howell, Ralph (Norfolk, N)
Hunter, Andrew
Jackson, Robert
Jenkin, Rt Hon Patrick
Jessel, Toby
Johnson Smith, Sir Geoffrey
Jones, Robert (Herts W)
Kellett-Bowman, Mrs Elaine
Kershaw, Sir Anthony
Knight, Greg (Derby N)
Knight, Dame Jill (Edgbaston)
Knowles, Michael
Lamond, James
Lawler, Geoffrey
Lee, John (Pendle)
Lennox-Boyd, Hon Mark
Lester, Jim
Lewis, Sir Kenneth (Stamf'd)
Lightbown, David
Lilley, Peter
Lloyd, Ian (Havant)
Lord, Michael
Luce, Richard
Lyell, Nicholas
McCrindle, Robert
MacGregor, Rt Hon John
MacKay, Andrew (Berkshire)
MacKay, John (Argyll & Bute)
Maclean, David John
McNair-Wilson, M. (N'bury)
McNair-Wilson, P. (New F'st)
McQuarrie, Albert
Madel, David
Major, John
Malone, Gerald
Marlow, Antony
Mates, Michael
Mather, Carol
Maude, Hon Francis
Mayhew, Sir Patrick
Mellor, David
Merchant, Piers
Meyer, Sir Anthony
Miller, Hal (B'grove)
Mills, Iain (Meriden)
Miscampbell, Norman

Mitchell, David (Hants NW)
Morrison, Hon C. (Devizes)
Moynihan, Hon C.
Neale, Gerrard
Neubert, Michael
Newton, Tony
Nicholls, Patrick
Normanton, Tom
Norris, Steven
Onslow, Cranley
Osborn, Sir John
Page, Sir John (Harrow W)
Page, Richard (Herts SW)
Patten, Christopher (Bath)
Patten, J. (Oxf W & Abdgn)
Pattie, Geoffrey
Pollock, Alexander
Porter, Barry
Powell, William (Corby)
Powley, John
Prentice, Rt Hon Reg
Proctor, K. Harvey
Raffan, Keith
Rhodes James, Robert
Rhys Williams, Sir Brandon
Rifkind, Malcolm
Robinson, Mark (N'port W)
Roe, Mrs Marion
Rumbold, Mrs Angela
Sackville, Hon Thomas
Sayeed, Jonathan
Shaw, Giles (Pudsey)
Shaw, Sir Michael (Scarb')
Shelton, William (Streatham)
Shepherd, Colin (Hereford)
Shersby, Michael
Silvester, Fred
Smith, Tim (Beaconsfield)
Soames, Hon Nicholas
Speed, Keith
Spencer, Derek
Spicer, Jim (Dorset W)
Spicer, Michael (S Worcs)
Squire, Robin
Stanbrook, Ivor
Stanley, John
Steen, Anthony
Stern, Michael
Stevens, Lewis (Nuneaton)
Stevens, Martin (Fulham)
Stewart, Andrew (Sherwood)
Stradling Thomas, Sir John
Sumberg, David
Tapsell, Sir Peter
Taylor, John (Solihull)
Terlezki, Stefan
Thomas, Dr R. (Carmarthen)
Thompson, Donald (Calder V)
Thompson, Patrick (N'ich N)
Thorne, Neil (Ilford S)
Thornton, Malcolm
Thurnham, Peter
Townsend, Cyril D. (B'heath)
Tracey, Richard
Trippier, David
Twinn, Dr Ian
Viggers, Peter
Waddington, David
Wakeham, Rt Hon John
Waldegrave, Hon William
Walden, George
Walker, Bill (T'side N)
Ward, John
Wardle, C. (Bexhill)
Warren, Kenneth
Watson, John
Watts, John
Wells, Bowen (Hertford)
Wheeler, John
Whitfield, John
Whitney, Raymond
Wilkinson, John
Winterton, Mrs Ann
Winterton, Nicholas
Wolfson, Mark
Wood, Timothy
Yeo, Tim

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Ian Lang and
Mr. Tim Sainsbury.

Question accordingly negatived.

It being after Ten o'clock, MR. SPEAKER proceeded, pursuant to the order this day, to put the Questions necessary to dispose of the motion relating to Register of Members' Interests.

Amendment (d) proposed, in line 2, after 'Parliament', insert

'orders that in future no Member after his election shall take his seat unless he has first made a declaration to the Registrar;'.
—[Mr. Campbell-Savours.]

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

The House divided: Ayes 128, Noes 174.

Division No. 31] [10.13 pm

AYES

Alton, David
Ashdown, Paddy
Ashley, Rt Hon Jack
Atkinson, N. (Tottenham)
Barron, Kevin
Beaumont-Dark, Anthony
Beith, A. J.
Benn, Rt Hon Tony
Bennett, A. (Dent'n & Red'sh)
Brown, Hugh D. (Provan)
Bruce, Malcolm
Caborn, Richard
Callaghan, Jim (Heyw'd & M)
Campbell-Savours, Dale
Cartwright, John
Clark, Dr David (S Shields)
Cook, Robin F. (Livingston)
Corbyn, Jeremy
Cormack, Patrick
Cox, Thomas (Tooting)
Cunliffe, Lawrence
Dalyell, Tam
Davies, Ronald (Caerphilly)
Dixon, Donald
Dobson, Frank
Dormand, Jack
Dubs, Alfred
Duffy, A. E. P.
Eadie, Alex
Eastham, Ken
Evans, John (St. Helens N)
Flannery, Martin
Forman, Nigel
Forth, Eric
Foster, Derek
Foulkes, George
Freeson, Rt Hon Reginald
Freud, Clement
Gale, Roger
George, Bruce
Godman, Dr Norman
Golding, John
Hamilton, James (M'well N)
Hamilton, W. W. (Fife Central)
Hancock, Mr. Michael
Hardy, Peter
Harris, David
Haselhurst, Alan
Hayes, J.
Haynes, Frank
Hicks, Robert
Hind, Kenneth
Hirst, Michael
Hogg, N. (C'nauld & Kilsyth)
Home Robertson, John
Howells, Geraint
Hoyle, Douglas
Hughes, Sean (Knowsley S)
Hughes, Simon (Southwark)
John, Brynmor
Johnston, Sir Russell
Jones, Robert (Herts W)
Kennedy, Charles
Knowles, Michael
Lawler, Geoffrey
Lewis, Sir Kenneth (Stamf'd)
Lewis, Terence (Worsley)
Livsey, Richard
Lloyd, Tony (Stretford)
Lofthouse, Geoffrey
McDonald, Dr Oonagh
McGuire, Michael
McKay, Allen (Penistone)
MacKay, Andrew (Berkshire)
McWilliam, John
Madden, Max
Mason, Rt Hon Roy
Maxton, John
Maxwell-Hyslop, Robin
Maynard, Miss Joan
Meadowcroft, Michael
Meyer, Sir Anthony
Morris, Rt Hon A. (W'shawe)
Nellist, David
O'Brien, William
Parry, Robert
Patchett, Terry
Pendry, Tom
Pike, Peter
Powell, Raymond (Ogmore)
Prescott, John
Raffan, Keith
Randall, Stuart
Rees, Rt Hon M. (Leeds S)
Rhys Williams, Sir Brandon
Roberts, Allan (Bootle)
Roberts, Ernest (Hackney N)
Robertson, George
Rooker, J. W.
Ross, Stephen (Isle of Wight)
Sheldon, Rt Hon R.
Shersby, Michael
Short, Ms Clare (Ladywood)
Skinner, Dennis
Smith, Tim (Beaconsfield)
Snape, Peter
Speed, Keith
Spencer, Derek
Squire, Robin
Stern, Michael
Stevens, Lewis (Nuneaton)
Stewart, Andrew (Sherwood)
Stott, Roger
Strang, Gavin
Straw, Jack
Thomas, Dr R. (Carmarthen)
Tinn, James
Townsend, Cyril D. (B'heath)
van Straubenzee, Sir W.
Wainwright, R.
Wallace, James
Wardell, Gareth (Gower)
Wareing, Robert
Watts, John
Williams, Rt Hon A.
Wilson, Gordon
Winterton, Mrs Ann
Winterton, Nicholas

Tellers for the Ayes:
Mr. Nigel Spearing and
Mrs. Ann Clwyd.

NOES

Adley, Robert
Alison, Rt Hon Michael
Amess, David
Ancram, Michael
Atkins, Robert (South Ribble)
Atkinson, David (B'm'th E)
Baker, Rt Hon K. (Mole Vall'y)
Baker, Nicholas (Dorset N)
Batiste, Spencer
Biffen, Rt Hon John
Boscawen, Hon Robert
Bottomley, Mrs Virginia
Brandon-Bravo, Martin
Bright, Graham
Brittan, Rt Hon Leon
Brooke, Hon Peter
Brown, M. (Brigg & Cl'thpes)
Budgen, Nick
Butcher, John
Carlisle, Rt Hon M. (W'ton S)
Cash, William
Chalker, Mrs Lynda
Chope, Christopher
Clarke, Rt Hon K. (Rushcliffe)
Cockeram, Eric
Cope, John
Crouch, David
Currie, Mrs Edwina
Durant, Tony
Emery, Sir Peter
Fenner, Mrs Peggy
Fookes, Miss Janet
Forsyth, Michael (Stirling)
Fowler, Rt Hon Norman
Fox, Marcus
Fraser, Peter (Angus East)
Freeman, Roger
Gardiner, George (Reigate)
Garel-Jones, Tristan
Gilmour, Rt Hon Sir Ian
Goodlad, Alastair
Gorst, John
Gow, Ian
Gower, Sir Raymond
Gregory, Conal
Griffiths, Peter (Portsm'th N)
Grist, Ian
Ground, Patrick
Hamilton, Hon A. (Epsom)
Hamilton, Neil (Tatton)
Hampson, Dr Keith
Hanley, Jeremy
Harvey, Robert
Hawkins, C. (High Peak)
Hawkins, Sir Paul (N'folk SW)
Hawksley, Warren

Hayhoe, Rt Hon Barney
Hayward, Robert
Heathcoat-Amory, David
Henderson, Barry
Hickmet, Richard
Hogg, Hon Douglas (Gr'th'm)
Holt, Richard
Howard, Michael
Howarth, Gerald (Cannock)
Howell, Ralph (Norfolk, N)
Hunter, Andrew
Jackson, Robert
Jenkin, Rt Hon Patrick
Jessel, Toby
Johnson Smith, Sir Geoffrey
Kellett-Bowman, Mrs Elaine
Kershaw, Sir Anthony
Knight, Greg (Derby N)
Knight, Dame Jill (Edgbaston)
Lamond, James
Lang, Ian
Lee, John (Pendle)
Lennox-Boyd, Hon Mark
Lester, Jim
Lightbown, David
Lilley, Peter
Lloyd, Ian (Havant)
Lloyd, Peter, (Fareham)
Lord, Michael
Luce, Richard
Lyell, Nicholas
McCrindle, Robert
MacGregor, Rt Hon John
MacKay, John (Argyll & Bute)
Maclean, David John
McNair-Wilson, M. (N'bury)
McQuarrie, Albert
Madel, David
Major, John
Malone, Gerald
Mates, Michael
Mather, Carol
Mayhew, Sir Patrick
Mellor, David
Merchant, Piers
Miller, Hal (B'grove)
Mills, Iain (Meriden)
Miscampbell, Norman
Mitchell, David (Hants NW)
Morrison, Hon C. (Devizes)
Moynihan, Hon C.
Neale, Gerrard
Newton, Tony
Nicholls, Patrick
Normanton, Tom
Norris, Steven
Onslow, Cranley
Osborn, Sir John
Page, Sir John (Harrow W)
Page, Richard (Herts SW)
Patten, Christopher (Bath)
Patten, J. (Oxf W & Abdgn)
Pollock, Alexander
Powley, John
Prentice, Rt Hon Reg
Proctor, K. Harvey
Rhodes James, Robert
Rifkind, Malcolm
Robinson, Mark (N port W)
Roe, Mrs Marion
Rumbold, Mrs Angela
Sackville, Hon Thomas
Sainsbury, Hon Timothy
Sayeed, Jonathan
Shaw, Giles (Pudsey)
Shaw, Sir Michael (Scarb')
Shelton, William (Streatham)
Shepherd, Colin (Hereford)
Silvester, Fred
Soames, Hon Nicholas
Spicer, Jim (Dorset W)
Spicer, Michael (S Worcs)
Stanbrook, Ivor
Stanley, John
Steen, Anthony
Stevens, Martin (Fulham)
Stradling Thomas, Sir John
Sumberg, David
Tapsell, Sir Peter
Taylor, John (Solihull)
Terlezki, Stefan
Thompson, Donald (Calder V)
Thompson, Patrick (N ich N)
Thorne, Neil (Ilford S)
Thornton, Malcolm
Thurnham, Peter
Tracey, Richard
Trippier, David
Twinn, Dr Ian
Viggers, Peter
Waddington, David
Wakeham, Rt Hon John
Waldegrave, Hon William
Walden, George
Walker, Bill (T'side N)
Waller, Gary
Ward, John
Wardle, C. (Bexhill)
Warren, Kenneth
Watson, John
Wells, Bowen (Hertford)
Wheeler, John
Whitfield, John
Whitney, Raymond
Wilkinson, John
Wolfson, Mark
Wood, Timothy
Yeo, Tim

Tellers for the Noes
Mr. Michael Neubert and
Mr. Francis Maude

Question accordingly negatived.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. We have spent the past two hours debating honour and worth, and during the course of the debate, by a sedentary intervention and from the Dispatch Box, my right hon. Friend the Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams) asked the Leader of the House whether there would be a free vote tonight. We were told by two Whips that there was to be a free vote. Tonight, the payroll voted against my amendment. That was not a free vote.

Mr. Speaker: I have no knowledge of such things.

Before calling the hon. Member for Wealden (Sir G. Johnson Smith) to move amendment (e), I draw the attention of the House to the fact that the word "relevant" has been inadvertently omitted before the word "gainful" in paragraphs 2 and 3. I am permitting the amendment to be moved in the corrected form.

Amendment (e) made, at end add

'and further agrees with its recommendations in the interests of greater openness, namely that:

1. those holding permanent passes as lobby journalists, as journalists accredited to the Parliamentary Press Gallery or for parliamentary broadcasting be required to register not only the employment for which they had received their pass, but also any other paid occupation or employment where their privileged access to Parliament is relevant;
2. holders of permanent passes as Members' secretaries or Members' research assistants be required to register any relevant gainful occupation which they may pursue other than that for which the pass is issued; and
3. Commons officers of All Party and Registered Groups be required to register the names of the officers of the Group, the source and extent of any benefits financial or in kind from outside sources which they may enjoy, together with any other relevant gainful occupation of any staff which they may have. Where a public relations agency provides the assistance, the ultimate client should be named; and that copies of these Registers be placed in the Library for the use of Members'. —[Sir G. Johnson Smith.]

Amendment (g) made, at end add

"and asks that the Committee considers further measures to strengthen disclosure provisions including the possibility of identifying interests in Parliamentary Questions, whether the amount of remuneration should be declared as well as the interest, and whether there is the need to consider constraints on voting." —[Mr. Alan Williams.]

Main Question, as amended, put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House takes note of the Report of the Select Committee on Members' Interests in the last Session of Parliament; welcomes the intention of the Committee stated in paragraphs 7 and 9 of the Report to keep under review both Parliamentary lobbying and the appropriate scope of the declaration and registration required of Members who are so engaged; emphasises that it is the personal responsibility of each Member to have regard to his public position and the good name of Parliament in any work he undertakes or any interests he acquires; confirms that the scope of the requirement to register remunerated trades, professions or vocations includes any remunerated activity in the fields of public relations and political and parliamentary advice and consultancy; and in particular agrees with the Select Committee in its statement in paragraph 10 of its Report in regard to the registration and declaring of clients that the services which require such registration and, where appropriate, declaration: "include as well as any action connected with any proceedings in the House or its Committees, the sponsoring of functions in the Palace, making representations to Ministers, Civil Servants and other Members, accompanying delegations to Ministers and the like"; and further agrees with its recommendations in the interests of greater openness, namely that:

1. those holding permanent passes as lobby journalists, as journalists accredited to the Parliamentary Press Gallery or for parliamentary broadcasting be required to register not only the employment for which they had received their pass, but also any other paid occupation or employment where their privileged access to Parliament is relevant;
2. holders of permanent passes as Members' secretaries or Members' research assistants be required to register any relevant gainful occupation which they may pursue other than that for which the pass is issued; and
3. Commons officers of All Party and Registered Groups be required to register the names of the officers of the Group, the source and extent of any benefits financial or in kind from outside sources which they may enjoy, together with any other relevant gainful occupation of any staff which they may have. Where a public relations agency provides the assistance, the ultimate client should be named;

[Mr. Speaker]

and that copies of these Registers be placed in the Library for the use of Members; and asks that the Committee considers further measures to strengthen disclosure provisions including the possibility of identifying interests in Parliamentary Questions, whether the amount of remuneration should be declared as well as the interest, and whether there is a need to consider constraints on voting.

It being after Ten o'clock, MR. SPEAKER proceeded to put forthwith the deferred Question necessary to dispose of the proceedings on Supplementary Estimates, 1985-86 (Class II, Vote 7).

CLASS II, VOTE 7

Resolved,

That a supplementary sum not exceeding £1,000 be granted to Her Majesty out of the Consolidated Fund to defray the charges which will come in the course of payment during the year ending on 31st March 1986 for expenditure by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Overseas Development Administration) on the official United Kingdom Aid Programme including capital subscriptions, other contributions and payments under guarantees to certain multilateral development banks and other bodies; subscriptions and grants in aid to certain international and regional organisations; bilateral capital aid and technical co-operation; refugee and other relief assistance; the cost of in-house Scientific Units; assistance, including grants in aid, to certain UK based institutions and voluntary agencies; loans to the Commonwealth Development Corporation; and pensions and allowances in respect of overseas service.

Mr. Speaker proceeded to put forthwith the Questions which he was directed to put pursuant to paragraph (7) of Standing Order No. 19 (Consideration of Estimates).

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES 1985-86

Resolved,

That a further supplementary sum, not exceeding £1,622,415,000, be granted to Her Majesty out of the Consolidated Fund to defray charges for Defence and Civil Services which will come in the course of payment during the year ending on 31st March 1986, as set out in House of Commons Paper No. 9.

ESTIMATES 1986-87 (VOTE ON ACCOUNT)

Resolved,

That a sum, not exceeding £43,136,812,000, be granted to her Majesty out of the Consolidated Fund, on account, for or towards defraying the charges for Defence and Civil Services for the year ending on 31st March 1987, as set out in House of Commons Papers Nos. 6, 10 and 16.

Bill ordered to be brought in upon the foregoing Resolutions by the Chairman of Ways and Means, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. John MacGregor, Mr. John Moore, Mr. Ian Stewart and Mr. Peter Brooke.

CONSOLIDATED FUND

Mr. John Moore accordingly presented a Bill to apply certain sums out of the Consolidated Fund to the service of the years ending on 31 March 1986 and 1987: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time tomorrow and to be printed. [Bill 18.]

Water Authorities (Return on Assets)

10.29 pm

Dr. David Clark (South Shields): I beg to move,

That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that the Water Authorities (Return on Assets) (No. 2) Order 1985 (S.I., 1985, No. 1805), dated 21st November 1985, a copy of which was laid before this House on 25th November, be annulled.

This statutory instrument is quite reprehensible. The Government have clearly exposed in it the weakness of their monetarist approach. In essence, it is a tax on water. That tax has been deplored throughout the length and breadth of the country. We might have been forgiven if we had believed last summer that a tax on water might have solved all of the Government's problems. It is ironic that a Government who are dedicated to tax reductions should tax one of the basic necessities of life.

All hon. Members accept that the basic necessities of life — food and clothing — should not be taxed. Nevertheless, the Government have taxed heat in the form of gas and electricity. One wonders whether they have considered the taxation of air. Indeed, it might come to that eventually.

The statutory instrument might appear to be innocuous. The figures show a rate of return that varies from 1·5 per cent. to 1·73 per cent. Many hon. Members must think that this is a purely notional rate of return. However, the key point, which was so succinctly raised when this issue was debated earlier this year, is: a return on what? Many hon. Members, including Opposition Members, believe that the assets upon which this rate of return is based are false. They are based upon an incorrect accounting procedure. Therefore, 1·5 per cent. to 1·73 per cent. is a very much larger percentage that has to be paid by local authorities to the Exchequer.

The asset figure upon which it is based is not the historic valuation. We are referring to assets which in many cases are over 100 years old. To adopt the current cost accounting procedure as the valuation is a false and incorrect way to handle the issue. We believe that there should be a better way to work out the necessary rate of return.

Opposition Members oppose this concept, but there is wide condemnation of the Government's approach by a very wide sphere of interest, including bodies that are normally the Government's allies. However, increasingly of late I do not believe that the Confederation of British Industry can be counted as one of the Government's closest allies, especially over investment in the infrastructure. The CBI argues, rightly, that the Government's policy will put unnecessary burdens on to the shoulders of industry. As the value of the pound falls and fluctuates, Opposition Members believe that this is not the best time to start to impose additional costs upon industry.

Why are there dire warnings about this order? If one considers the best possible estimate of the effects of the order it is felt that there will be an increase in water charges that ranges between 5 per cent. to 10 per cent. However, most independent assessments predict that the increase will be much nearer 10 per cent. than 5 per cent. This follows a rise of 10 per cent. in the past financial year. It is the declared intention of the Government and the water authorities that increases should not rise faster than the rate of inflation, yet here we have increases that will mean that domestic and industrial water users will be paying a tax direct to the Exchequer. That is a weak way of dealing with the accounting of the water boards. Indeed, the CBI goes as far as to say that it "can detract from investment in Britain".

It is useful to see what the Government's allies say on this issue. The CBI also states:

"Whilst . . . it is essential to control borrowing effectively, the Government's policy of reducing water authority borrowing to zero has the effect of imposing on today's customers the cost of funding not only the provision of existing services but also providing assets which will last far into the future. It is sound business practice to borrow for long-life capital projects and water authorities should be allowed to do this".

That is the opinion of the Opposition. Given the outdated infrastructure in much of the water industry — in both the supply and sewerage sectors — it is ridiculous that the borrowing limit for some authorities is to be reduced to almost zero.

The Severn-Trent authority — not exactly an affluent area — is having its borrowing powers reduced to £2·5 million, and the South-West authority to £4 million. The correspondence that I have received from that authority shows that there is a continuing problem of sewage outflow on to the beaches which the authority wants to tackle but is unable so to do. Yet the Government are reducing its ability to borrow money.

If this trend continues the water authorities will be raising considerable amounts of surplus cash for the Exchequer while driving up charges to the users. These target rates of return are inappropriate and inapplicable.

The Water Act required the Government to establish consultative consumer panels. How many of those panels have been consulted, and how many of them support the Government? I have received a letter from the consumer panel for the Northumbrian area, which includes the most depressed part of England, with the highest level of unemployment and industrial inaction. That panel is worried about the effects of the Government's policies, and it writes that "any increase in charges has severe repercussions in an already disadvantaged area such as the North East Region and, according to reports in the press, we are again faced with a similar situation this year with a threatened rise of 10 per cent. in charges for Northumbrian Water's consumers".

That is against a background of an astronomic rise in water charges during the period of this Government's tutelage. Between 1979 and 1985 — in the six years of this Government in power — the average increase has been 105 per cent. In some areas such as Northumbria it has been 137 per cent. That is inflation gone mad. It is time that the Government called off the monetarist approach and helped industries and consumers in areas that have suffered from these massive increases in water charges.

There is a strong feeling that water authorities should not be paying this tax to the Government but that, if there is excess capital, it should be invested in infrastructure to clear up sewage around our coast, for example. We should use the capital to ensure a regular and pure water supply.

It is astonishing that between one quarter and one third of water leaks are from mains pipes. In areas such as Liverpool, more than half of the water is lost before it reaches the consumer. That is wasteful and cannot be tolerated. There could be no more appropriate time than this to debate this order as we had the graphic example of the burst water main in Leeds only last week, when 200,000 homes were without water and people were put to great personal inconvenience.

[Dr. David Clark]

What happened in Leeds could happen in any of our major industrial towns. The Government have been warned by their own advisers and supporters. If the same happens to other towns, responsibility will lie squarely with the Government. The money should not go to the Exchequer but stay with water authorities to be reinvested in the infrastructure.

The problem with sewage is even worse. I am glad that Environment Ministers are present. What is happening to our rivers is quite scandalous. I can remember the efforts of a Conservative Government in the early 1970s to clean up our rivers. They did an extremely good job and the matter has been pursued by both parties. I am glad to say that it is now possible to catch trout and salmon right up the headstreams of the river Tyne. Since 1979, however, things have changed. In 1984, 709 km of rivers in England and Wales were declared grossly polluted. That is 16 per cent. worse than the figure for 1980. That considerable worsening applies to almost every region. No hon. Member can be proud of it.

The north-west has a "widespread problem of poor water quality and low pressures."

It has also suffered 600 major sewerage collapses each year. In Merseyside, the Secretary of State for Defence described matters as "an affront to the standards of a civilised society".

No less than 29 per cent. of Yorkshire's water fails to conform to the EC standard for drinking. That is especially true in the old wool towns of Halifax and Huddersfield. I can vouch for the fact that water often runs brown there.

The Severn-Trent area applied for derogations from EC standards. The Northumbria region is cutting the operational costs of its sewerage works. For example, in 1979, a 21·7 kg of pollution load per person was recorded. That had fallen to just over 16 kg by 1984. There were 21 km of polluted rivers in the northern region in 1979, which was a good record, but there were 36 km in 1984. What happens in these regions could apply to others.

We feel that the Government should be taking the issue seriously. We know that they are trying to put pressure on the water authorities to meet certain operating levels. They are trying to persuade the authorities to sell off their assets, their family silver, as it was so graphically described in another place.

I ask the Minister to give a specific answer to a question which I raised with him when environmental questions were most recently before the House. We understand that in many of the territories of the water authorities in the northern region, especially in the forest of Bowland of the North-West water authority, the moors belonging to the Northumbrian water authority and the moorland in Yorkshire and the Severn-Trent area, and the national parks, there has been de facto access for exercise on foot for generations. When the Minister orders authorities to sell off that land, will he give a guarantee to the House that he will ensure that the people from the northern industrial cities and from elsewhere will continue to have the right of access and exercise, which they have had for generations, without them having to prove 20 years' unchallenged access to retain it?

I understand that the Government's ultimate objective is to privatise the water industry. I wonder whether the Minister will confirm that. Will he bear in mind the comment of the CBI, which supports the Government's water privatisation plan? The CBI concludes that in the meantime boards of water authorities should be allowed greater freedom to manage their affairs, especially their pricing, financing and investment.

I look forward to hearing the Minister justifying this preposterous tax to those outside, to my right hon. Friends and to 34 Conservative Members who signed early-day motion 129, which calls upon the Government not to impose a tax on water. That is a view with which we concur and I urge the Government not to press ahead with this preposterous tax.

10.48 pm

The Minister for Housing, Urban Affairs and Construction (Mr. John Patten): No one inside or outside the House much likes paying bills. The payment of water bills seems to excite more controversy and upset than most other payments. That is largely because water seems to be a free item. Although it recycles itself endlessly, it costs a fair amount to purify and deliver, but the public seem to resent paying much for it. That is a feeling that runs deep. They resent even more having to pay for sewerage. Alas and alack, it is difficult and costly to deliver sometimes in some areas, and it has to be paid for. Sewage is hard to get rid of sometimes. The hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) has rightly referred to the considerable task that faces us in the delivery of high-quality water, which is one of our aims. We aim also to get rid of lead from water by 1989 and to improve the standard of bathing water around our shores.

The rationale for seeking to improve the return on assets earned by the water authorities which deliver the water, get rid of the sewage, protect our coasts and look after land drainage, was brilliantly, clearly and explicitly set out in the admirable speech of my predecessor, my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow), in February. I recommend his speech to anyone who is interested in this critical issue. I particularly draw the attention of the House to his use of an excellent letter by Dr. Johannes Witteween in 1976 when the International Monetary Fund was called in to the country. My hon. Friend pointed out in his speech in February two intentions that lay behind the rate of return order. They remain the same today—first, to increase the investment that water authorities can make and, secondly, to do so with less public sector borrowing. I was pleased to note that when the chairman of Thames water announced his financial results for the first half of the year up to the year ending 30 September 1985, he took credit for the improvement in his authority's financial position, which has been to a large extent the result of those policies. Mr. Watts says that between September 1984 and September 1985 the authority repaid £50 million of its outstanding loans, so that it is on track to meet all its financial targets for the current year. That is a significant statement by the chairman of Thames water.

I want to look at the general picture, the rates of return and their relationship with investment, which was referred to by the hon. Member for South Shields. I know that that will interest many of my right hon. and hon. Friends. It will be noted that the order laid on 25 November specifies rates of return which are, on average, a little lower than those predicted at the time of the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne. We have found it possible to set a lower average rate of return—about 1·6 per cent. for 1986-87—and at the same time fund a higher level of investment than we thought was possible earlier in the year, without increasing the planned borrowing figure. That is a significant improvement.

We do not just expect, we know, that next year investment in the water industry, in water supply and sewerage, will reach a record level. Never in the history of the water industry will so much money be invested as in 1986-87—about £900 million. It will soon be £1 billion a year. We have moderated the financial target. That will have an effect on the charges that we can expect. At the same time we have made it possible significantly to increase the levels of investment in water delivery, sewerage, flood protection, land drainage, coastal protection and the improvement in water quality, which is the concern of my hon. Friend the Minister of State for Environment, Countryside and Local Government.

It is significant to realise that the increases in capital investment in the infrastructure of the water industry are part and parcel of an across-the-board increase in investment in infrastructure announced in the autumn statement by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. There will be more money for housing, roads, hospital construction and renovation and also more money for water investment and sewerage investment.

As a result of the better-than-expected picture, we are able to set a lower than expected average rate of return. Water charges are likely to increase less than we expected six or seven months ago—by about 8 per cent. Water investment will increase by rather more—about 10 per cent. That is a considerable sum.

I have no doubt that that improvement will be welcomed by hon. Members on both sides of the House and by water consumers everywhere. I hope that it will be. The figures that I have given are, of course, national averages. They will vary regionally. I have good news for the hon. Member for South Shields. Northumbria Water will not find it too difficult to keep its charges this year close to the going rate of inflation. That is different from the gloomy picture that the hon. Gentleman gave us in his speech, and the predictions by his hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) last year, when he said that Thames Water would impose a 30 per cent. increase in charges over three years. By how much is it increasing its charges this year? By 3 per cent. That is rather a different picture.

Even the South-West water authority, about which my hon. Friend the Member for Tiverton (Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop) is concerned, expects to increase its water rate by between 6 and 7 per cent. and at the same time substantially to increase the amount of investment that it hopes to make in that year to about £40 million overall. Nowhere in the country do I expect any water authority to have to raise prices by a full 10 per cent., although I expect that some will come close to it.

Efficiency improvements are helping to limit the charges that are necessary. I pay tribute to the water authorities and their chairmen for the substantial increases in efficiency and improvements in producitivity and manpower levels that they have achieved. That is so different from what we inherited in 1979.

Next year we shall review the water authorities' financial targets and their investment and borrowing requirements before decisions are taken in respect of 1987-88 and subsequent years. We are also seriously considering the prospects for privatisation.

I answer the final question asked by the hon. Member for South Shields. Privatisation would mean reviewing every aspect of water authorities' finances. I note that no fewer than 70 of my discerning right hon. and hon. Friends have subscribed to an amendment to early-day motion 176, in support of privatisation. It is interesting to learn of that support from Conservative Members. The Government will note the strength of feeling reflected in that amendment to the early-day motion.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): In the past, profits have been made from the supply of water—indeed, that still occurs in some places. Does the Minister agree that profits have never been made from the transfer and disposal of sewage? As he is now taxing sewage disposal by way of contribution to the Consolidated Fund, whereas before the Consolidated Fund assisted sewage disposal, what is the philosophical reason for getting private profits from the disposal of sewage?

Mr. Patten: I am no philosopher, just a simple politician. [Interruption.] I welcome the support of my right hon. and hon. Friends.

Should water privatisation go ahead, the integrated river basin management system would be vital. That system is one of this country's great achievements. It means water in and water out, water supplied, and sewage out. People who might be interested in the— [Interruption.] If the hon. Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Mr. Golding) wishes to interrupt from a sedentary position or intervene from an upright position to talk about the angling issues which I know concern him, I shall give way. In the meantime, I should like to finish my non-philosophical and entirely pragmatic response to the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing).

Should any water authority be privatised at any stage in future, those people seeking to purchase any water authority will have to weigh the benefits of the sale of water and other services against the disbenefits of having to provide sewerage and other services. I shall give way to the hon. Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme. I expect it is on the angling issue.

Mr. John Golding (Newcastle-under-Lyme): No. May I draw the Minister's attention to the look of shock and horror on the face of his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and his hon. Friend the Minister for Environment, Countryside and Local Government when he referred to the cleaning of rivers as one of the great achievements. It was their expressions that amused me. It would be better if the Minister spoke with a mirror on a stick so that he could see the reaction on his side of the Chamber.

Mr. Patten: I now understand what my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment meant when he said that it was an interesting experience to serve for many hours with the hon. Gentleman in Standing Committee on the British Telecommunications Bill. I hope that he will forgive me if I do not give way to him again during the course of my speech.

The hon. Member for South Shields asked four questions. First, he asked about footpaths. I understand how important it is in the lives of people in an industrial or any urban centre, south or north, to get out into the country. Fabian fell walking is also very much part of Labour party tradition and we do not want to do anything to get in the way of that. I can tell the hon. Gentleman that water authorities which dispose of their lands will dispose of them with whatever rights of access the public may already have. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will accept that. Rather than debating the issue across the Dispatch Box now, I would prefer to write him a long letter setting all this out in some detail in an attempt to satisfy him. I have given the assurance that I have given in carefully worded terms and if it is wrong there will be all hell to pay for the people who wrote it.

[Mr. Patten]

Dr. David Clark: I am grateful to the Minister for giving way and I shall not trespass on his time. We are not only talking about footpaths but about de facto access. As he has guaranteed us that access, I know that everyone will be grateful for that gesture.

Mr. Patten: The hon. Gentleman had better listen again to these carefully composed words. Water authorities which dispose of their lands will dispose of them with whatever rights of access—"rights" is rather different from de facto access, as the hon. Gentleman will doubtless accept—the public may have.

Secondly, let me deal with back-door taxation. There is nothing wrong at all with a rate of return of between 1 and 2 per cent. on water industry assets. Any business would expect to earn considerably more. Water authority debt is pretty formidable at the moment. It is about £4·5 billion. Interest charges take up no less than a quarter of all revenue from customers. That is a high percentage. Few businesses would be happy with that sort of interest burden. Some authorities have started to repay past debts, thereby reducing their interest rate liabilities. That strikes me as good husbandry and sound management.

The hon. Gentleman's third question related to current cost accounting. I know that that is a somewhat controversial issue. I am no accountant by training. The pros and cons were set out in the speech by my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne earlier this year in February and I can do no better than repeat what he had to say then on why we think that historic cost accounting has a couple of weaknesses.

The first reason is that it fails to reflect the effect of inflation on the value of assets whose lives can exceed 100 years, which are still doing valuable service and which have to be replaced. Secondly, we must somehow take into account the fact that in 1973 significant numbers of assets were transferred to the new water authorities at zero value. The 18th report of the Committee of Public Accounts, published earlier this year, commented in an interesting way on the monitoring and control of water authorities and explicitly endorsed the employment of current cost accounting in setting financial targets for the industry. It is an important debate, which we shall probably never resolve. I would not claim that this or any other Government have yet found the exact fair mechanism for charging for water and all related services. We have simply tried to do the best we could within the current cost framework.

Fourthly, I shall say a word about Leeds. There has been a great deal of concern about the loss of water supply in Leeds during the past week. We were lucky that we had the Army prepared and ready to go in to Leeds to do such sterling service. My right hon. Friend the Minister of State for the Armed Forces was in Leeds on Friday. Events there are now under control and there are no substantial problems. I commend the co-operation of all the agencies and recognise the long hours worked by the staff of the water authority, the fire service and the Army, who came in at short notice.

The burst was unusually severe, but the hon. Gentleman should be a little more cautious before he says, "Water mains burst in Leeds equals the proving of the case that there is under-investment in the water industry." That is simply not the case. The chairman of the Yorkshire water authority, who is holding a full inquiry into the matter, said that the cause of the burst may have been earth movements construction work or all sorts of other possibilities. It is wrong to pick an example of one major burst and suggest that that proves that there is not sufficient investment.

I do not want to indulge in across-the-Dispatch-Box discussions about records — indeed, that would be fruitless now that we have been in government for six and a half years. We take pride in what we have done. During those six and a half years, we have increased investment in the water industry by 30 per cent. in real terms, taking into account inflation, which compares favourably with the 50 per cent. cut imposed by the last Labour Government. By all means help the debate about infrastructure, but be a little cautious before taking on the Government on their record. We have increased investment while the last Labour Government cut investment.

The order is a further step in the progress of our policy of strengthening the water authorities so that they can discharge their responsibilities to the public effectively and cheaply. The industry is no longer a poor relation of local government, and everyone recognises that. Its reorganisation in 1974 on the basis of river basins has provided the right technical framework. With our encouragement, it now has sound finance and competent, commercially orientated management. I hope to see the day when this evolution can take a step forward and the authorities will have the benefit of being set free to serve the public as independent viable businesses in their own right.

11.8 pm

Mr. William O'Brien (Normanton): The Minister should make inquiries about what people think of the charges being imposed upon water consumers because of the taxes that the Government are imposing upon water authorities. The wrath expressed last year demonstrated the general feeling about that, which has been demonstrated again this year.

We must remember that a number of people on fixed incomes and pensions will suffer the most from the 10 per cent. increase in charges that faces 4·5 million people in Yorkshire. Those in the lower income group and with lower rateable value properties will, because of standing charges, face an increase in excess of 10 per cent. The Minister should have regard to this imposition on water authorities.

The debate was initiated because of the impact of the Government's financial policy on water charges this year. The Minister has confirmed that current charges will range from between 5 per cent. and 10 per cent., but in many cases the charge could be more. In addition to the pensioners and those on fixed incomes, the working poor, who have to rely on Government incentives to take low-paid jobs, will suffer the greatest hardship. My hon. Friend the Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) said that the increase in water charges, which is greater than the increase in inflation, will not be welcomed by consumers. It will not be welcome in any budget, especially that of industry.

In Yorkshire, the food processing, chemical, textile, paper and brewing industries will be hit especially hard. The fact that the increase in water charges will be higher than the increase in inflation does nothing to sustain the shrine at which the Government worship. The increase of 10 per cent.—more, in some cases—will hit industries in Yorkshire in particular and throughout Britain in general.

The CBI, which usually rallies behind the Government, has said that the high water charges, in addition to the charges for other services, such as gas and electricity, will have adverse effects on international competitiveness and might detract from investment in Britain. I hope that the Government will have regard to such statements. I believe that it is generally accepted by hon. Members and those outside that the Government are proposing a tax on water and sewerage. If we are to be honest with the consumers, we should make that point abundantly clear. The Government are taxing by the back door. Industry will have to pay the greatest amount of tax. The Government's policy of reducing water authorities' borrowing to zero will impose on consumers the cost not only of funding existing services but of providing assets that will last far into the future. The CBI has said that it is sound business practice to borrow for long-life capital projects and that water authorities should be allowed to do so. The Minister has said that any sound business organisation would take certain action in certain circumstances. He should note that that is the advice that business people give to the Government. Industrialists say that it is sound policy to borrow for long-term projects.

We still have private water companies. What would be said if they wished to impose a 10 to 12 per cent. increase? Would they be accused of acting illegally? Here we have public water authorities imposing extra charges on consumers. There could be said to be double standards, with one set for customers of private water authorities, and another for customers of public water authorities.

My hon. Friend the Member for South Shields said that two authorities would this year have their borrowing reduced to zero. He referred to the Severn-Trent and the South-West authorities. It seems that the Southern authority will not be permitted to borrow at all, while the Thames authority will be required to raise £85 million more than it requires to cover all its outgoings, including its capital investment programme.

I have with me the report of the consumer consultative committee for the Thames water authority—the report related to the corporate plan for 1984—in which the committee came out firmly in support of that authority's policy and against the Government's policy of imposing financial targets at a level leading to the premature repayment of debt. One member of the consultative committee argued that investment was more important than the early repayment of debt. While, on the one hand, the Minister holds up Government policy as an example of the way in which water authorities should operate, on the other, the body representing water consumers in the Thames area is against Government policy.

It is right to ask what support the Government have received for their policy from consumer consultative committees. I have checked with the four consumer bodies in Yorkshire, especially about the Government's pricing policy for water authorities, and it is clear that the consumers have no support for the Government.

I recently asked the Minister to explain the procedure if consumers made representations through a local consultative committee—remembering that no consumer can now attend water authority meetings—to the local water authority and the matter could not be resolved. Replying, the Minister told me that in the event of a stalemate, the complainant would have the right to complain to the local ombudsman.

In asking that question, I was not concerned with maladministration but with the whole issue of pricing and consumer complaints. After all, a consumer would not need to go through the consultative committee procedure to approach the local ombudsman. I take it from the Minister's reply, therefore, that, as constituted, consultative committees have no real responsibilities. They exist in name only. They have no power or authority. I hope that something will be done to ensure that consumers are properly represented. If the consultative committees are not operating successfully water authority meetings should be open to allow the public to attend and see what is taking place.

It is claimed that the water authorities should be allowed greater freedom to manage their affairs, in particular, with regard to their pricing, financing and investment policies. That was one of the principles and intentions of the Water Act, 1983. I hope that the Minister will accept that water authorities should have greater freedom.

My hon. Friend the Member for South Shields said that there was wide interest in and objection to the Government's water pricing policy. That is reflected by the number of organisations and individuals who oppose the extra taxes being imposed upon water authorities.

The Minister referred to the incident in Leeds. I represent part of Leeds and that incident plainly aroused a great deal of interest. The Minister said that Mr. Jones, the chairman of the Yorkshire water authority, has instigated an internal inquiry. Should there not be a public inquiry into such an occurrence? My hon. Friend the Member for South Shields said that there is a danger that the Leeds incident is the first of a number that could occur because of the age of the assets and the way that water authorities have to make do with them.

The chairman of the Yorkshire water authority has more than once asked that the authority be allowed to borrow more money to solve the problems that are developing with water and sewage pipes. What would happen if a major sewage pipe fractured? The position would be much more serious and the problem would be much worse than what happened in Leeds. That is why something must be done to improve capital expenditure on such major assets.

I hope that the Minister will take note of the problems that exist. It is no use burying our heads in the political sand and saying that the problems do not exist. They do. I hope that the chairman of the Yorkshire water authority will allow every word of the inquiry's findings to be made public. If not, I shall be asking for a public inquiry.

[Mr. William O'Brien]

Reference has also been made to the amount of water going to waste. In some places, 25 to 30 per cent. of the water pumped at source goes to waste before it reaches the consumer. That is because many of the pipes are like sieves. They want replacing. Water authorities are asking to be allowed to replace them by borrowing money or financing the repairs from capital.

I make the point which I have made more than once—I also made it in the Public Accounts Committee—that domestic consumers pay twice for waste water. We could save 25 per cent. of the cost of energy used to pump and raise water from the ground or reservoirs if we could arrest the waste of water. I hope that the Minister will take that important point on board.

Finally, water authorities have said that they oppose privatisation [HON. MEMBERS: "Which authorities?"] Yorkshire water authority and others, and consumer organisations are on record as saying that they oppose privatisation. If the Minister has not seen the records, they can be provided. At this time last year only Thames water authority said that privatisation should be considered, while the rest suggested that it would not be in the best interests of the industry. If the Minister is not aware of that, he should take on board some of the reports of consumer consultative bodies in the various water authority areas. Some water authority members are speaking plainly against privatisation.

The Minister did not refer to the glaring question of meters. In view of the report, I would have expected——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): The hon. Member is going a little wide of the order. He should stick to the return on the assets of the industry.

Mr. O'Brien: This is important to the return on the assets because, if meters are installed, they must be financed. The report suggests that there should be experimental areas, which, if the report is implemented, must be financed. Therefore, it is important that the Minister makes a statement tonight on that subject. Any decision about the financial provisions of water authorities will influence that. As no statement was made, I doubt the validity of the report that the press suggest is now available. For that reason that subject is relevant to our debate and I appeal to the Minister to comment on it. Millions of people, some of whom are in favour and some of whom are against metering, will be affected.

I remind that Minister that 4·5 million people in Yorkshire will follow tonight's discussion. Last year they faced up to a 15 per cent. increase in water charges, and it will be the same again this year. That is far above the rate of inflation. If increases are caused by inflation, the level of water charge increases throughout the country should be at the inflation rate.

11.28 pm

Mr. Robin Maxwell-Hyslop (Tiverton): Some hon. Members will remember that this is not the first time that I have disagreed with my Front Bench on water charges. I have listened with interest to the Opposition Front Bench, and it would be complete hypocrisy if the Opposition did not carry their prayer to a Division tonight, which I presume they will do.

We are faced with increases in charges in excess of inflation. The inflation rate is about 5·5 per cent. Moreover, there is no rebate on the charges for people with small incomes, as there was prior to 1973. This is a form of taxation which is imposed behind closed doors by the water authorities, and the Government are imposing a rate of return which no business, however businesslike, would conceive of practising on the basis of a real valuation of its so-called assets. Mile after mile of rotten pipes leak like a sieve and stain the water so that people cannot even wash clothes in it. The book value that such nonsense has is then expected to give a return that may look deceptively modest when we see the figures in the order.

My hon. Friend the Minister has not given any reason for the disparities in the rates of return that he wants the House to pray against, such as the South-West water authority, together with Northumberland, at 1·73, compared with 1·5 in the north-west, when much of the provision that the south-west has to make is for the rest of the country coming on holiday in a dry season, in terms of water collection. That is why there was a rate equalisation system for water charges from the previous Administration across the country.

We now have water authorities alternatively exhorted to behave as if they are businesses and then forbidden to do so. No business would use current earnings for a capital investment programme of the kind necessary to replace the rotten water distribution system. [Interruption.] If there is zero borrowing, one does it either out of current earnings or not at all—unless my hon. Friend is suggesting that it should not be done at all.

Mr. Richard Holt (Langbaurgh): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I did not say a word.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: Unless he is suggesting that, that is what one would have to do.

Mr. Holt: I said nothing.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: My hon. Friend was speaking from a sedentary position, even if he did not realise it.

Mr. Holt: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I find it wrong that any hon. Member should attack another hon. Member for speaking when he has not said a word.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: I withdraw what I said, although I did not name my hon. Friend. Another of my hon. Friends spoke. However, if my hon. Friend the Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt) chooses to wear the cap, he is entitled to.

No business operating as a business would replace long-life capital assets of this kind on zero borrowing. The Government Front Bench should make up its mind whether it wishes the water authorities to behave as a business would behave or not.

It is not just the provision of water or the clearing away of sewage, not just the checking of the coast line and flood prevention on water courses that are involved. Other facilities provided by the water authorities are outside their statutory duty but within their statutory competence. Those are not business decisions but fairly political decisions, but the public are not admitted to the meetings at which they are taken. If my hon. Friend the Minister feels that I might have taken that view rather earlier. I can point out that I voted for an amendment when the Bill was going through the House to the effect that the public should be present.

The order will raise personal costs and industrial costs by more than they need to be raised. The water-consuming industries, which are often found in peripheral areas, often have major cost drawbacks anyway, because they are by definition at a considerable distance from their market. Therefore, they have high transport costs. If I may have the ear of my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing, Urban Affairs and Construction——

Mr. John Patten: My hon. Friend has it.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: —I shall draw to his attention the fact that the paper industry is in fierce competition with both European Community countries and those countries that were members of the European Free Trade Association where there are still cross-trade barrier permissions that put our industry at a severe disadvantage. The Government are powerless to remedy that. However, having ensured that, compared with our continental competitors some of the energy price disparities have been reduced so that in many cases energy costs are now comparable, the Government must not bump up water charges, which would mean that those industries that need to use a lot of water, or that need to make use of a lot water and then return it to their productive processes, are rendered uncompetitive yet again.

For those reasons, as well as many others that hon. Members may wish to deploy in the short time remaining for this debate, I shall vote for the prayer.

11.36 pm

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): Tonight's events show that we have not quite done away with the controversy in February when the matter was last before the House. The hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) who is, as it were, the shadow behind tonight's proceedings was then exposed to what can only be described as an attack from all sides. He would probably have been exposed to even greater attack had the matter not been delayed for some months while palliative measures were discussed. The underlying reasons for that attack remain. Although matters have moved on a little, valid objections remain and I want to allude briefly to them.

I share many of the views of the hon. Member for Tiverton (Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop). We are dealing with a form of taxation that has been arrived at in secret by authorities appointed by the Minister. For obvious historical reasons, people find this particularly objectionable. This has happened at a time when we need greater investment in the water industry because its assets are coming increasingly quickly to the end of their useful life. In many cases they are now between 60 and 100 years old, and increasingly they are leaking. The industry says that it wants to put the matter right and to do a good job. It has never acceded to the Government's view that it is appropriate that the Government should impose an additional return on assets requirement.

The fundamental objection is that the money that is to be raised from the consumer, which is always raised with some reluctance, should be translated directly into the Treasury coffers to deal with the general economic policy of the Government instead of being applied to the needs of the water industry, which are as great as those of any other part of the infrastructure.

The Minister did not deal with the fact that lying behind all this is the spectre of privatisation. It is well known that the Government are contemplating privatisation, and it is apparent from the Minister's reply that the Government are seeking to increase the appeal of the industry so that it will be easier to hive it off. However, they are reducing the industry's ability to carry out urgent tasks. May I remind the Minister of what I understand the Water Authorities Association would most like in terms of a water policy, because some of the things that the Minister hinted at do not quite deliver the goods. First, they want a system of proper objectives to motivate not only chairmen but also all officers and employees, so that——

Mr. John Patten: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hughes: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will allow me to make another related point so that he can deal with them together. The authorities need objectives that reveal themselves in terms of financial planning.

This order is the second of a series, of which last year's was the breakthrough first order. None the less, from what the Minister has said, there is no clear planning basis for the figures for the coming years. The industry wants to simplify its system and to reduce Government interference and imposition so that it can reduce its charges. It also wants a series of targets for more than one year ahead, yet the Minister avoided doing just that. The industry would like targets for three years, but the Minister has not done that because before they are up he anticipates privatisation —there is no secret about that and his gestures suggest it—even though that is not the necessary conclusion of the road down which we are going. In any event, it is not the only helpful way of assisting the industry.

Irrespective of the Government's privatisation plans, with which I disagree, it would be helpful if the targets were spelled out now so that the water industry can see what is required of it and plan accordingly.

The industry would also like to have flexibility in raising finance. It does not want to charge the substantial increases that it is now being forced to charge. In some areas that was 10 per cent. last year and 10 per cent. this year. That is way above the rate of inflation, and it imposes an additional, severe burden with no rebate for those who are often the least able to pay. Although this is not an enormous part of a person's budget, it is a substantial and relevant part. It is taxation above the rate of inflation with no parallel increase in the service provided.

I understand that the chairman of the Thames water authority is an advocate and supporter of privatisation, but last year he complained vociferously about the Government's imposition of these targets. He would argue that his authority's operating costs are largely fixed, that it has a large revenue base, that it has done a lot to reduce costs and that it is not necessary for the Government to require this return on assets.

There are also problems for the Welsh water authority because of the difficulty of marrying the effect of the return on assets order with the attempts to make the system more just as between the high-rated and low-rated authorities. That results in a double imposition.

Equally, other regions are concerned that present policy means that they are not able to obtain proper expenditure, given this imposed additional taxation. The North-West water authority is among them, and I understand that it has tried to get the rate of return reduced because it does not believe that charges—14 per cent. last year, of which 9 per cent. was due entirely to this order — should be increased by anything like that amount this year.

[Mr. Hughes]

Given that there is such a clawback of money for the Revenue, one must ask whether the use to which it is put is justifiable. That brings me to a specific point about the North-West water authority's liability for the victims of the Abbeystead pumping station disaster. The Minister will be aware that the explosion last May resulted in substantial loss of life, including three employees of the water authority and injury to many others. Every hope has been given that some of the water authority's assets would be used to alleviate the pain and suffering of the victims. So far, however, they have had only £20,000—£10,000 from the North-West water authority almost immediately and another £10,000 last week.

The Department of Employment Minister who went up to St. Michael's in Lancashire on behalf of the Government said that it seemed that the water authority was liable, as it would have been liable even if a tramp had been blown up while asleep on the authority's premises. Parliamentary answers to questions properly asked by Lancashire Members of Parliament have made it clear that Government funds were available. I do not mind who pays, but there have been precedents such as Bradford and Brussels, which could come to the rescue now to meet the hardship of those who are suffering.

The latest estimate is that the first realistic date at which to expect court money is next year. The Minister replied to a question asked by my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Liberal party recently, so he will know that the families of the victims are impatient. The water authority has substantial assets and it has been said that the funds for compensation exist, but no money is forthcoming. It is just this type of failure to use assets at times of need which justifies complaint. I hope that the Minister will direct attention to that case to achieve a satisfactory result before the end of the court case.

I hope also that the needs of the old and others who find water charges an imposition will be met. That can be achieved only by the Government reducing their charges. The water industry should be allowed to assess what it needs and impose charges accordingly. The Government should not tighten the screw by adding to charges which consumers cannot control because those who make the decisions are not accountable to them.

11.47 pm

Mr. Roger Freeman (Kettering): I accept the order because, in present circumstances, it presents an acceptable balance between raising finance for capital investment from the revenue cash flow of the industry, which is what a return on assets is all about, and the external financing limits in aggregate, which is what the public expenditure White Paper is all about.

There are three developments, however, which should give the House cause for some optimism, that we will not have to consider such orders in the future. The three developments are directly relevant to the order because it is about financing capital investment. The first is the new development in Anglian Water — my region — of the introduction of private capital at Flag Fen. Introducing private capital through franchising or joint venture obviates the need for capital investment financed through the PSBR. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will pursue that important development in conjunction with the Treasury.

The second development applies in the medium term. I am a strong supporter of privatisation and hope that it comes in region by region. There are many private water authorities and it is perfectly reasonable to privatise each of the major water authorities one by one and for them to operate under regulation just as many hundreds already do.

The third development is metering. We have recently received the report of the Watts committee. Compulsory residential metering would reduce demand by perhaps 10 or 15 per cent. and therefore obviate capital investment in some authority areas. That means that an authority may not need to raise finance for investment in new reservoirs. The second important value of residential metering is that it is important as a matter of equity.

In the long run, we are all in favour of permitting the industry to make its own decisions about the necessary levels of capital investment. In this instance I agree with the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes). Only the industry can make these decisions, and it can do so only if it can participate in the full play of market forces.

11.50 pm

Mr. John Golding (Newcastle-under-Lyme): For many of us, water is not for industrial purposes. For Conservative Members, water is often not for drinking. For my right hon. and hon. Friends, water is not for bathing; they prefer asses' milk generally. As everyone knows, water has only one real use, and that is to provide fishing.

I shall address myself to angling. The angler is in danger of greater exploitation by water authorities because of the imposition of a rate of return. I have been told that I must not abuse my right hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Mason) within the terms of the order, so instead I shall speak in support of the Midland Federation of Fly Fishers, which is concerned about the privatisation of reservoirs.

I am glad that the Secretary of State for the Environment is not present, because he would suffer from shock on hearing what I am about to say. I do not oppose all privatisation of reservoirs. In fact, I am the president of the Tittesworthe fishing club, which has experienced privatisation. The club has taken over the reservoir and the fishing has improved since it was under the control of the Severn-Trent authority. Likewise, in the area of the Anglian authority, Ravensthorpe fishery was privatised last year. It has come under good ownership and control and it is extremely successful.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will explain how he relates these matters to the substance of the order, which is return on assets.

Mr. Golding: That is obvious, Mr. Deputy Speaker. If money is lost running a fishery, the rate of return is affected. If money is made running a fishery, that obviously relates to the rate of return. My remarks are addressed to whether profit is made or not, and I believe that they are relevant.

The Midland Federation of Fly Fishers is worried always about rates of return on capital, and it is concerned about the privatisation of Rutland, Graffham and Pitsford reservoirs. Why is that? The federation believes that privatisation of large reservoirs under the control of the Anglian authority will be harmful. The ornithological, boating and angling interests have come together successfully and they have learnt to live together. It has been possible for anglers to enjoy fishing on the reservoirs. The federation is worried that the Anglian authority, thinking that it can maximise revenue by privatising, will privatise vast reservoirs. It claims that they will not be so successful as the small reservoirs. So vast are some of the reservoirs that it will require multi-million pound companies to take control of them. The fishermen are concerned that when that happens they will be taken over by entertainment and marina companies and that there will be all sorts of sports such as water ski-ing, which are incompatible with angling. The Midland Federation of Fly Fishers thinks, and I agree with it, that it would be dreadful for national angling institutions such as Rutland, Graffham and to a lesser extent, Pitsford, to be privatised in that way.

As the international fly fishing competition is to be held at Rutland and Graffham in 1987, it would be a disaster if people came from abroad to fish and saw water skiers on the water in the interest of maximising revenue. That brings me within the order once again.

The anglers are most upset about what the Anglian water authority seems to be doing to pave the way. The authority increased the cost for two anglers to go fishing at Rutland to £33. The anglers found that expensive but were prepared to accept it because there are very good power boats at Rutland. The Anglian water authority then extended those charges under financial pressure from the Government. That brings me within the order again. The authority then extended them to the other fisheries at Graffham and Pitsford. At Graffham the boats are ancient and not worth the price that was being charged.

The water authority was killing off the business. Anglers are generally very generous men and few of them are cynical, but they began to think that the authority was trying to kill off the business to have an excuse to privatise it. Those generous people, with rarely a suspicious thought in their heads, began to suspect that of the water authority.

The anglers have other grievances. They believe that the charging of £25,000 or £30,000 overheads on the fishery accounts has been done to pave the way for the privatisation of the vast waters. I am speaking on behalf of the anglers of Anglia; we do not want that. We want national institutions to remain national. It is acceptable for the smaller waters that will be managed as fisheries to be privatised, particularly if they will have to close.

I shall talk about the wider issue of privatisation.

Mr. Martin M. Brandon-Bravo (Nottingham, South): One minute to go.

Mr. Golding: One minute is nothing when we are dealing with angling and privatisation.

It is certain that there is tremendous opposition among anglers to the privatisation of water. That does not just apply to the ordinary common working-class fisherman. In the past few months I have been surprised at meetings of the anglers' co-operative association, the anti-pollution body and other angling organisations that there is a tremendous fear that privatisation of water will come. They think that privatisation will mean a reduced quality of angling. The Minister must not under-estimate the opposition to the privatisation of water among those who depend on water for their pleasure.

I regret, particularly in the absence of——

It being one and half hours after the commencement of proceedings on the motion, the debate stood adjourned, pursuant to order this day.

Taxis (Heathrow)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Lang.]

11.59 pm

Mr. Vivian Bendall (Ilford, North): I declare an interest in the matter, in that I represent the Licensed Taxi Drivers Association. My interest is declared in the Register of Members' Interests.

Not long ago we had a meeting with the Minister, for which I thank him, when we said that members of the taxi trade have been extremely concerned about the 50p tariff proposed by the British Airports Authority for the feeder park at Heathrow. I have also been in correspondence with Sir Norman Payne of the British Airports Authority to ask him to reconsider his decision about a charge for entrance to the feeder park. Unfortunately, when I wrote to him several weeks ago, he was not prepared to do so.

I should give the House a little background to how this unfortunate situation arose. Some time ago it was realised by the airport authority that there were problems with the taxi ranks at the airport, and taxis were using airport roads and getting in the way of the normal flow of traffic. Perhaps with more forward planning, taking into account the increase of the number of passengers going through the airport, that could have been realised some years ago and adequate provision made for it. However, that was not so and adequate provision was not made.

The airport authority rightly, to try to resolve the problem, suggested that taxis should be put through a feeder park. Some years ago, in conjunction with the licensed trade, talks took place on having a feeder park. General agreement was reached and certain aspects of it were contained in the 1983 byelaws. However, at the outset there was no mention of any charge to be made at that time or in the near future. Now drivers are being penalised by being charged 50p to enter the feeder park.

On the average Heathrow to central London run, depending on what part of London it is, on the present tariff, the taxi driver is likely to get £17 or £18. The problem arises when a cab from the feeder park has to go on a more local call such as in Isleworth or Hounslow, which are quite close to the airport. If the fare is fairly low, 50p for entering the feeder park is a considerable sum. The taxi can come back to the front of the feeder rank after a short journey only after it has been to some specific hotels adjacent to the airport. There will be confusion in the feeder park as cab drivers who have been waiting there for a considerable time will not be too happy about other taxis coming in front of them, even if they have been on a short journey.

The LTDA has informed me that the likely cost to the taxi trade of a feeder park charge of 50p is about £40,000 a month. There have been problems at Heathrow. There has been a boycott of the airport by a number of taxi drivers. The LTDA has supported that boycott. In such a situation, it is the public who are liable to be the losers.

The Minister should be made aware that since the boycott began several anomalies have arisen. Mini-cabs have been exploiting the situation to great effect. Cases have been reported to the LTDA and, in turn, to me of mini-cabs which have in the last few weeks charged tourists and visitors as much as £97 to come to central London from Heathrow. In one case a trip to the Hilton hotel cost £60. Some mini-cab drivers have suggested that if they take more than one passenger to central London the charge will be £20 for each passenger.

The English tourist board has taken an interest in the matter and it wrote to Mr. Feigen of the LTDA on 12 December. That letter pointed out that its infrastructure committee was extremely concerned about the 50p parking charge that was to be levied at the airport. It believed and hoped that it would not result in the deterioration of the taxi service and asked for the LTDA's advice on that. A copy of that letter was forwarded to Mr. Bell of the British Airports Authority.

Although the trade is boycotting Heathrow, it has acted in a proper and responsible manner. In other countries when such a situation has arisen there has been, quite wrongly, the blocking of airports—a ridiculous attitude towards the problem. The LTDA wishes it to be made clear that it would have nothing to do with such action because it would have serious consequences for emergency services in the event of an unfortunate accident.

There have been meetings today between the British Airports Authority and the members of the taxi trade interested in the problem. However, I am afraid that no agreement has been reached. The British Airports Authority's suggestion was that perhaps charges should be held until the end of January. That would only put off the situation for a few weeks. I can understand the British Airports Authority's concern with Christmas coming given the number of passengers going through Heathrow. Naturally it is concerned about the passengers and how they can disperse from the airport and get to it.

Another suggestion is to hold charges until May and in the meantime a committee could be set up to try to find ways of passing the charges on in a combined commercial venture. I do not understand whether that involves the trade because I have not yet had an opportunity to consider the finer points.

A member of the LTDA has asked for a judicial review, and I understand that that has been granted. I should have thought that it would have been prudent and sensible of the British Airports Authority to have held or withdrawn its charges pending the judicial review. That would stop the boycott immediately and would give time for the judicial review to be heard and for a decision to be reached.

I understand that in future legislation the British Airports Authority is liable to be privatised. I support the Minister in that. But what is liable to happen to charges on feeder parks once privatisation takes place? Will there be any control of increases? To some degree that trade has been let down.

Some years ago British Rail tried to introduce charges on taxi ranks outside stations. It decided that it was not practical and withdrew the proposition. Now that the BAA has introduced charges, I can envisage British Rail reconsidering its position. If it introduced charges, that would increase costs to the general public.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport is responsible for the tariffs charged to the public by taxi drivers. It is rather unfair that their tariffs are controlled in one area, but in another area they must face this increase. The Minister was asked to consider an increase in the tariff. I can understand his problem, because how can we separate taxis coming from Heathrow from taxis in London?

The BAA should reconsider the matter. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will intervene and will discuss the issue with the BAA. I understand that the original direction may have come from his Department, which is interested in increasing revenue from airports. I do not understand why that increase should be to the detriment of the taxi trade.

The taxi trade in London is an integral part of the transport system of Greater London. It is important because it is properly controlled and properly licensed and its drivers have to pass a knowledge test, unlike many parts of the private car hire system. In those circumstances, it is not fair to penalise those who are running a good service as an integral part of London's transport system. I hope that the matter will be reconsidered. I believe that it can be resolved — and, I hope, resolved before the continuing boycott at Heathrow really begins to affect the public.

12.12 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. David Mitchell): I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, North (Mr. Bendall) for raising this matter, and so giving the House the opportunity to consider the real issues that lie behind it.

The facts of the matter may be simply stated. The British Airports Authority incurs identifiable costs of some £500,000 associated with the marshalling of taxis at Heathrow. After extensive consultation with the London taxi trade, The authority decided to recover that cost by means of a levy of 50p on each vehicle entering the taxi feeder park. That charge was introduced on 27 November, since which date the taxi trade has boycotted the feeder park. I am sure that my hon. Friend will correct me if that is not his understanding of the position.

Before discussing the implications of this, I must state at the outset that the decision to introduce that charge was an administrative matter for the British Airports Authority acting under the Airports Authority Act 1975. It was not something for which I or my colleagues were responsible. I shall not comment on whether the authority had the vires to make that charge as I understand that this specific question is now the subject of a judicial review.

As I see it, this matter gives rise to two relatively distinct questions. The first is whether it was right for the authority to levy this charge at all, and the second is whether such a charge should be recovered from taxi passengers in the form of a surcharge on the fare for hirings made at the airport. I see my hon. Friend indicating that I have identified the key issues.

Taking the first question of whether a charge should be levied, I think that it is common ground that the authority has the power to provide these facilities for marshalling taxis at Heathrow. Indeed, under the 1975 Act it has a duty "to provide such services and facilities as are necessary or desirable at its airports".

I think that it is also accepted that the provision of these particular facilities costs in the order of £500,000 per annum, which has to be met from one source or another. At the moment it is a charge on the general revenue that the authority receives from its activities—that is, it is primarily recovered from aircraft landing charges.

We know that there is a cost and how it is being met. What are the effects? First, it makes flying into Heathrow a little more expensive for the airlines, but they pass that cost on to their passengers. Every passenger passing through Heathrow is making a contribution toward meeting the cost of marshalling taxis—a taxi tax on all the users of the airport. It seems to us not wholly unreasonable that the charge should be on the taxi operators who benefit from it.

A taxi charge on all the users might be justified on social grounds, but I do not think that my hon. Friend was claiming that the London taxi trade was a disadvantaged group in need of social support. The closest analogy that I can find is with the road haulage industry, which meets through taxes and duties the cost of the damage that its vehicles do to the roads. No one has yet claimed that we should increase excise duty on all vehicles to relieve the industry of this burden. The costs are identifiable. The road haulage industry gives rise to them, and it pays. This is the same principle that is being applied in the present case.

Let us examine the argument that the taxi trade is providing a service to the airport authority by carrying "its" passengers and should not be charged for doing so. But the shops in the terminal buildings are also providing a service and it is not said that they should not pay for the privilege of serving this lucrative market. It could be said that that is not a fair analogy. It has been asserted that London taxis have a right to ply for hire throughout London, including Heathrow. However, the airport is on private land and bus operators, who are licensed to ply for hire anywhere in Great Britain, pay a fee towards meeting the costs that they give rise to at the airport. That is directly analogous to the position of taxi drivers.

Of course the taxi trade does not like paying for something that it has previously had for nothing — I understand why my hon. Friend raised this matter of behalf of the taxi drivers—but I am afraid that all the logic lies in favour of putting these costs on those who benefit—the taxi drivers who choose to ply their trade at the airport.

Mr. Bendall: Will my hon. Friend concede that shops at Heathrow do not have the prices at which they sell their goods controlled?

Mr. Mitchell: My hon. Friend has made an important point, to which I shall come in a moment.

That brings me to the second strand of the argument —that, if the taxi trade is to bear this cost, it should be permitted to pass it on to passengers in the form of a surcharge on the fare. My hon. Friend claims that it is totally unreasonable that fares should be controlled and that the taxi trade should be unable to respond to an increase in costs by increasing its prices. At first sight, I was sympathetic to this argument. That was before I made further inquiries.

Soon after we first took over this responsibility from the Home Office, my officials came to me saying that it was time to increase London taxi fares. I must admit that my first reaction was one of amazement that the prices in this industry are controlled by central Government. What was so unique about the London taxi trade that it alone in the entire economy should be controlled in this way? Why cannot each taxi driver decide on the price at which to sell his services?

I was then presented with the following argument: first, to protect the consumer, all taxis must charge the same fare; secondly, the fare must be set by some authority; and, thirdly, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport had drawn the short straw. We have accepted this—so far—but I would state unequivocally that, if there were true competition between taxi drivers charging different fares, I would have no objection whatsoever to them taking this levy into account when deciding what fare to charge from Heathrow.

[Mr. Mitchell]

That is not the present situation. As I have said, we control taxi fares to protect the consumer. Let us examine the effect that the present tariff has on services at Heathrow. Apparently, hundreds of taxi drivers are willing to queue for several hours for a hiring from the airport. Why? Not all passengers are American tourists or Arab sheikhs, from whom the driver might expect a handsome tip.

The reason is that the fare tariff makes hirings at Heathrow particularly lucrative. That is because the meter rate is increased by 50 per cent. when the journey passes the six-mile mark. That was not an unreasonable provision for the normal taxi driver compelled, say, to take somebody to Bromley or Enfield, from where he was unlikely to get a return fare. Often it is the case that a taxi picks someone up in the middle of London or at a station, takes her or him to whatever the destination may be and there is no fare back. To compensate for that, there was put into the system this 50 per cent. increase.

The increased earnings on the outward journey cover the cost of returning some way towards the central area, where the driver might reasonably expect to get another hire. But this same surcharge applies to hirings at Heathrow airport, most of which leave the cab in the middle of central London, where the driver can immediately be in the best possible position to pick up another hiring. I can see little justification for a tariff structure which inflates the average taxi fare from Heathrow by as much as £3.

To be frank, all the evidence is that Heathrow is highly profitable to the taxi trade. The levy that we are now debating will make a slight impact on its profits, but, so far as I can see, there will still be plenty. I told my hon. Friend when he visited me, together with representatives of one of the London taxi associations, that if this levy gives rise in the longer term to an undersupply of taxis at Heathrow, I shall be willing to reconsider the case for a surcharge on the fare, and I stand by that undertaking.

But tonight I go further. If, in spite of the 50p surcharge, there is still an apparent oversupply of taxis at Heathrow, there would be a strong case for a review of the tariff structure with a view to reducing the excess profitability of providing these services in the circumstances I have described. It does not benefit Heathrow or the passengers who pass through the airport for there to be hundreds of cabs stacked in a feeder park in the central area. It certainly does not improve the availability of taxis in the centre of London.

This matter demonstrates vividly the anomalies that can arise when market forces are suspended in favour of central determination. It is certainly not the wish of this Administration to be in a position of controlling London taxi fares—but while we have this responsibility it is our duty to exercise it in the best interests of the passengers. I therefore thank my hon. Friend for drawing my attention to an anomaly which has previously gone unnoticed in the detailed and complex exercise of determining taxi fares.

I know that my hon. Friend, besides supporting the London taxi trade, is concerned for the welfare of taxi passengers. He will therefore be relieved to know that the dispute is not causing too much inconvenience to those who would normally have chosen to travel by taxi. While I am sure he shares my regret that there should be any inconvenience at all, the majority of such passengers have transferred to other forms of public transport.

Heathrow has particularly good public transport links which include the underground, the airbus, run by LRT, and a minibus service called Airliner, which provides a covenient door-to-door service to and from the airport. In addition, those with heavy luggage or going to destinations that are difficult to reach may telephone for a hire car or taxi to pick them up at the airport.

One often finds when considering a particular case that it is grounded in more general and fundamental issues. As I said in my opening remarks, this apparently detailed matter has caused us to consider two such issues—first, whether costs should be borne as a general tax or should fall on those who benefit, and secondly whether the fare tariff for London taxis should be reviewed in relation to Heathrow.

For the reasons that I have given, our view on the first of those is that such identifiable costs should be borne by those who benefit, not by all airport users. On the second, we are not persuaded of the immediate need to pass this levy on to the passengers, but we shall review the situation with a view to securing an appropriate level of supply of taxis at Heathrow up or down depending upon how the matter develops.

My hon. Friend expressed his anxiety and that of the trade, which he has expressed to me before, about what would happen in the event of the privatisation of Heathrow. The fair trading and competition laws would come into operation. That applies not just in the future but at present. My hon. Friend might like to consider that that might be a more effective way of taking the matter forward than the boycott which is currently losing members of the taxi trade a useful income during the pre-Christmas period.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty five minutes past Twelve o'clock.

House of Commons

Wednesday 18 December 1985

The House met at half-past Two o'clock

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

PRIVATE BUSINESS

PETERHEAD HARBOURS (SOUTH BAY DEVELOPMENT) ORDER CONFIRMATION BILL (By Order)

Order for consideration read.

To be considered upon Thursday 16 January.

Oral Answers to Questions

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Nicaragua

1. Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will seek to pay an official visit to Nicaragua.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Tim Eggar): My right hon. and learned Friend has at present no plans to do so.

Mr. Fraser: In the absence of a visit, what steps are being taken by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office to support stability in Nicaragua so that democracy can flourish? In what strong terms has the Foreign and Commonwealth Office protested to President Reagan about the trade, terrorist and psychological vendetta which is being waged by the United States against that country and which can only bring about the reverse of what the President hopes for?

Mr. Eggar: We want Nicaragua to make progress towards genuine democracy and to end its arms build-up and support for the subversion of its neighbours. We very much regret the recent suspension of civil liberties, which we regard as a step in the wrong direction. United States' policy is a matter for the United States.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: Has my hon. Friend made any representations to the Government of Nicaragua about their outrageous anti-humanitarian action in blocking British helicopters from Nicaraguan air space when they were on their way to give urgently needed relief to the victims of the Colombian earthquake?

Mr. Eggar: My hon. Friend shares widespread concern about this matter. I think that the press reports were based on misunderstanding. There was some difficulty in telephone communications between London and Managua regarding the transit of the helicopters.

Mr. Beith: Will the hon. Gentleman confirm that, in answers to me and to others, he said that the forces were well satisfied with the co-operation that they had received from Nicaraguan authorities with respect to helicopter overflights? How does he envisage the continued American action against Nicaragua helping the essential process of restoring the plural democracy and stability which many people in Nicaragua still believe can be achieved and which were originally part of the objectives of the Nicaraguan revolution?

Mr. Eggar: I confirm the replies that I gave about the helicopters. The Americans continue to support the Contadora process.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels: Is my hon. Friend aware of the daft suggestion of the so-called moderate leader of Haringey council, Councillor Bernie Grant, who said that only Nicaraguan coffee beans could be sold and distributed in the council chamber and around Haringey? Is that not just as daft and offensive as poor old Leicester city council trying to twin with Nicaragua?

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is a bit wide of a visit.

Mr. Eggar: I understand that Haringey council's leader has directed that only Nicaraguan coffee should be drunk in the Haringey civic centre. I understand also that the coffee has a distinctive taste, which may not please the majority of people unless they are used to it. The same could be said about Mr. Bernie Grant.

Mr. Heffer: Does the Minister agree that it is time that the Government, as a friend of the Government of the United States, informed them that Britain believes genuinely in democracy and that they should stop their nonsense in relation to Nicaragua because it is driving that country into the Soviet sphere of influence, which is what happened to Cuba in the past? Will the Americans never learn from their mistakes?

Mr. Eggar: We have our policy with regard to Nicaragua. As I have said, we support the comprehensive and verifiable Contadora agreement, which is based on the 21 Contadora principles. The American Government also support the agreement.

Mr. Foulkes: Does the Minister not see the contradiction in making comments about Nicaragua but refusing to say anything about American policy towards it? Has he noted that President Betancur, who is the architect of Contadora, has said that the greatest single obstacle to achieving peace in central America is continued American support of the Contras? That goes for military as well as financial support. Will the British Government break away from the coat-tails of America for once and condemn financial and military aid to the Contras?

Mr. Eggar: I would listen with a great deal more respect to the hon. Gentleman if he, for once, condemned the recent suspension of civil liberties by the Nicaraguan Government.

South Africa

2. Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will seek to pay an official visit to South Africa.

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Sir Geoffrey Howe): I have at present no plans to visit South Africa.

Mr. Adley: That is a pity, Mr. Speaker. Will my right hon. and learned Friend accept from me that words such as "Parliament", "Government" and "democracy" are an abuse of the English language when applied to a system which excludes the majority of the people from participation therein? May I invite my right hon. and learned Friend to find a form of words to describe accurately a regime which deprives the majority of civil rights, herds them into townships and controls them with armoured vehicles?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have no doubt that my hon. Friend expresses feelings that are shared by many—indeed, by most—British people about the system of apartheid. The task is not to condemn it—which I do unreservedly—but to try to promote constructive steps to bring about its early disappearance.

Mr. Nellist: If the Secretary of State were to make a trip to South Africa, would he be congratulating those responsible for the formation three weeks ago of COSATU—the Congress of South African Trade Unions—and on bringing together 34 non-racial independent trade unions representing about 500,000 black workers and workers of other races in South Africa, or, instead of identifying himself with those who create wealth in South Africa, would he be congratulating firms, such as Consolidated Gold Fields which made a profit of £105 million last year by paying the black miners of South Africa £21 to £25 a week? Which of those two institutions would he be most likely to congratulate?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I should avoid the simplicity of choice which always commends itself to the hon. Gentleman. I would commend those firms which seek to maintain investment and economic activity in South Africa to pay special attention to the European Community's extended code, which encourages them to do more than they have done so far in promoting the rights of black trade unions in South Africa.

Mr. John Carlisle: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that the course of action proposed by Labour Members, and, unfortunately, by some of my misinformed hon. Friends, to engage in dialogue with the African National Council is especially dangerous and foolhardy in the light of recent terrorist killings which have taken place within South Africa's borders? Will he condemn those killings by that terrorist organisation and commend the South Arican Government for their restrained response to these incidents?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: We have already made it clear that we deplore the loss of life arising from the recent land mine incidents. We have always condemned violence as a means of achieving political objectives. A suspension of violence would do much to facilitate the dialogue that we all agree is needed urgently in South Africa. We have made clear to the South African Government our condemnation of all forms of cross-border violence.

Mr. Carter-Jones: Does the Secretary of State agree with the view expressed by the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Adley)? As a young aircrew cadet in 1941, many years ago, I served in South Africa. I assure the right hon. and learned Gentleman that, despite what some of his hon. Friends say, the situation in South Africa now, with pass laws, is more vicious than it was 45 years ago.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have no doubt that the position compared with 45 years ago has deteriorated in a number of respects, because there has been significant political change in South Africa. While making that point, it is also fair to acknowledge that in recent times the South African Government have embarked upon a policy of limited but specific reform, moving in some respects in the right direction. We need to encourage them to proceed at a much faster pace. Our task must be to promote the dialogue that is essential to a peaceful dismantlement of the system of apartheid.

Mr. Bowen Wells: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that once more taking up our position as one of the five countries of the Contact Group that was charged with trying to negotiate a settlement in Namibia would rejuvenate our interest, lead us not to rely solely on American initiatives and put added pressure on the South African Government to enter into a dialogue with the majority populations in both those countries?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I agree with my hon. Friend that, when looking at the larger South African problem, we should not forget the importance of implementing resolution 435 in relation to Namibia. The Contact Group is one organisation that can contribute to that, and so is the American-led negotiating process. It is certainly an objective that I keep firmly in mind.

Mr. Anderson: Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman not recognise the danger to our foreign position of being so isolated and closely identified with the oppressor, the racists and the fat cats in South Africa? Is not the essential hypocrisy of the Government's position shown by the fact that while in international forums they regularly call for the immediate and unconditional release of Nelson Mandela, should that happen tomorrow they would refuse to meet him because he is a member of the ANC?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The hon. Gentleman has a capacity for over-simplifying the most complex questions. There is no doubt that the unconditional release of Nelson Mandela would be a major act of national reconciliation within South Africa, which in turn would be an important step towards a more wide-ranging and peaceful dialogue.

The hon. Gentleman must try to bear in mind that his grotesque misrepresentation of the position of the United Kingdom does nothing but harm, not only to this country's position, but to the possibility of change in South Africa.

Middle East

3. Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps Her Majesty's Government have taken to assess the degree to which the Arab populations of the West Bank and Gaza regard the Palestine Liberation Organisation as their legitimate representatives in any discussions on the future of the middle east; and if he will make a statement.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Tim Renton): During my recent middle east tour I met leading Palestinians from the West Bank and Gaza. They made it clear that the Palestine Liberation Organisation is widely regarded by the local Arab population as its representative.

Mr. Ross: Why then will the Government not take a crucial step and recognise the PLO as the sole, legitimate representative of the aspirations of the Palestinian people by meeting its representatives officially and including them in any further talks on the middle east?

Mr. Renton: As the hon. Gentleman knows, we agreed to the inclusion of two Palestinians in the recent Jordanian-Palestinian delegation that came to London. Unfortunately, in the end, they were not willing to sign the resolution that had been agreed in advance. The question of the recognition of the PLO does not arise, because we recognise states only.

Mr. Sumberg: Will my hon. Friend confirm that unless and until that organisation as a whole—regardless of the views of individual members — renounces terrorism and violence and accepts the right of Israel to exist, there can be no question of any contact or recognition of the PLO by this Government?

Mr. Renton: As I have already said, the question of the recognition of the PLO does not arise. We have urged its leaders to renounce violence and to accept Israel's right to exist within secure and recognised frontiers. It was on that basis that we said we were prepared to meet individual Palestinians who had followed that course.

Mr. Mikardo: Leaving aside the PLO or any other specific organisation, in general is it not nonsense to demand that an organisation, which firmly says that it believes that its problems cannot be solved by negotiation but only by military means, should be brought into negotiations?

Mr. Renton: The hon. Gentleman is simplifying a complex situation in the middle east. The fact is that all those who wish to move the peace process forward recognise that at some stage it will have to involve the Palestinians. A great many Palestinians still regard the PLO as their sole legitimate organisation. It is within that framework that at the moment some middle east leaders are trying to see how the PLO can be associated with discussions.

Mr. Marlow: If the Palestinians are to be criticised for violence and terrorism, should we not likewise criticise the Government of Israel for locking up 12 and 13-year-old children for throwing stones and then not allowing their parents to visit them?

Mr. Renton: We condemn violence and terrorism in the middle east, from whatever side or source it comes.

General Belgrano

4. Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has received concerning the Government's reply to the Foreign Affairs Committee's third report of Session 1984-85 on the events surrounding the weekend of 1 and 2 May 1982.

Mr. Eggar: None, Sir.

Mr. Dalyell: Before putting their signature to their response to the Select Committee's report, did Ministers know of the first and more truthful draft of Sir John Nott's speech on 4 May 1982, talking about "attacking" rather than "detecting"? If they did not know, are we to believe that the efficient civil servants of the Foreign Office did not show it to them, and, if they did know, are they not misleading the Select Committee?

Mr. Latham: Who cares?

Mr. Eggar: As one of the hon. Gentleman's hon. Friends says, "Who cares?". Ministers knew, and the officials did not mislead Ministers.

Sir Anthony Kershaw: Is my hon. Friend aware that if, as a result of the events of 1 and 2 May that year, a big British ship had gone down, which the Argentines were doing their best to effect, he would find it much more difficult to answer this question? Secondly, will he bear in mind that the allegations that the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) has been making are totally disproved by the evidence? Finally, will he do what he can to see that the hon. Gentleman stops making such a thumping ass of himself?

Mr. Eggar: I thank my hon. Friend for his comments. I regret that I and others will probably go on trying to help the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) without success.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Who said "Who cares"?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The Minister referred——

Mr. Speaker: No.

Jordan

5. Mr. Cyril D. Townsend asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he next expects to meet the Jordanian Foreign Minister; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: We remain in close touch with the Jordanian Government, but I have no plans at present for a further meeting with the Jordanian Foreign Minister.

Mr. Townsend: Bearing in mind the real risk that King Hussein has taken in trying to get his peace initiative off the ground in the middle east, what action will the British Government take in the new year to get Israel and the United States fully to support that initiative and the concept of exchanging territory for proper peace?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: My hon. Friend rightly identifies the principles upon which progress must be built in the Arab-Israel conflict. He is also right to identify the immense value of the constructive efforts of King Hussein over a long time to achieve progress in that direction. We shall continue to give our fullest support to his efforts, with the United States and other countries.

Mr. Anderson: The Foreign Secretary will know that last week President Mubarak said that the past six months of the peace process have been wasted, and that trying to solve the problem and at the same time trying to ignore the PLO would never lead to a comprehensive peace? Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman accept that view?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: Sadly, the past six months have not seen as much progress as I personally would have hoped towards a possible solution of the problem. That is why we gave as much support as we could to the efforts of King Hussein during that period. We extended our invitation to the joint Jordanian-Palestinian delegation to come here because we have always recognised that the PLO should be associated with negotiations, provided that it renounces violence and is committed to a peaceful settlement along familiar lines.

Mr. Walters: Is any progress being made towards an international conference, as proposed by King Hussein? Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that such a conference, involving the Soviet Union, the United States and the parties directly involved, such as the Palestinians, is the best hope of making some progress?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I agree that support for initiatives towards a peaceful settlement, from whichever side they come, should be as broadly based as possible. An international conference might well help in that direction. That is why I am glad that Mr. Peres, the Prime Minister of Israel, made clear to the United Nations his understanding of the need for such an international framework. He has that in common with my hon. Friend and King Hussein.

Israel

6. Mr. Mikardo asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on his recent visit to Israel.

Mr. Renton: I visited Israel from 12 to 16 December. In my talks there I had a useful exchange of views on bilateral matters and regional and international issues. I also met Palestinians from the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

Mr. Mikardo: I am grateful to the Minister for that statement. During his discussions, did he get any information that he can share with the House about private or public talks between Israelis and Jordanians, and did he draw any conclusions from that information favourable to the furtherance in the near future of the peace process?

Mr. Renton: The hon. Gentleman will accept that if I had private information on that subject during the talks I would not be able to share it with him, much as I would like to do so. It is well known that a great many discussions are going on between capitals in the middle east. It is generally accepted that impetus must be given to the peace process if there is to be progress towards a just and comprehensive settlement.

Mr. Nelson: Will my hon. Friend lend his support, as others have done, to the current rapprochement between Syria and Jordan? Will he lend his weight to ensuring that any direct negotiations between the states of Israel and Jordan, or indirectly through the medium of an international peace process, are enhanced rather than detracted from by any such new axis?

Mr. Renton: When in Damascus, where I met President Assad, I had an opportunity to talk about the new rapprochement between Jordan and Syria with him and with Vice President Haddam. This is a new development in the middle east scene and I strongly hope that it will have a successful influence in advancing the peace process. It is too early to say whether it will go in precisely the manner in which my hon. Friend suggests, but it is noticeable that Syria is now showing considerable interest in playing a part in the peace process.

Mr. Faulds: Would it not be advantageous to the peace process in the middle east, which Chairman Arafat is assiduously trying to pursue, if the Foreign Secretary were to convince the United States Government to abandon their commitment to the Kissinger promise, given at the insistence of Israel, that the US would not accept the PLO? Would it not help the whole peace process if the Foreign Secretary could urge the US Government to overcome, by whatever means are feasible, the intellectual limitations of the President's comprehension of anything and everything?

Mr. Renton: I find that comprehensive endorsement of Mr. Arafat's stance rather surprising. President Mubarak and King Hussein, especially the latter, have asked Mr. Arafat to make specific declarations on United Nations resolutions about Israel's right to exist within secure frontiers, but Mr. Arafat has not yet made any. Until he adopts a far clearer position in that context, he cannot expect to receive any wider international recognition.

Middle East

7. Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will make a further statement on the peace process in the middle east.

15. Mr. Temple-Morris asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on progress being made towards peace in the middle east.

Mr. Renton: We shall continue to support all realistic efforts towards a negotiated settlement of the Arab-Israeli dispute leading to a just and comprehensive peace. It is encouraging that both King Hussein and Mr. Peres have spoken of the possibility of an international framework for peace negotiations.

Mr. Latham: Will not the welcome visit to this country next month of Mr. Peres greatly strengthen British-Israeli relations, and thereby improve our standing in the peace process negotiations? Will my hon. Friend take the opportunity to improve the atmosphere in advance of the meeting by announcing that the practice by which the Foreign Office countersigns Arab trade boycott documents will be dropped immediately?

Mr. Renton: I agree with my hon. Friend in welcoming Mr. Peres' visit to this country next month. It should be an important step in the development of bilateral relations between this country and Israel. On the practice of authentication, which is a standard legal procedure, it does not imply in any way approval of the contents of the documents, because our opposition to the Arab boycott is well known. Furthermore, the vast majority of British firms use the Arab-British chamber of commerce for that purpose.

Mr. Temple-Morris: Does my hon. Friend agree that following the recent Geneva summit, where we hope greater understanding was reached on the question of regional conflicts—I repeat the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Westbury (Mr. Walters)—the only realistic way towards peace in the middle east is through an international conference, the results of which must be guaranteed by both the United States of America and the Soviet Union?

Mr. Renton: My right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary has already commented on an international conference in answer to an earlier question. We have never opposed the principle of an international conference, but we want to see that its framework is properly set up and its agenda well drawn so that it has a chance to succeed and to reach positive conclusions. The framework of the conference at present, which includes who should be represented at it, and how it should reach its decisions, or whether it should be merely for discussions, is one of the main subjects under discussion in the middle east at present.

Mr. Cartwright: Will the Minister confirm that there cannot be any lasting settlement in the middle east which does not recognise the simple fact that the Palestinians are just as entitled to a national homeland as any other people on the face of the earth? Will he take every opportunity of making that simple fact clear in his contacts with the Governments of the United States of America and Israel?

Mr. Renton: We have always maintained the right of the Palestinians to self-determination, and we are concerned about their present conditions in some of the occupied territories. I noted some of them myself when I went to the Gaza Strip at the end of last week. I expressed my deep concern to many leading Israelis about the economic conditions and the difficulties of Palestinians in moving towards self-sufficiency.

Mr. Deakins: What is the Government's attitude to the future of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip?

Mr. Renton: As I have just said in reply to the hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright), we have always recognised the right of Palestinians to self-determination. We accept the principles that have been suggested, for example by King Hussein, to the effect that a form of association with Jordan may be one possibility. However, at the end of the day it must be for the people who live in those lands with their Arab neighbours to work out the right association and framework for themselves.

Mr. Soames: When Mr. Peres comes here next month, will my hon. Friend ensure that he leaves in no doubt the grave anxiety that many of us have about the continuing colonisation of the West Bank?

Mr. Renton: I understand what my hon. Friend says. It fits in with the reply that I have just given to Opposition Members. On my visit to Jerusalem a few days ago I took the opportunity to make clear the anxiety that was expressed to me by leading Palestinians in Jerusalem about the extremely difficult economic conditions, which I saw in Gaza, that many Palestinians suffer at present.

Mr. Janner: Reverting to the Government's authentication of Arab boycott documents, does the Minister not understand that what he calls a standard legal procedure, which is used to justify or in any way to place a seal of approval on an unacceptable practice—in this case, a restriction on the freedom of trade—is unacceptable, if not illegal? Was that not made plain to him when he recently visited Israel?

Mr. Renton: On the hon. and learned Gentleman's second point, the matter was not once raised with me while I was in Israel. On his first point, I should tell him that all that happens is the authentication of signatures. It does not imply approval of the documents' contents or of the boycott. Our opposition to the boycott is well known.

Mr. Baldry: Does my hon. Friend agree that the best chance for an international conference to succeed would be if it was held under the auspices of the United Nations? Will the Government use their position as a member of the Security Council to seek opportunities to initiate moves in the United Nations towards long-term peace in the middle east?

Mr. Renton: Much as I share my hon. Friend's desire for moves towards long-term peace in the middle east, I am not certain that it is for Britain at this stage to take the initiative in the United Nations for bringing about such a conference. That must rest, above all, with the parties to the dispute in the middle east. Furthermore, I am not wholly convinced that a conference at the United Nations, with many nations attending, would be successful. It is not always the case that the more people who are at a conference, the greater is its chance of success. Often, it is the other way round.

Stockholm Conference

8. Mr. James Lamond asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he is satisfied with progress at the Stockholm conference on security in Europe.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: There has been welcome progress on procedural matters, with agreement on an informal working structure, which has narrowed the focus of the conference considerably. Progress on substance has proved harder to achieve.

Mr. Lamond: In view of the Soviet acceptance of the United States' idea of annual advance notice of military manoeuvres by the Warsaw pact and NATO and its suggestion that it should be extended to air and sea manoeuvres, is there not an opportunity, before the better atmosphere created by the Geneva summit disappears entirely, for us to take an initiative at Stockholm and try to press home the view that a good document should be presented to the world at the end of the conference?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: We shall try to achieve a document that contains specific commitments to adopt confidence-building measures, including those relating to land manoeuvres. If one goes beyond that into sea manoeuvres, one is in danger of going outside the terms of reference of the conference. But we all agree on the need to achieve practical progress on confidence-building measures.

Mr. Forman: Will my right hon. and learned Friend give some other examples of areas of substantial progress to which the Government attach importance? What are the realistic chances of their being achieved at Stockholm?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: Our proposals include provision for an exchange of information about the structure and deployment of military forces, the mandatory observation of regular military activities, site inspection and improved communications between states. They are examples of specific measures which can be agreed within the terms of reference. Progress on such matters would represent a worthwhile achievement after the great deal of work put into the Stockholm conference.

Mr. Healey: Although I welcome what the Foreign Secretary said about progress, at least on the procedural aspect of the discussions, does the right hon. and learned Gentleman agree that, as both sides have agreed that there should be contact between the military staffs of the two alliances in limited areas, and since Secretary Weinberger has already proposed a regular exchange of views between the American and Soviet military authorities on problems of European security, the Government should now press NATO to invite the Warsaw pact to a general exchange of views on achieving security for both parts of Europe through co-operation rather than confrontation?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: We all share the aim of achieving improved prospects for peace through co-operation and consultation. However, I hesitate to follow the right hon. Gentleman in calling for yet another framework within which such consultation should be conducted. There is no shortage of forums or frameworks, but there has been a shortage of progress. I am glad that Britain has put forward a significant and worthwhile proposal for progress in the MBFR negotiations, which is another example of where we are trying to make headway.

South Africa

9. Mr. Bowen Wells asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment his Department has made of the implications for its foreign policy generally of Her Majesty's Government's refusal to impose full economic sanctions on South Africa.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Malcolm Rifkind): The South African issue has wide implications for foreign policy as a whole and we have, therefore, maintained close consultation with other Governments. We are party to common statements of policy, both with our European Community and our Commonwealth partners, which stop short of the imposition of full economic sanctions.

Mr. Wells: Will my hon. and learned Friend confirm that if we are not able to make progress in South Africa over the next six months, and if we do not go along with further sanctions being demanded by our Commonwealth friends, we shall be subject to discrimination by those Commonwealth countries against our own trade?

Mr. Rifkind: There have been differences of view on this subject for many years, and I emphasise that the opposition of Her Majesty's Government to mandatory economic sanctions against South Africa is a view shared not only by the United States but by almost the entire European Community and most of the other countries of western Europe. We are not alone in our view of the matter.

Mr. Caborn: What actions have been taken on the sanctions to which the British Government agreed through the EEC and Commonwealth conferences? We are led to believe that there have been no restrictions on imports of Krugerrands, and that the withdrawing of military attachés, which is part of the EEC agreement, has not been done. How effective have any sanctions to date been, because many people are saying that the Government are bringing us into disrepute in the international community by not even implementing, in the Prime Minister's words, the "teeny weeny" sanctions agreed at the Commonwealth conference?

Mr. Rifkind: The hon. Gentleman is incorrect in part of his question. The withdrawal of military attachés from European countries is not part of the Luxembourg package, although it is under consideration. The South African Government have stopped minting Krugerrands, and there has been no market in Krugerrands for a considerable time.

Mr. Forth: Has my hon. and learned Friend's Department made any estimate of the potential effect on employment in both this country and South Africa if full mandatory economic sanctions were ever applied?

Mr. Rifkind: It is difficult to make a precise estimate, but it is known that there are at least 150,000 black South Africans employed by British companies in South Africa, and there have been estimates of up to 50,000 British jobs that could be directly or indirectly affected by a policy of sanctions.

Mr. Spearing: Is it not a fact that Her Majesty's Government are still not in conversation with the African National Congress? Is the Minister aware that a week ago, in front of the Select Committee, the Foreign Secretary said that he did not know whether the United States was in direct conversation with the ANC? Does he know, and if so, will he tell us?

Mr. Rifkind: I have no reason to believe that the United States Government have been in contact with the ANC.

Mr. Hill: Is my hon. and learned Friend aware that many Conservative Members realise that economic sanctions against South Africa would have enormous reverberations throughout British industry? I make this point in particular in relation to the port of Southampton, where the dockers are still working the South African marine trade because that represents one third of their container traffic. If the Government change their course on economic sanctions, many will be unemployed.

Mr. Rifkind: My hon. Friend is right to draw attention to that aspect of the debate about economic sanctions. The Government's opposition to economic sanctions is partly for the reason set out by my hon. Friend and also because we do not believe that such a policy would succeed in achieving the fundamental and peaceful change that we all wish to see in South Africa.

Mr. Healey: Is the Minister aware that members of the State Department have been in continual contact with members of the ANC, and that such contacts took place in the recent visit of Mr. Chester Crocker to Lusaka? Why has the Foreign Secretary refused to allow the British Foreign Office the same freedom to investigate the situation as is allowed by the American Secretary of State to the American State Department?

Mr. Rifkind: We have always emphasised that we look forward to the day when the African National Congress will renounce a policy of violence. We believe that the Commonwealth initiative, agreed at Nassau, which called for dialogue between black and white South Africans in the context of a suspension of violence on both sides, ought to be an incentive to the African National Congress as well as to the South African Government to desist from any acts of violence, in the interests of reconciliation.

Mr. Beith: What incentives are the British Government giving to the South African Government to respond at all to the Commonwealth initiative, since they know that even if the initiative is a failure there will be no escalation whatsoever of sanctions by the British Government? Is it not a relief that at least the banks, on commercial grounds, are prepared to impose economic sanctions on South Africa?

Mr. Rifkind: I must point out to the hon. Gentleman that the South African Government have already said that they are prepared to consider contacts with the Commonwealth group that was set up at the Nassau summit. That is an encouraging sign. We believe that the Commonwealth group, which includes representatives from all sections of the Commonwealth, could make an important impact in persuading all parties, including the South African Government, of the need for very early dialogue and reconciliation in that country.

10. Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the latest representations by Her Majesty's Government to the South African authorities on developments in that country.

Mr. Rifkind: On 11 November we participated in a demarche on behalf of the 12 European Community countries expressing to the South African Government our deep concern about restrictions imposed on the press, violent police methods of riot control and the continuing arrests of political and trade union leaders. On 3 December we issued a statement about the killings at Mamelodi, in which we called for a full inquiry.

Mr. Winnick: Is the Minister of State aware that we welcome the fact that at least one or two Tory Members of Parliament are speaking out on this issue, unlike the hon. Member for Luton, North (Mr. Carlisle) and one or two others, who seem to act in the House of Commons as representatives of the South African Government? When will the Minister realise that only when sanctions are applied by this country and by our partners in the European Community will the South African authorities understand that we are serious in opposing their vile system of government in that country?

Mr. Rifkind: I am not sure why the hon. Gentleman always insists upon attributing bad faith to everybody except himself. He ought to realise that people can honestly hold different opinions from his own without justifying the rather nasty comments that he insists upon making on every occasion. As for sanctions, the hon. Gentleman must appreciate that there is a common desire to see peaceful, fundamental change in South Africa, but there is a genuine difference of view as to whether mandatory sanctions would bring it about.

Sir Peter Blaker: Does my hon. and learned Friend agree that if there is to be any chance of achieving a solution to the problems of South Africa which is fair to all races in that country and which does not involve immense bloodshed, it will be by encouraging a dialogue between the people of South Africa? Does he further agree that it is at least not self-evident that economic sanctions are likely to achieve that process?

Mr. Rifkind: Not only is it not self-evident, but we know from experience that whenever a policy of mandatory economic sanctions has been applied it has conspicuously failed to achieve even a limited degree of success.

Mr. Pike: Bearing in mind that all methods, over many years, to try to persuade the South African Government to end their abhorrent policy of apartheid have failed, should not the Government be saying that now is the time to introduce economic sanctions? Should we not take an example from the history of this country and remember the deprivation that was suffered in the cotton textile industry when efforts were made to end slavery in America?

Mr. Rifkind: I must emphasise to the hon. Gentleman that a slow but definite process of reform has begun in South Africa. For example, a recommendation has been made by the President's Council that the pass laws should be repealed. If, as is widely expected, the South African Government endorse that recommendation it will represent a fundamental move in the right direction. It is exactly reforms of that kind that we should be encouraging.

Mr. Andrew MacKay: Does my hon. and learned Friend agree that while it is helpful to make strong and constructive representations to the South African Government, experience shows that mandatory economic sanctions are completely counter-productive and only do damage to this country?

Mr. Rifkind: My hon. Friend is right to draw attention to that fact. Many of those who call for economic sanctions emphasise their view that it would be worth making a short sacrifice of a few months, or even a year or so, to achieve the end of apartheid. The sad fact, as we saw in Rhodesia, is that even after 15 years it was not economic sanctions that brought about change in that country.

Iran-Iraq War

11. Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assurances of the prospect of a peaceful settlement of the Iran-Iraq war were given to him by the Iraqi Foreign Minister during his visit.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The Iraqi Deputy Prime Minister and Foreign Minister gave clear assurances during his discussions in London with my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and myself that Iraq was seeking a peaceful settlement of the conflict and remained ready to negotiate with Iran.

Dr. McDonald: Did the right hon. and learned Gentleman take the opportunity of those discussions to raise two issues with the Iraqi Deputy Prime Minister and Foreign Minister: first, the fact that Iraq will no longer be a safe haven for terrorists such as Abu Nidal; and, secondly, the question of the continued oppression and torture by Iraq of its citizens?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: In the course of the meetings that the Iraqi Foreign Minister had in this country, the first issue was certainly raised, both specifically and generally. In addition, I assure the hon. Lady that the Government are always concerned about violations of human rights and that the Iraqi Government are fully aware of our close concern with that matter. That was reaffirmed during the visit of Mr. Tariq Aziz to this country.

Mr. Temple-Morris: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that an end to this detestable war depends far more on Iran than it does on Iraq? Will he explain how he can justify his sanction of the export of Chieftain tank engines for use by the armed services of Iran in this war?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I assure my hon. Friend that the Government are conscious of the need to maintain our policy of supplying to neither side any defence equipment that would significantly enhance the capability of either side to prolong or exacerbate the conflict. Very little equipment of any sort—except some vehicle spares that were supplied under an old pre-revolutionary contract—has been sold recently to Iran.

British Council

13. Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent representations he has received concerning the budget of the British Council; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: We have received representations from the council itself.

Mr. Freud: Will the Minister explain why the British Council, of all overseas organisations, has been singled out for punitive cuts of 20 per cent.? Has he presented to the Treasury the British Council's claim for an extension of activities to Indonesia and China? Why is his Department so publicly supportive of the British Council but will not fight for it in private?

Mr. Eggar: We cannot anticipate the publication of the public expenditure White Paper for next year. We have taken on board the representations that the council has made to us about Indonesia and China. We are extremely conscious of the good work that the British Council does, but it cannot be exempt from public expenditure restrictions.

Sir Anthony Kershaw: Does my hon. Friend agree that it would be a good idea to have a thorough going review of the value of cultural diplomacy to British policy abroad?

Mr. Eggar: We have that matter under consideration.

Mr. George Robertson: May we be assured that the Government will not hide behind the transfer of funds from UNESCO membership to aspects of the British Council's work and will face the real obligation to increase the amount of mixed money in the British Council's budget? Is the hon. Gentleman aware that only by expanding that budget will the British Council be able to do the highly important job of promoting Britain abroad, a task which he and the House know the council does extremely well?

Mr. Eggar: The whole House recognises the extremely valuable work that the British Council does. UNESCO money will be independent of any other settlement made with the British Council for the next year.

United Kingdom High Commissions and Embassies

14. Mr. Nicholas Baker asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he is satisfied with the commercial performance of high commissions, and embassies of the United Kingdom abroad.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: Yes, Sir. The promotion and protection of British commercial interests, employing about a third of our front line manpower overseas, is highly valued by the business community. About 90,000 British business men are in touch each year with embassies, high commissions and subordinate posts during overseas visits. Market information inquiries have risen nearly 40 per cent. since 1979.

Mr. Baker: I thank my right hon. and learned Friend for that answer. Will he accept that some business men tell me that the performance of our embassies and high commissions abroad is variable? Will he do what he can to get more business men to come into the diplomatic service to work in our embassies and high commissions and will he try to improve the industrial experience that our diplomats receive?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: Every organisation is capable of improvement. We operate an interchange of staff with the private industrial and commercial sector, necessarily on a modest scale. All officers who take up such commercial appointments for the first time attend a course to qualify them, to which contributions are made by private firms and trade. We recognise the need to do all that we can in that direction.

The tributes paid to the service far outweigh the complaints. All complaints are investigated and we welcome contructive criticism. In the 12 months to the end of October this year six complaints were received, but there were over 300 tributes. That is a fair balance.

Mr. Pavitt: Will the Foreign Secretary publish in the Official Report the excellent results obtained by the high commission in Jamaica? Will he commend the high commissioner for his efforts in all trading aspects between the United Kingdom and Kingston?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I shall certainly record the hon. Gentleman's view. It is right that such a tribute should be passed to those concerned.

Viscount Cranborne: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that part of the answer is in the hands of the business men themselves? Does he further agree that when contrasted with the efforts of many of our competitors, particularly the Japanese, British business marketing efforts abroad tend to be rather pathetic?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: It is not my function to endorse such a general condemnation, but I agree that the job of selling has to be done by business men. The diplomatic and commercial services can play only a supportive role. The private sector has a crucial part to play for itself.

Mr. Foulkes: Will the Foreign Secretary confirm that our embassy in Santiago is doing nothing to promote the sale of Centaur armed vehicles to that repressive regime and that no export licences will be granted for any further vehicles?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: Our embassy in Santiago is following the policy clearly laid down to offer no arms sales in support of the repressive measures in that country.

Nuclear Test Ban Treaty

16. Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what consultations he has had with experts in the field of seismology on the verification of a nuclear test ban treaty.

Mr. Renton: The United Kingdom's contribution to the work of the conference on disarmament on the verification of a nuclear test ban treaty draws upon advice from seismologists employed by the Ministry of Defence. In addition, officials are regularly in touch with seismologists outside the Government services; for example, United Kingdom experts have participated in the ad hoc group of scientific experts under the auspices of the conference on disarmament, which includes representatives from a variety of countries, including the USA and the USSR.

Mr. Strang: Will the Minister have the honesty to admit that the technology is now available to detect nuclear explosions down to the militarily significant level of one kiloton? Is it not a fact that before the breakdown of the last comprehensive test ban treaty negotiations the Soviet Union agreed to the placement of seismic stations on its territory?

Mr. Renton: It is a question not of honesty, but of a great number of scientologists—[Interruption.]—sorry, seismologists. As the House will know, the headquarters of scientology is in my constituency. The opinion of many seismologists—some employed by the Government but many not, some British and many international—is that the question of verification is not yet solved. Furthermore, it is inaccurate to claim that the 1977 to 1980 trilateral negotiations, to which the hon. Gentleman referred, were near completion. There were many practical aspects, including verification, on which agreement had not been achieved at the time the negotiations ceased.

Mr. Forman: Is my hon. Friend aware that many laymen who support the objective of a comprehensive test ban treaty are beginning to feel that the scientific community in more than one country is merely putting up obstacles to the reasonable proposals made recently. Will he seek to give the idea a greater political push?

Mr. Renton: I listened to what my hon. Friend says with great care, but the fact of the matter is that this is an area where it is essential that there should be not only verification measures that work but confidence on both sides that the verification is working. If there were to be non-compliance and that was not verified, it could lead to a breach in our national security, which would have serious consequences.

Mr. Healey: Is the Minister aware that the diplomatic correspondent of the Daily Telegraph, who has always proved a most reliable conduit for Foreign Office news, recently stated that there was now no scientific obstacle to verification and that the only obstacle was political, by which he meant the toadying of the Prime Minister to President Reagan? Therefore, will the Government support the early recalling of the conference on a comprehensive test ban agreement, since the Prime Minister herself said that she greatly regretted its being broken off last time?

Mr. Renton: I well realise from previous exchanges that the right hon. Gentleman is setting himself up as an amateur seismologist, but he is not much better as a seismologist than he was as an economist. The fact of the matter remains, as I have said before, that there is a genuine and serious division of scientific opinion. We have suggested that a committee should be formed at the conference on disarmament at which detailed questions about verification could be studied, and it is a matter of regret to us that the Soviet Union has not accepted that suggestion and has not moved forward with it.

Mr. Dalyell: On a point of order arising directly out of questions, Mr. Speaker. The Under-Secretary clearly said earlier that it was one of my hon. Friends who said, "Who cares?". In fact, it was none of my hon. Friends; it was his hon. Friend the Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Latham). I wonder whether that could be put right. In answer to the substantive question, the people who care are those who care that the House of Commons should be told the truth.

Mr. Latham: I readily confirm that that is correct, Mr. Speaker. Had you permitted an interruption earlier I would have said so then. It was I who made that comment.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sure that Hansard will have noted that exchange.

Mr. Dalyell: Further to my point of order, Mr. Speaker. It is not for the hon. Gentleman to apologise; it is for the Minister who used——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I cannot be responsible for that. It will be noted.

Mr. Marlow: On a point of order arising out of questions, Mr. Speaker. It is only a small point of order, but I am asking you for your help and assistance. You may remember that in distant days gone by we used to have European questions for 20 minutes. There are some 20 questions on European issues on the Order Paper today. Europe is responsible for our agriculture policy, for our trade policy and for a growing basket of other policies. It is only right and proper that we should have the ability, not just to question the Foreign Secretary after Council meetings, but to ask substantive questions on the subject. I wonder whether anything can be done about that.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I seem to remember that in the not too distant past there were exchanges about this and it was agreed through the usual channels that EC questions should go in with foreign affairs questions. If the hon. Gentleman wishes to have that changed, his right course would be to talk to the Leader of the House.

Mr. Dalyell rose——

Mr. Caborn: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I should like your guidance and perhaps some information on a question on the Order Paper. Has there been a request from the Secretary of State for Transport to make a statement on——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have not had that, but it does not arise directly out of questions today.

Mr. Dalyell: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Very honourably and truthfully the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Latham) admitted that he was responsible. I would not pursue the matter further, but it would be gracious of the Minister to at least admit that he made a mistake; no doubt a genuine mistake, but, nevertheless, a mistake. Would it not be nice if Ministers were a little gracious?

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is very nearly Christmas.

Mr. Eggar: If it helps the hon. Gentleman, I apologise. I did mishear; the comment came from another direction. I apologise.

Foreign Affairs Council

3.34 pm

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Sir Geoffrey Howe): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement about the meetings of Community Foreign Ministers that took place in Brussels on 16 and 17 December. I took part in the meeting of the Intergovernmental Conference which finished at midday yesterday. My right hon. Friend the Minister for Trade and the United Kingdom Permanent Representative represented the United Kingdom at the subsequent meeting of the Foreign Affairs Council.

The Foreign Affairs Council discussed Commission proposals for a negotiating mandate on the renewal of the multi-fibre arrangement. Further discussions will take place at the Foreign Affairs Council in January.

Ministers also reviewed progress in negotiations to adapt the EC-EFTA agreements to take account of enlargement.

The Ministers of the Ten as well as Spain and Portugal issued a statement on East-West relations following the meeting between President Reagan and Secretary-General Gorbachev in Geneva. A copy of the statement is being placed in the Library of the House.

The Council considered a draft regulation adapting the regional fund to take account of the enlargement of the Community. The new regulation should be ready for adoption in the near future.

Following discussion at the European Council it was agreed to set up a committee of scientific experts to recommend co-ordinated action to combat cancer.

The Intergovernmental Conference completed its work. Discussion centred on those points which, following the decisions taken at the European Council, required clarification or further work.

We agreed the political co-operation treaty, with a small secretariat, on the lines that the United Kingdom proposed before Milan. We reached agreement upon the framework in which to set the political co-operation treaty and the amendments to the EC treaty in a way which preserves the juridical separation between the European Community treaties and the political co-operation Treaty. We achieved the necessary clarifications on the internal market and the European Parliament to complete the agreement reached without affecting the substance of what was agreed by the Heads of Government in Luxembourg.

The Italian and Danish Governments continue to have overall reserves on all the texts. The United Kingdom maintained its reserve on the text on the working environment. The Presidency will now collate the texts that have been under discussion for examination by the official group of legal and linguistic experts. I will, of course, make the texts available to the House as soon as we have them in final form.

The changes agreed represent worthwhile improvements in the operation of the Community. The agreements to complete the common market by 1992, to speed up decision-taking, to strengthen our co-operation in foreign policy and to ensure that our efforts in research and development are geared to the exploitation of a growing market will help to achieve objectives that we have consistently pursued. We welcome this as a useful step forward for the Community. The agreements now reached are, of course, subject to the approval of national Parliaments.

Mr. George Robertson (Hamilton): It is clear from that statement how little the whole treaty amendment exercise has achieved in reality. Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman agree that, compared with the fanfares and rhetoric which began the discussions, what has emerged is a pretty feeble pile of paper? If this is history, it is historic only in the sheer time taken to do so little for so many of Europe's people. With more than 15 million jobless in Europe, the Community budget facing disaster yet again and the regional and social funds locked up, is the right hon. and learned Gentleman aware how sad it is that the treaty amendments are so profoundly irrelevant to Europe's real problems?

Why are the British Government, alone among the 10 nations in the Community, still holding out against encouraging improved standards of health and safe working conditions for workers? Why does this country always take the worst of the Community and reject the best?

Now that the right hon. and learned Gentleman has agreed to the new treaty on foreign policy co-operation, what have his colleagues in Brussels had to say about Britain's disgraceful decision to leave UNESCO against the unanimous advice of our European partners?

Article 1 of the Luxembourg summit communiqué on the obscure subject of "cohesion" says that the Community will "reduce disparities between various regions".

How is that to be done with the freezing of the social and regional funds and the losses that this country will suffer as a result? On radio yesterday the Prime Minister spoke about her view of the European Community being pragmatic and based on what it can do for Britain. How can we benefit if the present financial shambles in Europe continues?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: When he asks questions on a topic of this kind the hon. Gentleman portrays a wide and superficial knowledge but with very little insight.

On political co-operation, the hon. Gentleman may be surprised to learn that UNESCO was not mentioned once in the last two days. Our position in relation to the proposal for the adoption of regulations affecting health and safety in the working environment consists simply in our belief that that should be subject to a provision for unanimity, at least in respect of firms of small and medium size. It is necessary to proceed with the utmost care when imposing obligations, even of the most benign kind, on small and medium sized firms if one is not to damage employment —the very thing about which we are all concerned.

As to the treaty amendments, I find it very difficult to judge whether the hon. Gentleman's position is to regret the fact that the conference achieved such a small range of treaty amendments or that it took place at all. We recognised the case for progress in the Community and believe that that could have been done without the Intergovernmental Conference. We are glad that it has now been done with that conference. It would be nice to hear something welcomed by the Opposition.

Sir Frederic Bennett (Torbay): On political collaboration, can one assume that the conference greeted the decision by the five countries—including the Socialist Governments of France and Sweden — to cease their prosecution of Turkey for breaches of human rights in view of progress towards democracy in that country? Does that open the door to further economic and political collaboration between the EEC countries and Turkey?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: My right hon. Friend will appreciate that Sweden was not represented at the proceedings yesterday, but he is right to draw attention to the importance of the decision reached by the five complainant Governments to bring to a conclusion the civil rights proceedings against Turkey. That is a recognition of the progress that has been made in that direction in Turkey, and I hope that it will open the way to similar moves within the European Community.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): As the Foreign Secretary has declared himself in favour of Euro-activity and against Euro-pessimism, does he recognise that some majority voting, a stronger Parliament and enlarged regional and social funds are all essential if we are to tackle problems in the Community such as the CAP that cause its unpopularity among some sections in Britain?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: We have certainly been in favour of extending the opportunity for the Parliament to play a constructive role in the Community while reserving the last word to the Council, and that has been achieved. We are certainly in favour of the extended use of majority voting, particularly when that can promote the more effective application of a single internal market, while proper attention is paid to important national interests. There is something to be said for looking favourably at the scope and scale of activity in the regional and social funds, but that can be sensibly achieved only within a framework of effective budget discipline and, above all, effective control of the previously burgeoning expenditure on the CAP. That decision does not require treaty changes but a sustained application of political will—[Interruption.]— and in support of that determination by the Government I am always delighted to have the enthusiastic commitment of my hon. Friends on the Back Benches.

Mr. Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): Despite the welcome lack of progress on the undermining of the veto, is it true that the Secretary of State has agreed the European Act, whose preamble describes the ultimate aim of member states as being European union and commits Britain to the formal objective of realising that goal in a new treaty article? Why on earth did the Secretary of State agree to those silly words when the Prime Minister has made it abundantly clear that Britain does not support all this nonsense?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am dismayed that my hon. Friend, with his sophisticated insight into these matters, should be so preoccupied with that misconception. The title of the European Act, which brings together the two treaties agreed yesterday, explicitly avoids reference to European union. The references in the text are to "complete progress towards our agreed goal"——

Mr. Teddy Taylor: That is the preamble.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The agreed text includes the preamble to which I am referring. The goal that has been agreed is ever closer agreement between the peoples of Europe. As we signed the treaty in 1957, my hon. Friend must catch up with that. I made it clear yesterday, as British Governments have done on many occasions, that union in the sense envisaged in the treaty is a continuing process. It was agreed that we should not speak of the establishment of a European union. Even my hon. Friend cannot ask for a better outcome.

Mr. James Lamond (Oldham, Central and Royton): Did the right hon. and learned Gentleman have the opportunity to have a few words with the negotiators on the multi-fibre arrangement, whose mandate was renewed, to tell them that employers and unions alike in the textile and clothing industry are worried because of the story that the civil servants who are negotiating are pressing hardest for a liberal regime in the coming MFA? That is contrary to the impression given in debate in the House a few months ago. The right hon. and learned Gentleman said that he was concerned about jobs and small businesses being destroyed. Is he aware that the jobs of many tens of thousands of workers in this industry will be in jeopardy unless there is proper control of clothing and textile imports?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: My right hon. Friend the Minister for Trade adhered firmly throughout yesterday's discussion and the discussion on the MFA to the line that he outlined in the Hou[illegible] on 9 May this year. He made it plain then that a renewed MFA is bound to be more liberal in some respects if it is to afford improvements in access to the European markets of the poorest developing countries. That wish is expressed and supported by both sides of the House, not least by the Labour party. The Community has to balance liberal opportunities for textile industries in the Third world with sensible safeguards for Britain's textile industry. That is the objective set by my right hon. Friend the Minister for Trade. It is a difficult objective to achieve, but he will stick at it.

Sir Anthony Meyer (Clwyd, North-West): Is it not clear that the only hope for advance in British industry, especially British aerospace, lies in closer co-operation with a completed Common Market? Should not my right hon. and learned Friend sweep aside considerations of ideological purity and throw his weight firmly in favour of a European solution to the Westland problem?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I agree that it is important in every context to take account of the advantages that can be secured by effective co-operation on a European scale. It is not for me to sweep aside any considerations of ideological purity in the decision that must be taken by Westland.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): The right hon. and learned Gentleman has stated that he expects any treaty to amend the treaty of Rome to be ratified by an Act of Parliament. Does he have any thoughts on the method of ratification for a possible treaty on political co-operation?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: A distinction must be drawn— as the hon. Gentleman well appreciates with his expert knowledge on this matter — between the provisions amending the European Community treaty and the political co-operation treaty. The political co-operation treaty is not, of course, part of Community law. It does not require legislation in the United Kingdom, but the House will have a full opportunity to consider it.

Mr. Eric Forth (Mid-Worcestershire): What improvements does my right hon. and learned Friend expect in the speed and quality of Community decision taking if there is a greater involvement of the European Parliament?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: To improve the consultation procedure, we want to make it more possible for the European Parliament to make an effective contribution without extending the process. A clear time limit is provided for in the proposed treaty change. If a procedure fails to come to a conclusion, the proposal will lapse. This is similar to the way in which we handle matters in the House. The Presidency is committed to reviewing speedily at the beginning of next year the Council's internal procedures to deal with First reading provisions in the same way.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman be kind enough to tell us whether his attitude would change if the Italian Government were to veto the existing arrangement? Would he then be prepared to see a faster move towards closer union, or are Her Majesty's Government to stay with the existing position, where they appear to have tried to give away the veto unsuccessfully?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: If we had been trying to give away the veto, which we were not, and we were unsuccessful, as the hon. Lady implies, she would have nothing to worry about. We were seeking to achieve a conclusion of advance British and European interests in the working of the Community. We arrived at a conclusion which commended itself broadly, in respect of which the Italian Government have so far maintained their reserve. We hope that reserves will be withdrawn so that it is possible for the entire Community to agree on the substance of the matters agreed last week.

Mr. David Harris (St. Ives): My right hon. and learned Friend has mentioned that my right hon. Friend the Minister for Trade was at the meeting. Can he confirm my impression that my right hon. Friend raised the question of the serious crisis in the tin industry? If so, what was the outcome of his intervention?

Will my right hon. and learned Friend take it from me that our decision to withdraw from UNESCO—at the time that it was announced in the House I was in New York seeing the Secretary-General—caused not a ripple in the United Nations headquarters?

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): Rubbish. I made a phone call.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I shall leave the hon. Gentleman to resolve his financial problems with my hon. Friend outside the House. My hon. Friend's contribution makes the point that I had made to me about the feelings in the United Nations on our UNESCO decision.

My hon. Friend is right to be concerned about the tin crisis. We are in regular touch with our Community partners and with the Commission about it. The issue was raised yesterday. There are differing views on how to proceed to a resolution of the crisis. We are continuing to make strenuous efforts in the Community and elsewhere to achieve a settlement that would permit an orderly resumption of tin trading on the London metal exchange.

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): It has cost the British people £1·5 million a day to maintain our membership of this big business club over our period of membership. When will British unemployed workers move off the bottom of the league of social payments as a proportion of their former earnings compared with every other country in the Common Market?

In his discussions on international trade, did the Secretary of State explain to the other Ministers why the British Government did refuse to impose economic sanctions against South Africa? Did he tell them that it has nothing to do with the 150,000 jobs that they claim would be affected by the imposition of sanctions? He has not made that claim about the five million who the Government have put on the dole. Did he explain that the Government have refused to impose sanctions because Britain controls 45 per cent. of foreign investment in South Africa, and that it is the profits of his mates that are up for grabs in South Africa? That is why the Government will not intervene.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: One can only express one's sympathy with the hon. Gentleman if his insight into these matters is founded on such narrow restrictions as those which he has sought to outline.

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West): Will my right hon. and learned Friend make an immediate statement to the House about the important and new information, which he plainly has, which enabled him to describe expenditure on the CAP as recently or previously burgeoning?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The important information which I have is to the effect that the share of agriculture in the 1986 budget is substantially below its share for the current year and that the provision for 2·5 per cent. growth that is contained in the guidelines has been respected. I understand that nothing that we are able to do in respect of the CAP will be enough for my hon. Friend, but I beg him to accept that we are applying dramatic energy to try to achieve improved operation of the agriculture policy. I value his support in that respect, and I would value his insight as well.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): In view of the continuing financial crisis in the Common Market and the £252 million that the British taxpayer had to find to bail it out this year, will the Foreign Secretary seriously consider the question of the financing of those political parties in the Community that pass money to bankrupt parties in this country? For example, does he know that during the last financial year a group known as European Liberals, many of whom are to the right of Ghengis Khan, provided the British Liberal party with £340,000—and that is mentioned in its accounts—even though there is not a single Liberal party member in the Assembly? Is it any wonder that only recently the Liberal party allocated its premises to the National Front?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The hon. Gentleman has identified a very tangled web indeed. I should have thought that he would not be so ready to condemn international co-operation on political matters when his party, from the days of the Socialist International onwards, has proclaimed a belief in international political co-operation.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): As I am sure that my right hon. and learned Friend would be as concerned as I would be if the reference to European union in the preamble were to be used by the Commission as a moral lever for opening the throats of the British public so that it could throw down them more distasteful Euro medicine, will he reinforce his already robust remarks by saying, "Yes, we agree to a common market, but we do not agree to a united Europe"?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I think that some of my hon. Friends should become less preoccupied with textural matters of that sort. If we go back a long way, we will remember that in 1976 the Hague European Council, at which this country was represented by the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan), proclaimed that our objectives were the consolidation of Community solidarity and the establishment of European union. The treaty of Rome proclaimed as an objective the achievement of an ever closer union of the peoples of Europe.

If hon. Members concentrated on the realities and the practicalities, they would realise that we stop far short of the imaginary nightmare that they conjure up from these sort of words.

Mr. Eric Deakins (Walthamstow): Does the draft treaty on political co-operation contain any procedures to enable other European states to join in the treaty, and, if not, why not?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: It contains provisions that make it plain that the treaty is not meant to be exclusive or to preclude consultation and co-operation with other European democratic countries. For example, we all belong to organisations such as the Council of Europe.

Sir Peter Tapsell (East Lindsey): If the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) was right in what he said—and I have no information on the subject—does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that he has raised a very serious point? We cannot have British political parties financed by foreign political parties.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: Now that my hon. Friend has added his formidable weight to the point made by the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner), I shall be very happy to give it more earnest consideration.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that there is a Council decision on tariff quotas which I understand is not to be published in its final form, even though it has already been considered by the Council? As far as we know, it will never be made available to anybody either in this House or elsewhere, even though it has been considered and made as a Council decision.

Will my right hon. and learned Friend look into that matter during the Intergovernmental Conference and tell us whether it is a new procedure and whether it will continue in the future?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: In so far as I heard my hon. Friend, I believe that to be a matter that I should draw to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Minister for Trade, who is in the House but had similar difficulty in hearing what he said. We shall read it in Hansard tomorrow.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Will the Foreign Secretary expand on his interesting and probably welcome statement about scientific experts from Europe combating cancer? Does it mean that European money will be available? Will it be given to centres of excellence such as the Max Planck institute, Lewen university or the universities of Edinburgh or Cambridge?

If we want to fight cancer, is it not important to reinforce centres of excellence? Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman ask his officials to give him Sir James Gowan's foreword to the Medical Research Council's committee report which shows how funds are lacking for alpha projects? I welcome the initiative, but let us ensure that it is done in the most efficient way.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I shall see that the experts who advise the Government on these matters have their attention drawn to the points raised by the hon. Gentleman. Their actions, which I described in the statement, to achieve greater co-operation on a Community basis consist of the appointment of experts to work together, and I trust that they will take account of the hon. Gentleman's point.

Mr. Nigel Forman (Carshalton and Wallington): My right hon. and learned Friend said in his statement that the Government have put a "reserve on the text on the working environment."

Will he tell the House why that was done and what, in fact, it is?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have tried to answer that question in reply to the Opposition Front Bench. The Opposition Front Bench has had the advantage of studying the text, which I accept my hon. Friend may not have had. The proposal will give the Council powers to make legislative provision in a Community sense, affecting matters connected with health, safety and other areas in the working environment. It is our belief that, although that is a perfectly respectable objective to consider on a Community basis, it must be considered carefully with proper voting provisions. The proposal may achieve benevolent objectives, but it could, if too burdensome, detailed and restricted, threaten the creation of jobs, particularly in small and medium-sized enterprises.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Will the Foreign Secretary tell the House what discussions took place about American policy in Central America and the American invasion of Nicaragua, which has a democratically elected Government? Can the right hon. and learned Gentleman also say what discussions took place about the British Government's slavish support for United States policy in that matter, despite claiming to support the Contadora process, which other European Governments support? Can the right hon. and learned Gentleman give any guarantee that the EEC aid that is being sent to some Central American countries will not be used to support Central American Governments who deny human rights to their citizens, in particular El Salvador, Guatemala and Honduras? Will he give an assurance that no money will go to support such Governments?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: There was no discussion of that topic. When that was discussed recently, it was on the basis of the common policy adopted by the Community countries at the meeting that took place with the Contadora countries in Luxembourg approximately a month ago. There is a great deal more common ground in Community policy on this matter than the observations of the hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) suggest.

Mr. Tony Baldry (Banbury): Does not the constructive and practical progress that has been made towards the creation of an internal market demonstrate the capacity and determination of the Community to promote trade in a better way and to secure real and lasting jobs for the benefit of many unemployed people in this country?

[Mr. Tony Baldry]

Sir Geoffrey Howe: Yes, Sir.

Mr. Neil Hamilton (Tatton): In the course of his important discussions, did my right hon. and learned Friend seek to secure agreement from his colleagues that the British consumer should be able to derive the same advantages at Christmas as the Russian consumer and be able to purchase top quality EEC beef for 15p a pound?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I did not discuss that topic, although the Agriculture Council will be meeting tomorrow. No doubt the topic will be generally dealt with there.

Rate Support Grant (England)

4.3 pm

The Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Kenneth Baker): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I shall make a statement about the 1986-87 rate support grant settlement and selective rate limitation for local authorities in England.

I have laid before the House today the rate support grant report for 1986-87, together with supplementary reports adjusting grant for 1984-85 and 1985-86. Copies of the reports, the rate limits and other explanatory material being sent to local authorities today are available in the Library and the Vote Office.

The main feature of the settlement is the abolition of expenditure targets and the associated grant penalties. That decision has been warmly welcomed by the great majority of local authorities. It is a major simplification of the grant system.

Our aim is still to bring local authority current spending down to a level that the economy can afford. Though we have a system that gives low spenders a fairer share of grant, we are maintaining strong pressure, even on them, not to take advantage of the abolition of targets to increase spending in real terms.

The aggregate of Exchequer grant will be the same cash sum — £11,764 million — as the figure originally provided for this year. But it is about £400 million more than the amount of grant now being paid for this year, because local authorities are forfeiting £400 million through holdback. The grant which central Government will pay to local government next year will be about 46·5 per cent., which is about the same as the figure for this year after allowing for holdback.

Provision for local authority current expenditure has been set at £22·25 billion. That figure takes no account of the additional provision of £1,250 million over four years, which has been offered if satisfactory agreement can be reached on school teachers' duties and salary structure. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science has already said that, subject to the passage of the Education (Amendment) Bill, he is ready to bring forward £37 million from that sum in 1986-87 in order to secure the supervision of schools at midday.

I announced provisional grant-related expenditure assessments — GREAs — on 28 October. They incorporated various technical adjustments. The cities will benefit from changes in the concessionary fares and social work GREAs. The remote shires will gain from changes in the education GREA.

Mr. Robin Maxwell-Hyslop (Tiverton): It is a fiddle.

Mr. Baker: I have considered carefully the many representations made to me since that announcement, but have decided that my original proposals should stand. Individual authorities' GREAs will, however, differ somewhat from the figures issued in October as a result of more up-to-date information.

I am also changing the grant system so that the impact on the rates of every extra pound an authority spends or saves will be much sharper than before. As in past years, the pressure will become more severe if the authority's expenditure exceeds a threshold set at an average of 10 per cent. above GREA.

The important message is that——

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: It is a fiddle.

Mr. Baker: —for all but a handful of authorities, more spending will result in less grant and less spending will result in more grant.

As usual, there are arrangements to limit the impact of distributional changes on individual authorities' grant entitlements. I have also ensured that the changes to the grant system required by the abolition of the Greater London council and the metropolitan county councils are broadly neutral in their overall effects. If successor authorities carry out their inherited tasks more efficiently, their ratepayers will benefit.

I refer to the rate limitation. In July my predecessor announced the list of 12 authorities selected for rate limitation in 1986-87, together with expenditure levels. In most cases they represented a cash freeze on 1985-86 budgets. Seven of the 12 authorities have now applied to me for a redetermination of their expenditure levels—Camden, Greenwich, Hackney, Lewisham, Lambeth, Liverpool and Newcastle. I have considered their applications carefully and in each case increased the expenditure level somewhat, though overall by substantially less than they themselves had sought.

I am today proposing rate limits for those authorities. They have until January to make representations to me about a higher limit if they think it appropriate. Again, I shall of course consider carefully any representations they make.

In five of the authorities, ratepayers should see a cut in their rate bills next year. In all 12, the rates will be lower than they would have been without capping. In 1985-86, rate capping has saved ratepayers in those areas subject to rate limitations hundreds of millions of pounds. They will have good cause to thank us again in 1986-87.

My right hon. Friends the Home Secretary, the Secretary of State for Education and Science, and the Secretary of State for Transport are to make separate announcements about precept limitation for the new joint authorities in the metropolitan areas and London.

If local authorities budget sensibly and economically, the average rate increase next year should be no higher than this year, and it could be lower. Higher spending will mean sharply higher rates. That is why local government must stand firm in its wage negotiations, and must implement the many savings identified by the Audit Commission.

My proposals for 1986-87 represent a major advance. I have abolished targets which many of my hon. Friends pressed me to do. I have improved GREs. I have established a clearer relationship between what councils get and what they spend. I have built on the success of rate limitation in 1985-86. I commend them to the House.

Dr. John Cunningham (Copeland): Is the Secretary of State aware that we welcome the fact that he, not the chairman of the Conservative party, is making this statement? However, does he accept that we cannot welcome what we understand to be the case — that additional information about some cities and towns in Britain has been provided to the press outside the House, and is not in the statement.

Is the Secretary of State confirming that the difference between the settlement announced today and what local authorities need to maintain the present level of their community service provision is a shortfall of £1·25 billion? That is the gap between what local authorities say they require just to maintain existing services and what the Secretary of State is offering. Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that we cannot accept that the total grant should be reduced to less than 47 per cent. of local authorities' expenditure from almost 62 per cent., inherited by the Government in 1979? Is he further aware that that reduction, now for the seventh successive year, has meant a loss, in accumulated terms to local authorities, of over £16 billion?

Has not the Secretary of State just announced that once again local authorities are to be penalised for spending in excess of their grant-related expenditure assessments, which are being used for a purpose for which they were never intended? Is not the right hon. Gentleman overriding the proper, considered judgment of all locally elected councils in doing so? If, to quote his statement, how can he claim to have abolished targets and penalties?

"more spending will result in less grant"

Is the Secretary of State aware that authorities in the metropolitan areas and the GLC still do not know the cost to them of the Government's abolition proposals? How long must they wait before they are told the size of the bill that they will have to pick up, especially given the fact that the Government are now putting through the House legislation to enforce fixing of a rate by 1 April, which we do not oppose. That is a serious problem for many authorities of all political persuasions.

We note the increased expenditure levels given to the seven councils applying for redetermination under the Rates Act. We welcome those concessions, as far as they go, but even they fall short of what those seven authorities believe they need.

Is it not the case that the settlement takes no account of the eventual and urgent need to settle the dispute about teachers' pay? What allowance are the Government making to resolve that problem, as the right hon. Gentleman has produced a settlement that falls so far short —£1·25 billion short—of what local authorities believe is necessary? May I draw his attention and that of the House to the fact that in the 1970s, the Labour Government, to take account of the Houghton settlement on teachers' salaries, increased the rate support grant from 61 per cent. to 66 per cent. of expenditure to give teachers their long overdue salary award? Why do not the Government take the same approach?

In his statement the Secretary of State referred to his announcement on 28 October, when he increased the share of GRE to the inner cities by half of 1 per cent. of the total. Does he not recognise that that is a pathetic increase when set beside the consistent withdrawal of support from the partnership and programme authorities, which totals more than £427 million since 1981-82? Is not the implication of that a continuation of the massive problems of our inner cities and urban areas?

I return to what the Secretary of State said about the application of the Rates Act. Will he tell the House and the local authorities before what date he believes they should apply to him for discussions about maximum rate levels? Does he accept that we cannot agree with the continued fragmentation of the announcement, splitting up announcements by the Department of Education and Science, the Department of Transport and the Home Office, to obscure the full implications of what is intended? Will he deny that those arrangements will lead to further cuts and higher rates and fares in many local authority areas?

[Dr. John Cunningham]

Will the Secretary of State justify what he said about local authority wage levels in the very week when the low pay unit has said that as many as 30 per cent. of local authority manual workers receive wages that are only at the poverty level? We in the Labour party cannot accept that.

Will the Secretary of State confirm, as the hon. Member for Tiverton (Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop) seemed to be saying, that what he has announced today is that he intends to maintain pressure on authorities spending below GRE, that is, below what is required to maintain even average services in education, highways and social services and thereby denying people, particularly in those shire counties, the benefit of a decent service, even under Conservative administrations? [HON. MEMBERS: "Too long."]

Will not the statement lead inevitably to higher rates, even if the provision of services can be maintained? Are not the right hon. Gentleman's words about rate levels meaningless when set beside what his predecessor said this time last year, when in the past year rates have risen by more than twice the level of inflation, on average? Is it now not also the case that there is nothing in the statement at all that addresses the real and deepening problems of our inner city communities? For that reason, above all, it should be condemned.

Mr. Baker: The hon. Gentleman has asked me many questions, and I shall try to answer as many as I noted.

I refer first to teachers' pay. This point is of importance to local authorities. Exceptionally, if, as a result of the teachers' negotiations for next year, it is agreed that extra provision is made, the education GREA will be increased and there will be a proportionate increase in Exchequer grant. That is to say, there will be more money on the table, if a proper package for teachers is agreed, covering structure and conditions as well as pay.

The hon. Gentleman chided me about the proportion of grant provided by the Government. I remind the hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) of the basic figures. The proportion which central Government will be making available to local government next year is about 46·5 per cent. and that roughly corresponds to this year's figure. The hon. Gentleman will understand that in cash terms that will be roughly the same as this year.

The hon. Gentleman asked about the inner cities. A week ago the House debated the inner cities and we were pressed to increase support for the inner cities. The rate support grant settlement that I have announced will increase the grants for towns and cities by about £227 million. That takes into account the extra costs of providing social services in the inner cities, and concessionary fares. I would have thought that the hon. Gentleman would welcome that change.

The hon. Gentleman's first question concerned the overall level of provision. The hon. Gentleman said that, next year, local authorities wanted to spend £1·25 billion more than I had allowed for. That is quite true and I have agreed only £0·5 billion. Once again the Opposition Front Bench has become the spokesman for high levels of municipal spending. The Labour party would give in to every demand for spending made by town halls. If I had given in to town hall proposals it would have meant either higher rates or higher taxes. When the hon. Gentleman presses me to agree to that level of expenditure, he is pressing me to agree to substantially higher rates and higher taxes. The settlement that I have announced today has set out how much authorities can get.

The hon. Gentleman asked about the date on which the rate-limited authorities should make their representations. I would hope that they would be able to make representations to me by 22 January. The whole thrust of this settlement is that if authorities can make economies and savings rates will go down. It is for the councils to find the savings. The hon. Gentleman knows that the Audit Commission has pointed the way. The commission has shown that councils could save over £130 million a year through better vehicle fleet maintenance, £50 million through the cleaning of secondary schools, £200 million through more efficient purchasing and £30 million through more economical refuse collection. When such savings are possible, ratepayers are right to be fed up with weak councils who will not make them.

Mr. Francis Pym (Cambridgeshire, South-East): As someone who has been highly critical of the target system, I welcome the demise of that unfair methodology. Will my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State make sure that the allocations to local authorities bear a closer resemblance to the needs that have been established by these local authorities? My right hon. Friend has a message this afternoon for local authorities, "Spend more and the grant is less, spend less and the grant is more." Can my right hon. Friend say how he has taken that into account in the 1986-87 allocations in rewarding the thrifty, economical, low-spending shire counties, which have demonstrated the good management that they are able to give? How has my right hon. Friend fulfilled the undertakings previously given to these counties?

Mr. Baker: I am grateful for my right hon. Friend's support. We have abolished penalties, targets and holdback. I appreciate the interest he has taken in these matters, especially with regard to Cambridge. Low spenders, under the system announced today, will get their rewards. We have capped the gains of the low spenders, which they will get as a result of this change, just as we have safety-netted the grant losses falling to the higher spenders. The cap on gains will disappear over a period of possibly two or three years. This will allow low spenders to get the full benefits of the change.

Cambridgeshire will get a £74 million grant this year. If we had retained the existing system, it would have fallen to £65 million. The grant that is available to Cambridgeshire next year depends on its level of spending and will be either £75 million, £71 million or £70 million. I remind my right hon. Friend and the House that the level of grant depends entirely on the authorities' levels of expenditure.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): Can the Secretary of State confirm that, although he said there has been an increase in cash terms or at least a standstill in cash terms, the reality is that there is a reduction in real terms? This will not alleviate the needs of local authorities. Can the Secretary of State confirm that, although targets have been abolished, there is still equal complexity and uncertainty? Those who administer local authority finance fear that under this system there will be less opportunity for prediction than in the past.

How can the Secretary of State explain the phrase that has governed his allocations—less spending means more grant—in terms of the inner cities and urban areas? Such places have more need and should have more grant. The two views seem to be incompatible. Does the Secretary of State agree that the figures confirm what everybody has been asserting for months? The gross aggregate allocation to inner cities, the rate support grant and all other funding has been declining gradually and will continue to decline with this settlement and for each year since this Government came into office in 1979.

Mr. Baker: The hon. Member says that the position is less predictable now than in other years. If one has targets and penalties one can say quite specifically what the grant will be. In future the grant will depend on the level of expenditure of the individual authorities. I have set out in the papers available to Members three estimates of different levels of expenditure and grant that local authorities can get. I cannot agree with the hon. Gentleman's last statement that money has been taken away from the cities. In regard to his own local authority of Southwark, it received a grant of about £45 million. In the figures available in the Vote Office the hon. Gentleman will find that next year Southwark, assuming that it will take on responsibilities from the GLC, could get either £66 million or £60 million. This year, as a result of the changes in grades, there is a flow of about £227 million to the towns and cities.

Sir Ian Gilmour (Chesham and Amersham): Does my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State agree that, as far as I can understand his moderately illuminating statement, it has serious implications both for the rates and services of the shire counties, especially Buckinghamshire? Although I appreciate that the financial difficulties of Buckinghamshire county council are not the fault of my right hon. Friend, they are not the fault of the county council. Can my right hon. Friend say what steps he will take to alleviate its problems?

Mr. Baker: My right hon. Friend will have heard what I said about teachers' pay in reply to the hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham). It is of considerable importance to shire counties. Buckinghamshire's grant this year is £54 million. If the present system had continued, it would have got only £46 million. It has the chance of getting as much as £59 million, £52 million or £50 million. That cannot be represented as a major withdrawal of grant.

It is in the hands of local authorities to determine how much grant they get. If they can make savings—possible savings have been mentioned by the Audit Commission—their grant will increase. If low spenders continue as such, they will get higher grants, and if high spenders overspend, the money that they sacrifice as a result of overspending will not go to the Treasury, as is the arrangement this year, but will remain in the pool available for local authorities. It is therefore possible that low spenders will get even higher grants than have been estimated in the figures that I have announced.

Mr. Allan Roberts (Bootle): Will the right hon. Gentleman explain the following contradictions? He represents a party which believes in public expenditure cuts, but is claiming today that he is not really cutting public expenditure. He says that he is giving more money to inner cities, but he is cutting the total grant while promising his right hon. and hon. Friends that he is giving more money to shire counties. Where will the money come from? He and the Government claim to be on the side of ratepayers, yet he has launched an attack on ratepayers. Without cuts in Government grants, rates would today be 25 per cent. lower. The settlement represents a major attack on ratepayers, especially owner-occupiers, and comes on top of a moratorium on improvement grants for owner-occupiers. Moreover, there has been a fourfold increase in the number of owner-occupiers who, because of the Government's economic policies, are defaulting on mortgage payments.

Mr. Baker: The hon. Gentleman says that rates could be much lower as a result of higher grants. Where would the money for higher grants come from? It would have to come from taxpayers. It cannot come from anyone else. I have allowed for an increase of about 4·5 per cent. in the overall level of local government expenditure and provided roughly £500 million. The Opposition Front Bench want an additional £1·25 billion, which is possible only as a result of a massive increase in taxation or a massive increase in rates. There is no other way in which to finance it. The hon. Gentleman mentioned cities. His local authority—Sefton—gets £43 million in grant this year. It could get £56 million, £55 million or £54 million next year.

Mr. Jack Straw (Blackburn): That is because of abolition.

Mr. Baker: It includes an increase for abolition expenditure. GREAs for all towns and cities have been increased in recognition of the higher cost of social services and concessionary fares.

Mr. Charles Irving (Cheltenham): I am sure that both sides of the House are extremely grateful to my right hon. Friend for the simple clarity of his statement and the marvellous way in which, 10 minutes before we are to discuss the settlement, we receive 200 pages of simple explanation. As I am an ordinary hon. Member who is not equipped to deal with already complicated circumstances that are unnecessarily complicated still further, can I ask a simple question? I have gone through the technical data used in the calculations for 1986-87. I have dealt with the GREA and multiplied it by the rateable value plus the population and the expenditure estimate. I have looked at the local government finance rate support grant document—the third paper. I shall not go through the others because they are just as simple. I have taken column 1 with the grant-related expenditure and coupled it with the abatement multiplier and the published multiplier. All I am suggesting is that it would be simpler to be told in simple language what the hell the rate will be in Gloucestershire next year.

Mr. Baker: I have great sympathy with what my hon. Friend says. Mr. Edward Pearce, the political writer, said that on these occasions every occupant of my office has to indulge in the verbal sludge of municipalspeak. My hon. Friend indulged in it as well. Cheltenham's grant this year is £1·8 million. Next year, it could qualify for £2·6 million, £2·4 million or £2·4 million. My hon. Friend's local authority will receive more grant next year than this year.

[Mr. Baker]

Mr. Terry Davis (Birmingham, Hodge Hill): As the Secretary of State says that he wants the effect of the abolition of metropolitan county councils to be neutral, will he now answer the question that I put to him on behalf of a delegation of Birmingham Members of Parliament a week ago? Will he confirm that Birmingham city council will take on some additional responsibilities next year as a result of abolition of the West Midlands metropolitan council? Will he also confirm that, as a result of taking on those additional responsibilities, Birmingham city council will receive less money than it would otherwise have received? If the Secretary of State does not agree with that allegation, will he explain why his civil servants have failed to contact the city treasurer to clarify the point, as he promised that they would?

Mr. Baker: The hon. Gentleman came to see me with certain other Birmingham Members of Parliament last week. They were discussing estimates. The figures that I have announced today show that the benefit to Birmingham city council due to abolition is 3·7p, which means that its grant is £165 million. Allowing for the allocation of new responsibilities following abolition, it could qualify for grant of £201 million, £185 million or £180 million.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: How does the Secretary of State acquit himself of the charge of sheer political cowardice by reducing the percentage of Government grant instead of reforming the base of local government taxation, to which this party—to which he is meant to belong—has been committed for many years?

Can he deny that he is deliberately fiddling the GREA formula to transfer funds from rural areas to the towns? To be fair, the same happened when the leader of the Social Democratic party was a Cabinet Minister in the Labour Government, which the Liberal party supported, which robbed the Devon rural areas of £49 million. How can the Secretary of State deny that his fiddling of the GREA formula this year is to transfer money in support of the aboliton of the metropolitan councils? Does he not realise that, in so doing, he has destroyed credibility in the GREA system just as he has destroyed credibility in himself as Secretary of State?

Mr. Baker: As for the first question which my hon. Friend asked, I intend to introduce a Green Paper after Christmas——

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: A Green Paper?

Mr. Baker: My hon. Friend must be patient. We would like to hear the views of the country and people other than my hon. Friend. It will be a Green Paper on the reform of rates. Regarding my hon. Friend's point about the transfer from shires, this year Devon——

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: What about district councils?

Mr. Baker: I shall come to district councils because the message is even better for them.

This year the county of Devon will receive a grant of £148 million. Under the existing system it would have received a grant of £142 million. Next year it stands to receive a grant of £155 million, £151 million or £150 million. Therefore, Devon is likely to end up with a larger grant.

Mr. Martin Flannery (Sheffield, Hillsborough): That is enough.

Mr. Baker: That is pretty good, but just wait.

My hon. Friend's district council is Mid-Devon. This year its grant is £1·1 million. It would have decreased by £50,000 under the old system. Under the new system it is likely to end up with a higher grant next year than this year.

Mr. Robert Parry (Liverpool, Riverside): Will the Secretary of State now accept that since 1979 the Government have stolen more than £350 million in rate support grant from the city of Liverpool? What will next year's allocation be? Will it not be peanuts compared with this year's allocation? Will the Secretary of State say when he intends to meet leaders of Liverpool city council to discuss those serious problems?

Mr. Baker: In response to a request from the chief executive of Liverpool city council I have already said that I am willing to meet the leader of the council or a delegation from it. The council has set a budget target for 1985-86, so next year it will not forgo grant because of holdback this year. Liverpool city council was one of the city councils that asked for a redetermination of its expenditure level because it is to be rate-capped next year. If I had agreed with its request, there would have been a 27 per cent. rate increase next year. I did not agree with it, and as a result there will be a 15 per cent. rate increase next year.

Mr. John Cartwright (Woolwich): As the Secretary of State commends the Audit Commission, does he recall the harsh comments that it levelled against the waste inherent in a centralised bureaucratic system of control of local authority expenditure? Does he accept that the welcome abolition of the target system would have been even more welcome if he had not retained a tough penalty system based on GREAs, about which local authorities of all political persuasions are worried? Finally, is not the conclusion of the settlement further confirmation of the Government's policy of shifting the burden of paying for local services from taxes, which are basically fair, to rates, which are inherently unfair?

Mr. Baker: Next year the contribution of central Government to local government will be 46·5 per cent., the same as for this year. I thank the hon. Gentleman for his comments on simplification. Next year the system will be much simpler than that this year because grants, penalties and holdback will not exist. Many hon. Members may feel that GREAs are imperfect, but in one way or another the Government must assess the relative needs of individual authorities. As a result, the inner cities can get GREAs per head as high as £800, whereas the shires get GREAs of about £400. That is an attempt to recognise that the social needs of some of our towns and cities must be met through this system.

The hon. Gentleman will know from the figures that Greenwich will, in effect, have a rate standstill because of rate capping next year. However, if the borough of Greenwich had been allowed to proceed as it planned, there would have been a rate increase of 22 per cent.

Mr. Charles Morrison (Devizes): The extra help for our inner cities is welcome. However, at a time when the Chancellor of the Exchequer is talking about scope for tax cuts, not increases, it is a matter of great regret that Treasury parsimony has not allowed my right hon. Friend to treat the shire counties as well as he should have done. On what does he base his belief that rate increases next year will be similar to those for this year, taking account of the fact that the Association of County Councils believes that rate increases in the shire counties could be as high as 20 per cent. in some cases, and will average about 15 per cent?

Mr. Baker: Those were estimates well before the event. During the past 18 months I have learnt that estimates made before the rate support grant settlement are usually much higher than the rate settlements themselves. This year my hon. Friend's county of Wiltshire will receive a grant of £84 million. Under the old system it would have received £79 million. Under the new system it will receive £86 million, £84 million or £83 million. The figures for Wiltshire which my hon. Friend submitted to me show that the county appears to be planning significant growth in expenditure. I was not surprised at that because it is not unusual when a council has the misfortune to be hung and falls prey to Liberal indecision.

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury): Will the Secretary of State tell the House whether the people of the borough of Islington, exercising their unfettered power through the ballot box, or the Secretary of State and his civil servants doing the Treasury's bidding in Whitehall, know better what the needs of my constituents are and what expenditure should be used to provide services for them?

Mr. Baker: As the hon. Gentleman follows these matters, he will know that successive Governments—any change in the rating system will involve future Governments doing the same—make some assessment of the relative needs of different areas. That must be done impartially. Opposition Members say that I have moved the GREA system, but the consultative process before I changed GREA lasts between six and nine months, and I take representations from the towns, cities and shire districts.

As the hon. Gentleman knows, Islington council did not seek redetermination. Next year the rate decrease for his constituents will be 18 per cent.

Mr. John Wheeler (Westminster, North): My right hon. Friend's statement will be greatly welcomed by the people of London, especially responsible borough leaders. How will his settlement and proposals affect London, recognising its special needs, and, particularly, the largest rate-paying authorities—the cities of Westminster and of London?

Mr. Baker: As I have made clear, we have not used what is called the London lever, which can be pulled to divert grant into London. Instead, we have reassessed the GREAs across the country, and taken particular account of those for social services and concessionary fares. As a result, all towns and cities will benefit, not merely London or only towns in metropolitan areas. I, like all my predecessors who have held this office, have had to make decisions about the proportion of grant going to different areas. That is done only after the most lengthy process of consultation. The arrangements that we have made for London will allow all the different London authorities to take over the responsibilities of the Greater London council. The level of rates in London will depend essentially on the economies that can be made by the successor authorities to the GLC.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): Does the Secretary of State think that it is right that he or his Department should leak comprehensively the details of the rate support grant settlement and give newspapers far more information than he has provided at the Dispatch Box today? In view of the question from the hon. Member for Westminster, North (Mr. Wheeler), will the Secretary of State tell the House whether the report in today's Financial Times that at least £100 million of Government grant is to be switched from England's rural areas to London for the 1986-87 settlement, in advance of the 1986 borough council elections, is correct? Is that not a Government bribe to stop the disastrous consequences that — [Interruption.] No, we are grateful for every penny that we can get. Is it not a bribe to try to stop the Conservative party suffering badly at the ballot box in 1987? Will the right hon. Gentleman admit that he has not the faintest idea about how much money boroughs will have to pay out to compensate for the shortfall in GLC funding?

Mr. Baker: The hon. Gentleman is insensitive and has the brass neck to talk about allocation of money on political grounds. As chairman of the GLC he knows that during the past few months the GLC has been dishing out money to its political friends in inner London on an unprecedented scale. I repeat that I have purposely not used the London lever. The needs of all towns and cities have been assessed through GREAs. London will benefit by about £220 million, the metropolitan areas by about £80 million and other towns and cities——

Mr. Jeff Rooker (Birmingham, Perry Barr): Who gets less?

Mr. Baker: The money comes from the holdback operating this year. That is why the allocation has been made.

Sir Anthony Grant (Cambridgeshire, South-West): Cutting through the arcane arithmetical dexterity so splendidly exposed by my hon. Friend the Member for Cheltenham (Mr. Irving), will my right hon. Friend, as a reasonable man, lay his hand on his heart and confirm that his proposals regarding Cambridgeshire cannot be used in future as an excuse for mismanagement by the Liberal-controlled Cambridgeshire county council?

Mr. Baker: Yes. In the recognition of towns and cities, the grant for the city of Cambridge will increase. This year, South Cambridgeshire, which covers most of my hon. Friend's constituency, will receive a grant of £324,000. Under the existing system, next year his council would have dropped out of grant and received nothing, but now it is likely to receive more than £200,000.

Mr. Peter Hardy (Wentworth): Will the Secretary of State confirm that he is maintaining the Government's share of local authority expenditure at about 30 per cent. less than it was when Labour was in office? Does he accept that that means that business and industry bear an extra £2,000 million burden? Will he quantify the number of jobs that that has cost? How does he reconcile that with the fact that the Secretary of State for Social Services is to impose on the poorest of the poor a burden of £70 in contributions to the rates?

[Mr. Peter Hardy]

Mr. Baker: The progressive reduction in the amount of grant from the Exchequer to local authorities was mentioned in the debate a week ago and has been mentioned many times in the past. The biggest cut was made by the former Labour Chancellor of the Exchequer from 1966 to 1969. There was nothing sacred about 1969. We have reduced the grant progressively because we believe that that enhances local accountability.

The hon. Gentleman's implication is that the towns and cities have been starved of expenditure. I remind the hon. Gentleman of the point that I made yesterday and last week. In the seven most deprived inner cities of Britain, local government current expenditure was £700 million when we came to office, and this year it is £1·4 billion. That is double the amount and an increase in real terms.

Mr. Richard Holt (Langbaurgh): My right hon. Friend will recall that at the beginning of the pantomime season last year, so graphically illustrated by my hon. Friend the Member for Cheltenham (Mr. Irving), there was a dispute between us about the size of Cleveland. An hour and a half ago I checked on that. Twelve months later his Department has still not resolved that dispute, so I have no idea how it could resolve the rate support grant. Will he repeat his promise of last year that when he discovers that his Department has got it wrong, the shortfall, which was denied last year and will be denied next year, will be made up to Cleveland?

Will he also examine the Rate Support Grant (Reduction in Rateable Values) (Specified Percentages) Regulations 1985? In Langbaurgh, which has lost the ICI and Shell plants, the rateable value has fallen, but it will be swept up in the 2·5 per cent. safety net. Cleveland as a whole will not be. My constituency will receive a grant of 1·7p because of the 2·5 per cent. safety net, but it will lose 2·8p because Cleveland does not fall into the net.

Mr. Baker: The answer to my hon. Friend's first and second questions is yes; to the third that I will re-examine the matter; and to the fourth, that I shall check his figures.

Mr. Allen McKay (Barnsley, West and Penistone): Is the Minister aware that his announcement is a recipe for disaster in local government? It will mean a vast increase in the rates, a vast reduction in services, or both. How does the Minister propose to overcome the fact that, by abolishing the counties, the services granted under section 137 will be passed to local authorities, but not the money to deal with them? The recalculation of section 137 will mean that Barnsley will receive only a third of the present grant. What will happen to the fire service? The Minister's predecessor gave a categorical assurance that the fire service would not be reduced. What can the Minister say about the hundreds of men who will be forced to leave the fire service because it cannot be paid for? What about the fire cover that is essential for those areas?

Mr. Baker: Later today my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary will be announcing the expenditure level and rate limits for successor authorities with regard to fire services. Undertakings given during the debate will be fulfilled.

The Widdicombe inquiry is examining section 137, and I do not wish to anticipate its recommendations. I appreciate that some areas are in difficulties because of the recalculation. I am considering the matter.

Mr. Patrick Cormack (Staffordshire, South): Does my right hon. Friend accept that gobbledegook and incomprehensibility are rarely the hallmarks of good government? This makes the Schleswig-Holstein problem appear positively kindergarten. Will my right hon. Friend tell the House that the needs and prudence of South Staffordshire have been recognised in the assessment?

Mr. Baker: I have said before that the whole system of rate support grant is Byzantine in its complexity.

Dr. Cunningham: I said it.

Mr. Baker: We have both said it. Although the House cherishes this statement once a year, it might be better to issue the figures so that hon. Members and the authorities can absorb and analyse them.

South Staffordshire's grant this year is £686,000. If the system had not been changed, it would have dropped by about £200,000 to £437,000. South Staffordshire is eligible for a grant ranging from £600,000 to £650,000, which could be more if the economies recommended by the Audit Commission were made.

Mr. Robert Kilroy-Silk (Knowsley, North): However complex or Byzantine, one fact stands out. During the years, the Government have massively reduced the proportion of authority expenditure that is provided by central Government. That reduction has been directed disproportionately at the poorest local authorities representing the most deprived areas. Do not those proposals, coupled with those announced yesterday by the Secretary of State for Social Services, represent a massive, sustained and vicious attack on the poorest people for the benefit of the rich and privileged?

Mr. Baker: The hon. Gentleman is indulging in pre-selection rhetoric. The increase in grant in his constituency will be significant, after allowing for the transfer of responsibilities from Merseyside county council. In current expenditure in 1979 and current expenditure this year in all the metropolitan areas, the towns and cities and the partnership areas, there has been an increase in real terms of 7·5 per cent.

Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark (Birmingham, Selly Oak): I shall ask no question about Byzantium or Schleswig-Holstein, but I wish to know about somewhere nearer home. It is like walking through a sea of treacle to get to the figures on Birmingham. Am I right in assuming that Birmingham will get a little more, at least for the grave problems that it faces, or have the targets been drawn so hard that the noose will be so tight on an authority which, although regrettably Labour-controlled, has been pretty responsible—[HON. MEMBERS: "Oh!"] Not very, but pretty. Will we get more money to deal with those problems, or shall we unleash militancy upon all cities because justice is not done to those with the greatest problems? Can my hon. Friend tell us how much we shall get? But please do not tell me yet.

Mr. Baker: I shall try to thread my way through the maze of figures for Birmingham. This year, its grant is £165 million. Had we not changed the system, it would have received £158 million. If it were to spend at cash standstill—that is probably ambitious in terms of a city—it would receive £201 million. Should it spend at 3·5 per cent. above the rate of inflation, it would receive £185 million, and should it spend at 4·5 per cent. above the rate of inflation, it would receive £180 million. Birmingham spends about 6 per cent. below GREA, and we have increased its GREA by 7·5 per cent. If it wishes to spend right up to its GREA, there will be substantial rate increases in Birmingham. But that would mean an increase of about 14 per cent. in expenditure, and I do not believe that the sort of council to which my hon. Friend referred would take such an irresponsible decision.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): The Secretary of State seems to have achieved the biggest miracle since the loaves and the fishes, inasmuch as he has reduced the total money available, but every place mentioned so far has received more.

Does the right hon. Gentleman remember a brief visit to Bradford at the end of November? Does he recollect being told that there is a belief in the city that, since we took legal action against his Department, it has undertaken a vendetta against Bradford? How can he reconcile the amount of grant paid to Bradford — a city whose population will increase by 10 per cent. during the next 20 years, and which faces a massive unemployment crisis and serious problems in the housing and education services?

Mr. Baker: I remember my visit to Bradford, and I refute completely the allegation that my Department is undertaking a vendetta. That is extravagant and absurd language, as the hon. Gentleman well knows. This year, Bradford will receive £107 million. Next year, it is likely to receive a grant of about £125 million. I admit that a large proportion of the increase is due to abolition. The hon. Gentleman will know that the urban programme for Bradford is worth between £4 million and £5 million. I have shown my readiness to approve further sums for Bradford if it introduces schemes for redeveloping the city centre.

Mr. Robin Squire (Hornchurch): Will my right hon. Friend confirm that the increase in grant for Havering—a law-abiding authority — is almost the lowest in London, despite the fact that it will also have to take on many new responsibilities after the GLC is abolished? Will my right hon. Friend comment on the operation of the concessionary fares calculation, under which the cost of a statutory scheme in London from next April, which will be about £2·7 million to Havering, is met by a GREA of no more than £1 million?

Mr. Baker: I shall have to check the calculation for a specific borough, but I can confirm that the grant to Havering will be higher next year. I accept at once that that is a reflection of the services that it will have to take over form the GLC. But after discussing the matter with authorities in London, I am convinced that they will make substantial savings, because the grants that I have announced for London assume a continuation of expenditure at broadly the level of this year. If savings can be made, the position of the successor authorities will be much better.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. A statement on Wales will follow this one. I shall allow questions on this statement to continue for 15 minutes, and, if questions are brief, I hope that everyone can be called during that time.

Mr. Martin Flannery (Sheffield, Hillsborough): Will the Minister admit that his bland and smiling effrontery in the face of misery and poverty is nauseating? The industrial city of Sheffield has more old people than any city in Britain and is doing its utmost to supply services to ordinary folk. How can the Minister and Conservative Members — the Conservative Benches are full of consultancies, wealth and directorships—have the nerve to say that the Government will cut our services while pouring wealth into their pockets? How does he expect us to explain to our people, in the face of that, that this place is hardly worth inhabiting?

Mr. Baker: The hon. Gentleman has come to the House on the wrong day for the wrong debate. He should have been here for the debate yesterday——

Mr. Flannery: I was here yesterday. [Interruption.]

Mr. Baker: My right hon. Friend the Leader of the House says, "We did not want him there."

There will be an increase in grant to Sheffield. I accept that it will have to take over some of the responsibilities of South Yorkshire county council. The latter was rate-capped last year. If the hon. Gentleman wishes me to extend rate capping to Sheffield, perhaps he will let me know.

Mr. Terry Dicks (Hayes and Harlington): Unlike members of the press, I was not privy to this information in advance, so I had to make some quick calculations. Will my right hon. Friend explain why Hillingdon—a good Conservative authority—will lose about £9 million in grant, which will mean an 8 per cent. increase in rates if it is to stand still? That does not take into account costs after the abolition of the GLC. Is that not disgusting, and is it not a great shame for the ratepayers of Hillingdon? Should not the Secretary of State and his civil servants be ashamed of themselves for treating us in this way?

Mr. Baker: I recognise the anxiety of my hon. Friend and the other two Members who represent Hillingdon about this matter, but I regret to say that Hillingdon is likely to get less grant next year. That reflects its relatively high expenditure——

Mr. Dicks: Because of Labour councils before us.

Mr. Baker: That is absolutely right. However, a further reduction in spending—I can put this to my hon. Friend, who is a member of that council—will increase its grant significantly on top of its lump sum receipt of more than £4 million from the London rate equalisation scheme.

Mr. David Penhaligon (Truro): Which authorities will receive a smaller percentage of the global sum available as a result of those changes?

Mr. Baker: That is a broad question. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will study the figures. This year, Cornwall will receive £77 million. Under the present system, that sum would have fallen next year to £74.9 million. Instead, it could be eligible for £79 million, £78 million or just below £78 million.

Mr. J. F. Pawsey (Rugby and Kenilworth): Does my right hon. Friend accept that the abolition of targets will be warmly welcomed by all those involved in local government? What effect will the settlement have on low-spending shire counties such as Warwickshire and on low-spending, careful authorities such as Rugby?

[Mr. J. F. Pawsey]

Mr. Baker: I reiterate that the premiums in the new system means that the rewards will go to those councils that can make savings and are low spenders. That is the effect of the abolition of targets, penalties and holdback. There will be a considerable premium for all those authorities that can make savings, because their grant will go up in relation to the savings that they can make.

Mr. Norman Atkinson (Tottenham): On the more general message that the Minister gave earlier to local authorities, will he explain why it is bad for the economy for a person to receive a dustbin through the rates, but a good thing for the economy if he buys a dustbin over the counter of a shop?

Mr. Baker: I can only say, in respect of the question to the extent that I understand it, that those authorities that have privatised refuse collection have always made savings, and the Audit Commission has identified in refuge collection savings of at least £30 million to £50 million a year. Those are the sort of savings available if proper management and controls are introduced into local government expenditure.

Mr. Michael Shersby (Uxbridge): How will the system of caps and safety nets produce the phasing to which my right hon. Friend referred in answer to a parliamentary question from me on 4 December? What is the precise percentage by which Hillingdon's block grant entitlement will fall this year?

Mr. Baker: I shall write to my hon. Friend with the answer to his second question.

On the first question about caps and safety nets, needless to say anything in rate support grant is complicated, but this is one of the more complicated aspects. My hon. Friend has written to me about a different system of capping and nets. The caps and nets that we have introduced will phase out over the years, and that is important because I am anxious to ensure that the gains to the low spenders should come through as quickly as possible.

Mr. John Fraser (Norwood): Am I right in thinking that Lambeth will lose £7 million-worth of grant if it maintains services next year at the same level as this year? What justification can there be for that differential of £7 million, which is almost as great as the net contribution that the Government make to the inner city partnership funding for that borough?

Mr. Baker: I ask the hon. Gentleman to look at the figures on Lambeth. Matters are always complicated regarding a successor council authority in an abolition area. There is a significant increase in grant for Lambeth, and I have no doubt that there are significant savings to be made in Lambeth. The classic comparison is always between Lambeth and Wandsworth. The savings are there to be made in Lambeth and I believe that, in his heart of hearts, the hon. Gentleman knows it.

Mr. Anthony Nelson (Chichester): Does my right hon. Friend appreciate that there wil be a widespread feeling of betrayal in the shire counties at today's announcement? Is he aware that many of the figures that he has given consistently show in real terms a reduction in the support for the next financial year? Will he confirm that the shire counties, as a proportion of expenditure, will now receive less than at any time since the new system was introduced? What is the basic, fundamental political judgment that my right hon. Friend has made that has shifted him away from the policy of his predecessors who were gradually shifting resources to the shire counties and away from the inner cities?

Mr. Baker: The fundamental judgment that I have made is that it is right and appropriate to recognise the higher costs arising in our towns and cities for the administration and provision of social services and concessionary fares.

My hon. Friend knows well, because like me he represents a rich and prosperous area—

Mr. Nelson: It is not. Pensioners make up 23 per cent. of the population.

Mr. Baker: The county has a grant of £52 million and will suffer a significant drop down to £41 million under the old system and can then qualify for grants of between £53 million and £46 million. As regards the town of Chichester, my hon. Friend will find from the figures that it has a grant this year of £1·6 million. It would have dropped £200,000 uder the old system and it will qualify for a grant of broadly what it gets this year.

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley): When will the Secretary of State understand that the so-called overspending authorities such as Burnley are virtually unable to provide adequate service levels to the people in their town? When will he also understand that, if he wants a system based solely on the factor of GREAs, unless he can prove that that system is fair, the foundation on which it is based is false? If he is confident that he is right, why should the Under-Secretary in his Department, who agreed to meet a delegation from the majority group and the Conservative group and officers from Burnley borough council who were appointed to discuss this subject in January, arrange a meeting with the leader of the Conservative group for the week before?

Mr. Baker: That was prudent of my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary. Savings can be made in levels of expenditure in towns such as Burnley. We are not asking for draconian savings. When the rate support grant statement was made last year, my predecessor was told that huge staff cuts would be made and tremendous cuts in services. This has not proved to be true. We are asking authorities, particularly the high-spending ones in the northern towns and cities, to run their affairs more efficiently and economically and still provide a service to the public.

Mr. Conal Gregory (York): I am sure that many people in Yorkshire, and the city of York in particular, will welcome my right hon. Friend's statement. Would he like in particular to commend those in the Conservative group on York city council who have held back the excessive spending that the Labour leadership wanted? As it is, I imagine that he will confirm that York will do better out of the statement, substantially because the Conservative group held back against the Labour councillors.

Mr. Baker: I confirm what my hon. Friend has said and will also say that that success has been achieved as a result of the efforts by the Conservatives in the city of York. I applaud them for what they have done.

Mr. Eric Cockeram (Ludlow): Has my right hon. Friend noted the widespread concern in the shire counties at the state of rural roads — the cost of which falls disproportionately heavily on a scattered population? The shire counties have not received sufficient support in recent years for adequate maintenance of roads following severe winters. Will my right hon. Friend assure the House that the component part of the announcement today calculated for this specific purpose, allows that maintenance to be made good?

Mr. Baker: Yes, one of the elements in GREA is the maintenance of roads, including their maintenance in severe weather. It also takes into account those parts of the country that are geographically widespread. However, if hon. Members wish to influence the consideration of GREAS, this is done in the spring and summer, when they are being examined by the local authority associations and the council. That is the time to lobby for a particular preference for a particular element of GREA taking greater priority over another. That has been done. I note what my hon. Friend said about the maintenance of roads, and I shall bear it in mind.

Mr. Derek Spencer (Leicester, South): Does my right hon Friend agree that this setting gives Leicester city council the opportunity to learn a permanent lesson from the rate capping of last year, and that, provided that they do not act like town hall Bourbons, this settlement will be in the interests of the people of Leicester?

Mr. Baker: I can confirm that. The towns and cities benefit from this grant settlement, and this could not have been arrived at without taking the action that we took in respect of Leicester last year. I thank both my hon. Friends who represent Leicester for the warm support that they have given me and my Government during that process.

Mr. John Powley (Norwich, South): My right hon. Friend and his predecessors will be aware that, in past years, Norfolk county council has worked its budgets in an economical fashion. It has practised economies and management technique which have kept the rate down to a prudent level. Will my right hon. Friend give me an assurance that past performances in rate support grant, which have not recognised those economies, will be put right this year, after all the sufferings that we have borne because of the rate support grant system deficiencies in previous years?

Mr. Baker: The leader of Norfolk county council has consistently lobbied us about the position of Norfolk county council. I recognise that it is an economical council. If we had maintained the present system of targets and penalties for next year, Norfolk county council would have lost a substantial amount of grant. However, the persuasive arguments of the leader of Norfolk county council—one among many, but a significant voice—led me to believe that we had to abolish targets, penalties and holdback. I have had to stage the gains that will flow to a county such as Norfolk over two or three years; otherwise the losses that would be sustained by many authorities would be too great. However, the gains will come through. I would say to the shire counties, and to Norfolk in particular, that the rewards are there to be taken if they can run economical services.

Mr. Timothy Wood (Stevenage): My right hon. Friend need not, I am afraid, tell me what is Stevenage's grant. It is nothing this year and it is nothing next year. However, Hertfordshire's grant has been reduced by £20 million — by over one third — for the coming year. Hertfordshire can surely not be called an extravagant county. Can my right hon. Friend justify this reduction?

Mr. Baker: It is true that Hertfordshire has not benefited from the GREA changes. However, as with all low spenders, it stands to gain from the abolition of targets and penalties and the consequential alteration to the grant arrangements. We have had to cap the gains that low spenders will get next year from our changes. However, the cap on gains will disappear over a period of years. That will allow low spenders to get the full benefit of the changes that we are making.

Mr. Bowen Wells (Hertford and Stortford): Will my right hon. Friend confirm that this decrease in the grant will result in a rate increase in Hertfordshire of between 20 per cent. and 25 per cent.? During the last seven years, Hertfordshire has done exactly what my right hon. Friend advised us to do: to see Ministers about the calculation of GREA in May and June. We were given assurances by his hon. Friend the Minister for Environment, Countryside and Local Government that he would make certain that the GREA contained a weighting to protect Hertfordshire. My right hon. Friend has gone back on that arrangement. May I ask him to look again at the GREA calculation? It discriminates seriously against Hertfordshire, which cannot make reductions without very seriously damaging education.

Mr. Baker: I appreciate my hon. Friend's concern about the calculation of GREAs, but he is mistaken if he believes that I alone decide these matters. It is a most elaborate process of discussion, negotiation and calculation in which the officials of the county councils and district councils are involved.

Mr. Wells: But my right hon. Friend ignores them.

Mr. Baker: With great respect to my hon. Friend, we do not ignore their representations.

Mr. Wells: Hertfordshire's representations have been ignored.

Mr. Baker: The point about Hertfordshire is the point that I made a few moments ago: that, if the caps and gains affect Hertfordshire, the effect will be reduced in the course of the next two or three years. The rewards will be there for low spenders.

Mr. Tim Smith (Beaconsfield): Will my right hon. Friend confirm that the home counties are being asked to pay for the abolition of the Greater London council, as follows: Bedfordshire, £10 million; Berkshire, £8 million; Buckinghamshire, £4 million; Essex, £16 million; Hertfordshire, £20 million; Kent, £10 million; and Surrey £14 million? What is the justification for this, and why were we not told before?

Mr. Baker: I reject completely the implication behind my hon. Friend's question. I have already said that I have deliberately not used the London lever—the diversion of grant specifically to London. We examined the basis of the GREA calculation. I should not have thought that my hon. Friend would object to the recognition of the higher social and personal needs of our towns and cities, or to concessionary fares. That is why there has been an increase in the grants to the towns and cities.

[Mr. Baker]

Mr. Michael Knowles (Nottingham, East): I can help my right hon. Friend on this occasion. I shall say something nice to him, which is more than my hon. Friends have done. Can he confirm that in Nottingham's case the combination of the switch of resources to the inner cities and concessionary fares means that Nottingham city council will be eligible for more grant in the coming year, provided that it holds its spending?

Mr. Baker: Yes, I can confirm that precisely. Nottingham city council will be eligible for more grant. The size of the extra grant that it receives will depend entirely upon the economies and the savings that it can make. If it can make more savings, the grant will be greater.

Mr. Piers Merchant (Newcastle upon Tyne, Central): Will my right hon. Friend ensure that the greatest vigilance is exercised in determining the level of limitation upon rate precepts in the metropolitan counties so that cities such as Newcastle upon Tyne, with an already very high rate, do not show an increase, bearing in mind that, under today's rate limitation announcement, which is welcome, a suspiciously large rate figure is still allowed for?

Mr. Baker: Newcastle upon Tyne is one of the authorities that is subject to rate capping. If we had not rate-capped Newcastle upon Tyne, the rate increase would have been about 29 per cent. The result of rate capping is that the rate increase in Newcastle upon Tyne will be about 7 per cent.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): I recognise my right hon. Friend's commitment to the inner cities. I recognise also that Leicester will receive at least an extra £2 million in grant. But what financial checks will be made available to ensure that Leicester, as a transport undertaking, continues to provide concessionary bus fares instead of spending excessive further sums on political propaganda?

Mr. Baker: Leicester has spent a very large amount of money upon political propaganda, and, as my hon. Friend pointed out, that money has largely been wasted. This is essentially a matter for the Leicester city council. If it continues to waste money in that way, the result will be that it loses grant.

Mr. Jack Straw (Blackburn): Since rate increases this year have risen, on average, by just under 10 per cent. —that is, by 9·5 per cent.—and since the Secretary of State says that the average rate increases next year should be no higher than the rate increases this year, will he confirm that this statement means that he is predicting rate increases of about 10 per cent.?

Mr. Baker: During the exchanges this afternoon, several hon. Members have estimated the rate increases. I would counsel everybody to be very careful about giving credence to estimates that are made today. The level of rate increases depends not just upon the statement that I have made today but upon the reserves and the balances.

Given the grants that I have announced today, and the possible projected expenditure patterns, I have said that the rate increases next year are likely to be of the nature of the rate increases in the current year. I think hon. Members will find that they are rather lower than that. The increase will probably be 7·5 to 8 per cent. However, my point is that the level of rate increases depends essentially upon the budgets that local councils draw up during the next two or three months and upon their ability to make savings.

Rate Support Grant (Wales)

5.28 pm

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Nicholas Edwards): Mr. Speaker, with permission, I wish to make a statement about the Welsh rate support grant settlement for 1986-87.

I am today announcing to the Welsh Consultative Council on Local Government Finance the details of the 1986-87 rate support grant settlement. Copies of the text of my statement to the consultative council, together with a number of key statistical tables, have been placed in the Vote Office and in the Library of the House. The rate support grant report has been laid before the House today and will be debated in the usual way. A copy of the report has also been placed in the Library.

This settlement marks an important stage in the process of bringing Welsh local authority expenditure into line with the Government's plans. My strategy for 1986-87 reflects the commendable performance of Welsh local authorities in reducing the overspend against the Government's targets from around £50 million in 1981-82 to £4·5 million in 1985-86. The total increase in rates since 1979 has been kept to seven percentage points below the change in the retail prices index. This success in reining back current expenditure has enabled me to release additional resources for much needed capital investment.

Against that background, the 1986-87 settlement presents a challenge to local authorities in Wales. I acknowledge that in meeting it they will face difficult decisions. They will need to press for moderate pay settlements for their employees and find a way of absorbing any additional costs if they are to avoid taking the easy option of adding to the burden on ratepayers. Pay awards should not lead automatically to higher spending in either the public or private sectors, nor should they be passed straight on to customers. The aim should be to seek to absorb any additional costs through the better use of resources and by achieving better value for money. Good examples have already been set by many authorities in Wales in this respect.

I turn now to the details of the settlement. The main features confirm the intentions that I announced in July, subject only to modifications to reflect the reduced level of interest rates and revised estimates for specific and supplementary grants. The total of relevant expenditure provision accepted for grants is £1,597·1 million. This marginal reduction of £900,000 on the provisional figure announced in July allows for a reduction reflecting the fall in interest rates which has broadly been balanced by an increase in provision for financing additional capital expenditure. The total comprises £1,368·1 million for current expenditure and £229 million for non-current items.

Current expenditure provision — after taking into account the higher level of direct funding in the further education sector by the Manpower Services Commission — is £51 million, or 3·8 per cent. more than the expenditure underlying local authorities' budgets in 1985-86, while the total of relevant expenditure is about £75 million, or 4 9 per cent. more than the comparable budgeted total for the present year.

Aggregate Exchequer grant, as announced in July, will be £1,067 million, comprising £169·4 million for specific grants, £19·6 million for transport supplementary grant, £2·2 million for national parks supplementary grant and £875·8 million for the rate support grants. Domestic rate relief remains unchanged at 18½p in the pound, which costs £25·8 million, leaving £850 million as block grant. After deducting £600,000 for payments to specified bodies, the amount available for distribution to local authorities is £849·4 million.

The aggregate Exchequer grant of £1,067 million is £52·8 million or 5·2 per cent. more than the aggregate Exchequer grant provision in the main report for the current year, and represents 66·8 per cent. of relevant expenditure, as against an effective rate in the current financial year of 66·6 per cent. Broadly speaking, therefore, the level of grant support has been maintained.

The settlement marks the end of individual local authority expenditure targets, which have been abolished for 1986-87. They will be replaced by a tougher block grant system which provides a fairer method of containing expenditure. The precise mechanisms have been developed in close consultation with the local authority associations and in particular take account of proposals put forward by the Welsh Counties Committee. The associations accept this as a reasonable price to pay for moving away from selective controls and for restoring a greater measure of local accountability.

Under these arrangements, for any given increase in expenditure there will be a reduction in grant. This means that a significantly higher proportion of costs will be borne by the ratepayer as spending is increased. Conversely, the new system also offers positive financial rewards to ratepayers in authorities where spending is held down. There will be significant rating benefits for authorities which budget to reduce spending or which increase spending by less than the anticipated rise in inflation.

If local authorities spend in line with this settlement, the amount of grant claimed will equal the amount of grant available. If aggregate spending exceeds the level of expenditure provision, and there is an underclaim of grant, the margin of resources will remain available for local government spending in Wales. I shall await local authorities' 1986-87 budget returns before deciding how any such surplus grant might be distributed. In setting their budgets councils should not assume that they will benefit from the redistribution of any resources released by overspending.

This settlement is a good one for Wales. The increases in relevant expenditure and in aggregate Exchequer grant are higher than the forecast rate for inflation and provide a realistic basis for next year's budgets. Rate increases, on average, need be no more than 3 or 4 per cent. Spending at the settlement level would be the same in real terms as spending in 1979-80. Local authorities can plan ahead secure in the knowledge that this provides the degree of stability in expenditure that they have been seeking.

Both domestic and business ratepayers have the right to expect their local authorities to manage services, on their behalf, in an efficient and cost-effective way. This settlement recognises that right and provides a solid framework for progress. I sincerely hope that local authorities will meet the challenge and the opportunities that it offers for the benefit of the communities which they seek to serve. I ask hon. Members on all sides to support them in that task.

I commend my proposals for the Welsh rate support grant settlement to the House.

Mr. Barry Jones (Alyn and Deeside): The Secretary of State, not unnaturally, put a self-congratulatory gloss on his complex statement. Has he forgotten that the overall cut in grant in real terms between 1978-79 and 1985-86 has been 13·4 per cent.? That is a statistical way of saying that local councils have taken a severe financial beating from the Welsh Office.

At the same time, have not the Government permitted a blizzard of unemployment in Wales and permitted the consequential and unprecedented demands upon council services which were grossly underfunded? Is there not now another cut, albeit small?

Have not the Welsh district authorities warned the Secretary of State that the average Welsh domestic rate bill might increase by 8 per cent. or more, and that Welsh county rates increases will be significantly above the inflation rate — so I am informed? The right hon. Gentleman has failed to protect the budget. The local authorities say that we are short of about £27 million to stay level with this year.

Are not district councils in Wales astonished that the right hon. Gentleman has presented a settlement based on grant mechanisms which are so complex that even council treasurers are perplexed? Depending upon the order in which the figures are fed into the Welsh Office computer, does the Secretary of State agree that there will be a change in the grant-related poundages of 1p for 15 councils? Will that system not create problems for certain counties, not least for West Glamorgan? Will the right hon. Gentleman concede that he has espoused an unsatisfactory system? Will he promise next year to adopt a simpler and more equitable approach? Will he call a joint conference to tackle the issues by 1987-88?

The right hon. Gentleman purred with satisfaction at the increase in capital investment. I acknowledge sincerely the increases to which he pointed. They are a most welcome development, but they merely edge towards the levels of previous years. Has the right hon. Gentleman forgotten that, notwithstanding his boast of a £31 million housing increase, the allocation is £60 million down on the allocation for 1983-84—general election year.

Are not local authorities deeply apprehensive about the settlement and their ability to meet pay and price increases? The right hon. Gentleman has presented the settlement in the most favourable light, but has he not masked the fact that authorities might make cuts of 3 to 4 per cent., since the increase in current expenditure is insufficient to keep pace with the movement in costs? Has the right hon. Gentleman forgotten local authorities' difficulties in meeting the pay claims of their white collar staff, the police, the firemen and the teachers, with their end-loading complications and settlements above 5 per cent.? Here is the flaw in the settlement. What extra cash does the right hon. Gentleman have to fund the teachers' increase? Does he have the extra money in the way in which the Secretary of State for the Environment said that he had the money? The House would like a comment from the right hon. Gentleman on the question of teachers' pay.

Will not joint financing schemes with health authorities now come under extremely severe pressure? This settlement will not help authorities to meet the needs of the elderly in the community, remembering that the legitimate demands of the elderly and disabled are increasing hugely year by year. In other words, are the compassionate plans at risk at county level?

Is it not a fact that the sums advanced are insufficient? We find this a depressing statement. Where does it make amends for the savage cuts that have occurred in previous years? Money is not being given back. There is still a trend, for all its dressing up by the right hon. Gentleman, of cuts, and it is backed by a harsh regime. The right hon. Gentleman is not acknowledging sufficiently the crisis of unemployment and bad housing in the south eastern valleys of Wales and in the steel townships. All councils in Wales will be deeply disappointed by his statement.

Mr. Edwards: The hon. Gentleman referred to an overall cut in real grant since the Conservatives came to office. I repeat what my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment said in connection with the English statement, that it was a deliberate decision to transfer some of the responsibility for financing local government from the central taxpayer to the ratepayer. I remind the hon. Gentleman that in Wales this year there has been no further switch in that direction. We have maintained the percentage grant. Indeed, we have marginally increased it this year.

The hon. Gentleman talked about a severe financial beating, but in fact both provision and aggregate grant are being increased by more than the expected rate of inflation. He made the usual gloomy and pessimistic rating forecasts. In the period for which I have been responsible, the Welsh Office has had a good record in forecasting the likely rate pattern. There is no reason why, if expenditure is in line with provision and the use of balances is at about the same level as last year, average rate increases in Wales should be more than the going rate of inflation. Indeed, there are a number of counties in which we expect to see rate reducions. Dyfed is one such county.

The hon. Gentleman talked about the complexities of the grant mechanism, and we can agree that the systems are complex. The mechanisms that we are using this year, particularly the system that is replacing the target mechanism that we previously employed, has been designed in close consultation with the local authorities in Wales, and they believe that this is a considerable improvement.

The hon. Gentleman talked about increases in capital expenditure. I am glad that he acknowledges the substantial additional capital provision that we have made, and have made for a number of years, thanks to the way in which Welsh local authorities have been able to hold down current expenditure.

I told the House in the summer that we were now within 1 per cent. of the target that we originally set, which was designed simply to stop the headlong annual increase in spending and to get expenditure back to the level of 1978-79, when the Conservatives came to office, and this settlement should enable Welsh local authorities to do that.

I was asked about pay and price provision. The House must understand that if there are large pay settlements, someone must pay, either through the rates or through a loss of services. From the education point of view I confirm what my right hon. Friend said, in that we have not included in this provision the money that the Government have said will be on the table if there is a settlement that takes proper account of the conditions of services and the other requirements that the Government have made clear are necessary for a settlement of the education dispute. We have made provision for a 7·5 per cent. increase in police pay.

The hon. Gentleman said that cuts of 3 or 4 per cent. might be required. I was not clear what he meant, because cuts in the level of expenditure by local authorities will lead to increases in grant, and I emphasise that if authorities overspend on the basis of this provision they will get less grant. Authorities which reduce their expenditure will get additional grant, and their ratepayers will benefit directly.

I remind the hon. Gentleman that West Glamorgan does well out of the settlement. We expect that if it settles expenditure in line with the assumptions that I have set out, there should be increases in West Glamorgan on the rates bill of about 2·5 per cent. That is below the general level of inflation.

I was asked by the hon. Gentleman about specific services. The way in which local authorities decide to spend their money is for them. They must decide their priorities, but they should remember that they also have a responsibility to the ratepayers who fund them.

Sir Anthony Meyer (Clwyd, North-West): Is not the helpless floundering of the hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones) the clearest possible acknowledgement of the success of my right hon. Friend in achieving a settlement that is regarded as satisfactory more or less throughout Wales?

Will my right hon. Friend comment on the fact that possibly the greatest threat to ratepayers in Wales comes not so much from Labour councillors, who know that they carry some responsibility in these matters, as from the existence in many counties, and particularly in the county of Clwyd, of a large block of so-called independents, who hold the casting vote and who refuse to make the necessary economies that would enable efficient administration to be carried out at reasonable cost?

Mr. Edwards: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. If the council in Clwyd can limit the year-to-year growth in its spending to 5 per cent., I expect that it will have a similar increase in rates. Indeed, in Colwyn and other districts—for example, in Glyndŵr—I expect that the rates could be held at their present level, or even reduced.

Mr. D. E. Thomas (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy): How does the Secretary of State equate his statement to the consultative body that local authorities should be expected to maintain services at their present levels with the massive cuts in the nursery school programme approved this morning by Clwyd county council? Will the right hon. Gentleman look again at his statement about the work of the Audit Commission? Is he satisfied that the commission has taken sufficient account of the particular problems of local authorities in Wales in its overall studies of England and Wales?

As for grant-related expenditure, the right hon. Gentleman's Department admits that this is a rough and ready calculation of the relative needs of various authorities. Is it not time that there was a more clearly agreed indicator related to the social needs of areas? Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the rent increase of 65p a week will itself be an added burden on many low income families in Wales? Is he also aware that the transport supplementary grant capital spending is totally inadequate to meet the kind of road programme that local authorities in Wales really need?

In relation to the national park supplementary grant, I fully endorse the right hon. Gentleman's statement criticising those county councils and local authorities which are not funding their part of that programme. Will he ensure in future that it is withheld from their overall block grant if they are not prepared to spend that money on their national park functions?

Mr. Edwards: The national parks supplementary grant has been increased by not more than 9 per cent. and that takes account of the requirements being placed on the national parks authority.

The hon. Gentleman referred to the transport supplementary grant, where the system has been changed and the scale of the projects for which grant is provided has been altered. I believe that grant is in line with the assessed needs for grant on the basis of our negotiations with the local authorities.

The hon. Gentleman says that we are dealing with a rough and ready system. Yes, but it is a system that we discuss at great length with the local authority associations and we seek to build into it all the points that they make. We made various alterations this year. It is a basis not for making absolute judgments about the level of services required in a particular area, but for obtaining a fair distribution between the Welsh local authorities. It follows from that that if one authority gets more, it will inevitably have to come from one of the other authorities.

The Audit Commission has spelt out particularly clearly the enormous scope for savings that exist to the benefit of ratepayers from local government in Wales, as in England. The hon. Gentleman referred to expenditure in Clwyd and I have already pointed out that Clwyd has been set a reasonable objective. If he did not refer to Gwynedd, as might have been expected, it is because if Gwynedd county council can limit its spending growth I anticipate that there should be a rate reduction of over 3 per cent. for the ratepayers there.

Several Hon. Members rose—

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is a Back-Benchers' day so I shall endeavour to call all those who are rising but I ask them to be brief in their questions, please.

Mr. Ian Grist (Cardiff, Central): I warmly congratulate my right hon. Friend on his statement this afternoon. What will its effect be on south Glamorgan, Cardiff and the Vale of Glamorgan? Can he name any authority in Wales which has privatised any of its services and with what result?

Mr. Edwards: Yes, some local authorities have privatised and have begun to show savings. There are significant savings to be made. I know that the Welsh local authorities have been listening seriously to the suggestions put to them by the Audit Commission and I hope that that will lead to further substantial savings.

The south Glamorgan authority made heavy use of reserves in the present year and as a result it is likely to increase its precept above the general rate of inflation. If it spends at a 5 per cent. increase this year we could see an increase in rates of more than 6 per cent. On the other hand, the Cardiff city authority could have a small increase in rates if it holds expenditure levels to that kind of figure. There is a similar possibility of a substantial reduction in the Vale of Glamorgan.

Mr. Donald Coleman (Neath): As has already been said of the English rate support grant settlement, the

[Mr. Donald Coleman]

Secretary of State for Wales' announcement is complex — the most complex yet. There is no doubt that treasurers in Wales will be perplexed.

Is the Secretary of State aware that, for west Glamorgan, there are signs that, despite this announcement today, there will still be considerable increases in rates next year? Will he undertake not to be disposed to penalise the county for taking action that arises directly from the rate support grant settlement?

What provision has been made to help the district councils deal with the considerable problems of local authority housing in Wales?

Mr. Edwards: I have already announced substantial increases in capital allocations, which will make a considerable contribution to the problem of local authority housing in Wales.

I must make it clear that, because of the relative success of Welsh local authorities in holding down their current expenditure and their rate increases in recent years, this is a much easier settlement for Welsh local authorities to achieve than will generally be the position in England. They have been meeting the objectives that we set over a period and they now find themselves in a position where there is a substantial increase above the anticipated level of inflation in aggregate Exchequer grant and in current and relevant expenditure and that position compares favourably with England.

The hon. Gentleman's pessimism about west Glamorgan is misplaced. It may go back to some of the figures that we looked at when we were considering the original proposals for the settlement in the summer. As a result of representations made by the Welsh counties and certain changes in the technical system since then, the position of west Glamorgan has substantially improved and I do not anticipate the necessity for more than low rate increases for districts in west Glamorgan.

Mr. Stefan Terlezki (Cardiff, West): I commend and congratulate my right hon. Friend on presenting us with a good package. It is good housekeeping on behalf of the Principality. Will there be any cuts in services in Cardiff, whether in transport, health or housing, or is he satisfied that we shall continue to go from strength to strength under this package?

Mr. Edwards: There is no doubt that Cardiff is in a position to provide a satisfactory level of services without increasing rates. There is no doubt that it should be able to hold its rate increases to a relatively low level and increase expenditure in line with the increase in costs. However, as I have explained, the impact on the ratepayers of south Glamorgan's decision to use a lot of money from its balances last year will be felt in the rate bills of ratepayers in the area.

Mr. Donald Anderson (Swansea, East): Does the Secretary of State at least recognise that if there is less criticism this year from Labour Members and local authorities it is because the annual reduction, year on year, in the proportion of local government expenditure covered by the Government at last appears to have stabilised, although the cumulative damage over the years since 1978-79 remains?

Does the Secretary of State assume that the sale of council houses has now peaked? Why are Welsh local authorities allowed to retain a smaller proportion of those receipts than their English counterparts?

Mr. Edwards: They are also allowed to retain a larger proportion of receipts of sales of other capital assets. We have taken a decision on the overall balance, taking the allocations into account as well, which we believe is to the greatest possible advantage of Welsh local authorities.

The accumulated damage is that rate increases in Wales have been 7 per cent. below the increase in inflation and we have been able to get expenditure back to the level of 1978-79 at which we can offer stability to the local authorities in Wales. I have told them that if they could meet the Government's targets and objectives they not only had the prospect of being able to give a satisfactory settlement to their ratepayers but they had the prospect of stability, in the knowledge that they would continue to receive the same overall level of provision. We have honoured that undertaking. We have now got to the point where they can look to the future and plan for it with a great deal of confidence.

Mr. Keith Best (Ynys Môn): Is not the Opposition's allegation of complexity designed to camouflage the fact that this is a good settlement and they do not know how to attack it? Is not the message to Welsh authorities that, if they can contain current expenditure, greater autonomy and greater capital expenditure will follow?

Mr. Edwards: Yes. If expenditure is held below our assumptions, there will be additional grant and an even greater opportunity to reduce the rate burden. That is certainly true in my hon. Friend's part of Wales, where there is a real opportunity to reduce rates. I hope that that opportunity will be taken and that there will be a real reduction in rates in Gwynedd.

Dr. Roger Thomas (Carmarthen): How will today's statement alleviate the problems faced by the highways department in the right hon. Gentleman's and my county? Is he aware that Dyfed has one third of the total road mileage in Wales, but that roads are crumbling and bridges are collapsing?

Mr. Edwards: The GREA system takes full account of total road mileage. That is one of the factors on which the assessments are made and the grant distributed after discussion and negotiation with all the counties in Wales. The settlement for Dyfed is extremely favourable and should allow the maintenance of services and a significant reduction in rates.

Mr. Keith Raffan (Delyn): I congratulate my right hon. Friend on obtaining yet again such a favourable settlement for Wales, which is clearly shown by the way in which it has thrown the Opposition. Does he agree that in moving from a system with targets to one without it is extremely important that local authorities do not exceed their targets if they want to secure a better launching position in a tougher grant regime? Does he agree that Clwyd county council especially should heed that point by concentrating on its statutory obligations?

Mr. Edwards: The effect of the new regime for ratepayers will be very severe if there is any excess spending, but the rewards will be substantial if spending is kept down. The system that we have introduced will give real choice to local authorities.

Mr. Richard Livsey (Brecon and Radnor): Why have Powys and Clwyd county councils been singled out for a block grant increase of only 1·8 per cent. when Powys is considering closing 13 schools and decimating the education system? How will the settlement ease that situation?

Mr. Edwards: When the hon. Gentleman last made accusations about decimating the education system, which was during an election campaign, he falsely invented the threatened closure of a school. The allegation is equally false today. Powys comes out relatively badly because it is a relatively high spender in relation to GREA, but its ratepayers have relatively low rate bills. The hon. Gentleman should consider the rate bills being paid and the level of expenditure in relation to GREA.

Mr. Gwilym Jones (Cardiff, North): I am sure that my right hon. Friend's abolition of individual targets and the provision for expenditure increases above the likely rate of inflation will be warmly welcomed, but my constituents are apprehensive about excessive rate increases by South Glamorgan county council. My right hon. Friend has twice mentioned reductions in balances by that council this year, which had been called for on many occasions by my right hon. Friend and others, but this was a county council election year. Now that an election is no longer in prospect, what action does my right hon. Friend contemplate to encourage the council not to go in for excessive spending which will result in excessive rate increases for my constituents?

Mr. Edwards: My hon. Friend has given the answer himself. There is no doubt that excessive spending will result in high rate increases. Electors in the area must understand that that will be the result of decisions taken by the local authority.

In an earlier answer, I referred to getting spending back to the year in which we took office. I should have referred to 1979-80, not 1978-79.

Mr. Ted Rowlands (Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney): The Secretary of State talks approvingly about reining in current expenditure, but should he not make it clear that that means cutting nursery education, provision of school books and other educational materials? Does his statement not also assume that the teachers' dispute will drag on and on?

Mr. Edwards: No, it means none of those things. It means that local authorities have choices to make. It means that when there are substantial reductions in the number of pupils, as there have been, local education authorities must adjust provision. It also means that we have been able to provide substantial additional capital resources for local government in Wales as a result of holding current expenditure. The hon. Gentleman does no service to anyone by making suggestions of that kind.

Mr. Robert Harvey (Clwyd, South-West): I warmly congratulate my right hon. Friend on his statement. Will he confirm, however, that it does not allow for any increase in teachers' pay beyond the current guidelines put forward by the Government?

Mr. Edwards: The position was clearly spelt out earlier by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment. Any settlement which does not meet the Government's condition that it must be related to terms of service and assessment is not provided for in the arrangements that we have made. If an acceptable settlement were reached, however, there is scope for additional money to be placed on the table by the Government. That has always been our position. Those resources are not built into the settlement that I have put to the House today. My right hon. Friend spelt this out precisely and in some detail. I refer my hon. Friend to that statement.

Mr. Ron Davies (Caerphilly): Does the Secretary of State agree that the best that can be said of the statement is that it does not impose any immediate further burden on Welsh authorities? Does he also agree, however, that when the current round of pay negotiations is completed and the teachers' dispute is ultimately settled there will undoubtedly be further pressure on Welsh education authorities and district councils which will inevitably mean more cuts and further reductions in services as the year unfolds?

Mr. Edwards: I do not think that it means more cuts at all. Far from being the best that can be said, it is clear from the questions asked today that the hon. Gentleman's initial comment is about the worst that could be said about the settlement. The Opposition have worked themselves up as much as they can, but they cannot make out that it is other than a good settlement.

Dr. John Marek (Wrexham): Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that, having used jackboot methods to control local authority expenditure in Wales for six years, in his statement today he anticipates wholly unrealistic percentage rises in wages and salaries?

Mr. Edwards: If the hon. Gentleman believes that local and central Government should automatically endorse and pay every claim and settlement that is made, he believes that we should return to a period of uncontrolled inflation which might indeed be the precursor of the jackboot, as it has been in the past. The most disastrous thing for a free society is uncontrolled inflation.

Mr. Allan Rogers (Rhondda): What will be the impact of the settlement on the 18,000 people in the Rhondda valley who are wating for improvement grants?

Mr. Edwards: I made a separate announcement about increased capital allocation for Welsh authorities. The hon. Gentleman already knows what that settlement is.

Westland Helicopter Company

6.9 pm

Mr. Denzil Davies (Llanelli): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 10, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the future of the Westland helicopter company and the importance of that company to our national defence interests."

Since the statement by the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry on Monday, new facts have emerged and new developments have taken place. I submit that the matter is clearly specific as it relates directly to a company which for many years has supplied military helicopters to the Ministry of Defence and the armed services of the Crown. The matter is important as the success of Westland is crucial, not only to the company's thousands of employees and its shareholders but also for the defence of this country. Its future is now at a substantial risk.

The matter is also urgent, because decisions that could be irreversible and damaging to the national interests are now imminent. I submit that this matter should now take precedence over other business. We have had competing and conflicting statements from two Cabinet Ministers, we are about to go into recess, and it is vital that before doing so the collective voice of this House — even if the Government do not have a collective voice—on such an important matter should now be heard.

Mr. Speaker: The right hon. Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that he believes should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the future of the Westland helicopter company and the importance of that company to our national defence interests."

I have listened with great care to what the right hon. Gentleman has said, and he knows that my sole duty in considering an application under Standing Order No. 10 is to decide whether it should be given priority over the business already set down for this evening or for tomorrow. I regret that I cannot find that the matter he has raised meets all the criteria laid down under the Standing Order; therefore, I cannot submit his application to the House.

Points of Order

6.11 pm

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I would welcome your advice on how we can protect the reputation of this House from what I feel is a serious distortion and misrepresentation of what happened yesterday. You were in the Chair during last night's important debate on Members' interests. I seek your advice on a press release — which may be in contempt of the House—that was issued by the leader of the Liberal party. It is entitled "Double standards anger Steel", but I should point out that the release seems to be devoid of any standards whatsoever. In it the right hon. Gentleman states:

"MPs voted . . . against a call by Mr. Steel and SDP leader Dr. David Owen for the amounts" earned

"to be declared"

in the register.

Will you confirm, Mr. Speaker, that in making this important clarion call, neither the leader of the Liberal party not the leader of the SDP voted, spoke or even appeared in the Chamber? Will you also confirm — because this is important for the standing of this House —that the only member of the alliance who did speak had not even signed the amendment that he regarded as being of such importance? Will you further confirm that, when it came to a vote on sanctions to implement the register, a mere handful of alliance Members were among the 128 who voted in favour of it?

The right hon. Gentleman also says in the press release that we apply different standards and that "they"—the House but not he or his party—

"did vote for a register for journalists"

and

"broadcasters".

Will you confirm that not one alliance voice was raised against that motion and that not one alliance vote was registered against that motion? Is not the right hon. Gentleman deliberately overlooking the fact that the House unanimously agreed to ask the Select Committee to investigate as a matter of urgency the declaration of amounts?

The press statement ends by accusing the rest of us of "damaging the standing of parliamentary democracy". Would not you agree, Mr. Speaker, that the leader of the Liberal party has done a grave disservice to this House and that his distortion has damaged the standing of the House of Commons and parliamentary democracy? Out of respect for you, Mr. Speaker, I shall not call the leader of the Liberal party a pathetic hypocrite, but I am entitled to my thoughts.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Let me deal with one thing at a time. It was my impression that last night's debate—I am sure that anyone who was present and heard it would agree—was in the best traditions of our parliamentary debates——

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am on my feet. As to what was said and who voted or did not vote, that is all recorded in Hansard and in the Votes and Proceedings of the House. It is not a matter for me.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. A right hon. Member of this House has issued a press release complaining about action that is damaging to this House, even though he was not present and did not vote. I understand that he and his right hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) were appearing on television and earning fees. Such behaviour is bad for this House. We are used to being misrepresented by the Liberals within our constituencies, but surely you can do something to protect the reputation of this House.

Several Hon. Members rose—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Hon. Members should not wave order papers at me. I am not responsible as Speaker of this House for press releases that are issued. That is not a matter for me.

Mr. David Steel (Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale): I shall happily supply you, Mr. Speaker, with a copy of the press release, and I am sure that you will find nothing in it that is out of order. However, there is another tradition in the House——

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): What about the British School of Motoring? Declare your interest.

Mr. Steel: —that if one hon. Member raises an attack against another, he gives notice. I received no such notice, but nevertheless word reached me.

I do not raise with you a point of order as to why the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore), in whose name last night's motion stood, did not vote; neither do I ask where the leader of the Labour party or the leader of the Conservative party were. The hon. Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) has given the game away. They are consumed with jealousy because my right hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) and I were at 10 o'clock last night appearing live on ITN—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. A point is being made to me, but I cannot hear it.

Mr. Steel: In response to sedentary interjections, I should add that we did so without fee, which would have been declared had their been one. As for only one member of the alliance speaking, I am not aware that it is normal for more than one member of our party to be called. As for those who voted on the amendment last night, 64 per cent. of members of the alliance parties were present but only 22 per cent. of members of the Labour party.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Skinner rose——

Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark (Birmingham, Selly Oak) rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am on my feet. This is a Back-Bench day and many Back Benchers wish to speak in the debate. It would be perfectly legitimate to raise these matters during the next debate when hon. Members may put it to the Leader of the House that the House should not adjourn until we have debated Members' interests all over again. We cannot have a re-run of last night's debate during points of order. I am not prepared to allow that.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: If it is a point of order.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: Will the House not hear points of order?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member can raise a point of order, but we must not have a re-run of last night's debate.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: I do not want a re-run.

Mr. Speaker: I shall hear the point of order.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: I would never challenge your judgment, Mr. Speaker, as you know. I wish only to ask for your humble guidance. [Interruption.] It is a small humbleness, then.

I want to ask what you meant, Mr. Speaker, by the "best traditions" of parliamentary debates, in which most hon. Members fully believe. I thought that, on a private Member's day, if hon. Members put their name to a motion and that motion is then called in this honourable House, as two of the so-called leaders of the so-called alliance were, it would be more proper if they were here attending to their duties and your call, Mr. Speaker, instead of earning seventy-five quid plus a taxi fare.

Mr. Skinner rose——

Mr. Ron Davies (Caerphilly) rose——

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies) has given me notice that he wishes to raise a point of order.

Mr. Davies: I wish to raise a different matter relating to events yesterday before the cause of the points of order which have been brought to your attention, Mr. Speaker. I draw your attention to the remarks recorded in column 161 of Hansard during the exchange between the Chancellor of the Exchequer and my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Mr. Sedgemore). In replying to a question by my hon. Friend, the Chancellor stated:

"He poses"—

referring to my hon. Friend—

"as the man who got things moving . . . Listen to this. He did not even start — Hansard will show that this is so — his seemingly unending series of allegations until after my statement of 17 July informing the House that the fraud squad had already been called in."—[Official Report, 17 December 1985; Vol. 89, c. 161.]

There is a clear implication in the Chancellor's statement that when he made his statement on 17 July he had not been pressed, encouraged or questioned by any other hon. Member. That is not true.

On 23 October 1984, my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) raised questions with the Chancellor. On 11 November 1984, my hon. Friend raised a question with the Attorney-General and called on him to request an inquiry by the fraud squad. Other hon. Members, including the Opposition spokesperson, my hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald), and my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch raised questions with the Chancellor. My hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock wrote to the Prime Minister asking her to set up a special committee of inquiry. The reply to that letter was made five days before the Chancellor's statement. The Prime Minister declined that request for a special inquiry.

I submit that yesterday's events, as recorded in Hansard, are inaccurate. They clearly show the Chancellor's intention to imply that he had not been pressed by other hon. Members into taking action on the banking allegations. Will you use your good offices, Mr. Speaker, to encourage the Chancellor to make a statement in the House so that the record can be put straight?

[Mr. Davies]

Mr. Speaker: What I can confirm is that Hansard faithfully recorded what was said in the House. I accept that the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner), who raised a point of order on this subject, reminded the House that he had tabled a question on 23 October. I am sorry that I did not manage to fit the hon. Member for Bolsover——

Mr. Skinner: It was 1984—that is the important point.

Mr. Speaker: —into questions yesterday.

Mr. Skinner: I know that.

Mr. Speaker: I said to him that, by good fortune, this subject had come up in the ballot for the Consolidation Fund debate. I gave him an undertaking that he would be called in the debate.

Mr. Robert Adley (Christchurch): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am sorry that I have to make this point. Yesterday, I was the first Member—I do not wish to discuss Members' interests; I am raising a point of order—to raise with you, immediately after the right hon. Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams) had sat down, the question of the absence of the six right hon. and hon. Members. You said to me——

Mr. Speaker: Order. We have dealt with that matter. We cannot discuss it further. Is the hon. Member referring to the debate on Members' interests?

Mr. Adley: I am referring to what you said to me yesterday afternoon during the points of order.

Mr. Speaker: We dealt with that yesterday afternoon.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. You referred to the fact that Hansard faithfully records the truth. Will you confirm that Hansard records that the Liberals did not call an amendment yesterday for compulsory registration of Members' interests? Hansard records only an expression of belief in recommendations and makes no reference to compulsory registration. The amendment on compulsory registration was mine and it was not backed by the leader of the Liberal party or the leader of the Social Democratic party. Will you confirm that point for those outside?

Mr. Speaker: I can confirm that the Liberal party, as the House well knows, tabled three amendments yesterday. I was able to select only one for debate. I can confirm also what the hon. Member says about his amendment.

Mr. Skinner rose——

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Skinner, as a compensation for yesterday.

Mr. Skinner: If I or any other hon. Member wanted to raise the issue of double standards with respect to the leader of the Liberal party or the leader of the Social Democratic party, there is a way of doing so, as you have said, Mr. Speaker. An hon. Member can write to the Privileges Committee. I should like to know as briefly as possible whether, in writing that letter, any Member who is making an application can refer—if these declarations must be made—to a Member's interests? For example, would the hon. Member for Stockton South (Mr. Wrigglesworth) have to declare all his directorships? Would the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan) have to declare that he is a representative for Encyclopaedia Britannica? Could we refer to the Japanese car that was loaned for several months to the leader of the Liberal party? Could we find out the amount of the golden handshake that went to the last leader of the Social Democratic party? Could we write in that letter that, although the alliance calls for the elimination of interests, between them the SDP and the Liberal party have 23 moonlighting jobs?

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I can clear up this matter for the benefit of the whole House. If there are such allegations, the proper course is for the hon. Member concerned to write to the Chairman of the Select Committee on Members' Interests.

Mr. David Penhaligon (Truro): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Will you confirm the idea that Hansard is accurate and records what happens in the House? Will you confirm that, in the 31 Divisions this parliamentary year, the leader of the Liberal party has voted 18 times and the leader of the Labour party 13 times? Do you agree that Parliament can only work if hon. Members come to the Chamber?

Mr. Speaker: I shall take Hansard and study it during the Christmas Recess.

BILLS PRESENTED

Financial Services

Mr. Secretary Brittan, supported by Mr. Secretary Younger, Mr. Secretary Edwards, Mr. Secretary King, Mr. Ian Stewart, Mr. Michael Howard and Mr. John Butcher, presented a Bill to regulate the carrying on of investment business; to make related provision with respect to insurance business and business carried on by friendly societies; to make new provision with respect to the official listing of securities, offers of unlisted securities, takeover offers and insider dealing; to make provision for securing reciprocity with other countries in respect of facilities for the provision of financial services; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time tomorrow and to be printed. [Bill 51.]

Tobacco Smoking (Public Places)

Mr. George Foulkes, supported by Mr. John Maxton, Mr. Roger Sims, Mr. John Home Robertson, Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours, Mr. Clement Freud, Mr. Laurie Pavitt, Mr. A. J. Beith, Mr. George Robertson, Dr. Norman A. Godman and Mr. Alfred Dubs, presented a Bill to limit smoking in public places; and for purposes connected therewith: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 7 February and to be printed. [Bill 52.]

Pensioners' Right to Heat, Light and Communications

6.29 pm

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, South): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to ensure the supply of gas and electricity for pensioner households; to abolish standing charges for pensioner consumers for gas, electricity and water; and to abolish telephone rentals for pensioners.

I thought that we would never reach my Bill. This is the third time that I have introduced it and I notice that many Members are already leaving the Chamber. Presumably they do not wish to discuss the way that the elderly are treated in our society.

The purpose of the Bill is to ensure that the supply of gas and electricity to pensioner households is maintained, that standing charges for gas and electricity and water for pensioners are abolished, and that telephone rentals are no longer charged for pensioner households.

The way in which the electricity and gas undertakings impose standing charges on consumers means that consumers of the lowest amounts pay, in effect, a higher unit cost for the supply of the services than the rest of the community. Yesterday, the Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security said:

"The charges reflect the necessary cost of keeping a supply available to the consumer in his own home for 24 hours a day. They cover the maintenance of the connection, meter-reading, accounting, billing and emergency services. The costs arise no matter how much or how little gas or electricity is consumed by the individual householder."—[Official Report, 17 December 1985; Vol. 89, c. 135.]

That may be true, but the effect is that the unit cost of supply for consumers of small amounts of electricity or gas is high. They still have to pay the standing charge irrespective of how large or small the bill is. Members of this place are paying the same standing charge on their salary of £16,000 a year as a pensioner household on a basic pension income of rather less than £40 a week. There is an obvious disparity.

The Government have recognised this in the past and they introduced a rebate scheme for the consumers of small amounts of electricity and gas. So that the standing charge would be no more than half of the bill for gas or electricity. This year, all the electricity boards and gas boards have phased out that scheme on the grounds that it benefited only slightly some pensioner households and operated mainly to support those who own second homes who wish to keep on security lighting or basic heating during the unoccupied winter months. I think that second homes are a scandal anyway, and it is certainly a scandal that the scheme should have been used to assist their owners.

I am suggesting that in future we should abolish standing charges for pensioner households. Society must recognise that pensioners need warmer homes. Secondly, we must recognise that the poverty in which pensioners live arises from the disgracefully low level of the basic pension. The abolition of standing charges is one way of assisting pensioners to alleviate that poverty.

On Government estimates, the cost of the abolition of standing charges for pensioners would be £300 million. That could be well paid for by Government income, which from British Gas was £731 million, £500 million of which was the levy. The other £231 million was paid in corporation tax. The income from standing charges was £600 million for gas and £550 million for electricity. The cost of abolishing standing charges could well be paid for out of reductions in levy payments to central Government. That would mean no overall unit increase in the cost of supplying gas or electricity. Any increase would clearly be disadvantageous to the rest of consumers as well as pensioner households.

We know that water charges have increased considerably over the past year. It is fairly obvious to many of us that the Government are increasing water charges continually, as they are increasing gas and electricity charges, as a prelude to the privatisation of those industries. There is an equally strong case for the abolition of standing charges for water supply.

The Bill proposes that the charge of telephone rentals for pensioners should be abolished. The unit cost of calls for pensioners tends to be high because they make few calls but rely on the telephone as a basic means of communication. They have to pay the same rental as anyone else and, therefore, the unit cost is higher.

British Telecom could well afford to make the concession available to pensioner households. Its profits this year are approaching £1·5 billion, and those moneys have been taken from all our purses.

The proposals which I have outlined would help pensioner households. The House should recognise the poverty in which many pensioner households are forced to live. Secondly, it should recognise that death through hypothermia is a serious problem for many elderly people. Thousands are dying each winter through hypothermia. That happens either because they cannot afford to put money in the slot meter to keep the gas fire alight or because they are too frightened of the size of the bill at the end of the winter quarter. The result is that they do not heat their homes properly.

It has gone six o'clock now and many pensioners throughout the country have already gone to bed because they cannot afford to heat their homes for the rest of the evening. That is the plight of many pensioners. If we wish to do something about the scandal of hypothermia, we should increase the level of the basic pension and recognise that the supply of gas and electricity is essential to pensioner households. The fuel boards should not be allowed to cut off the supply of either. Codes of practice are issued, but they are often weak and vague and need to be tightened and strengthened.

The House must recognise that, as pensioners become older, the need to heat their homes properly increases, even though it is estimated that well over two thirds of pensioners cannot afford to heat their homes to the required level. Their ability to campaign to make people in such places as this listen to them diminishes because of their advancing age and frailty.

We must recognise also how many of our pensioners have suffered. I remind the House that at least two thirds of pensioner households are occupied by women, who are often single. Many of them are suffering badly from the lack of a reasonable pension, which many men enjoy because they had a longer working life. Poverty in old age is partly the result of discrimination during the individual's working life.

During election campaigns, many candidates are approached on the issues of fuel debt and the cost of electricity and gas for pensioner households. I am sure that many who are successful in being elected to this place make promises to do something about these problems. I have been contacted by many increasingly active pensioner action groups throughout the country. They have been writing to their Members of Parliament because they are no longer prepared to be treated as objects of charity and patronised. Instead, they are organising themselves and taking action to improve their circumstances. They have collated an interesting collection of replies from individual Members who support the measure which I am introducing.

[Mr. Jeremy Corbyn]

I hope that the House will grant leave for the Bill to be read a Second time and will enact it. I hope also that it will do something to change the structure of gas and electricity payments. We are living in a self-satisfied age in which many of us ignore the plight of many pensioners and allow the elderly to die through hypothermia. At the same time, society ensures that they pay through the nose for gas and electricity. The Bill will not solve the problem of poverty among the elderly, but it will go some way toward recognising the plight in which they live. I hope that the House will support it.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Jeremy Corbyn, Mr. Chris Smith, Mr. Tony Benn, Mr. Dave Nellist, Mr. Tom Clarke, Mr. Dennis Skinner, Mr. Harry Cohen, Miss Joan Maynard, Mr. Robert Wareing, Mr. Tony Banks, Ms. Jo Richardson, and Ms. Clare Short.

Pensioners' Right to Heat, Light and Communications

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn accordingly presented a Bill to ensure the supply of gas and electricity for pensioner households; to abolish standing charges for pensioner consumers for gas, electricity and water; and to abolish telephone rentals fo pensioners: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 14 February and to be printed. [Bill 53.]

Adjournment (Christmas)

Motion made, and Question proposed,

That this House at its rising on Friday 20th December do adjourn until Monday 13th January, and that the House shall not adjourn on Friday 20th December until Mr. Speaker shall have reported the Royal Assent to any Acts which have been agreed upon by both Houses.—[Mr. Biffen.]

6.38 pm

Mr. Alfred Morris (Manchester, Wythenshawe): I must put it very strongly to the Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons at the very outset of tonight's debate that this House should not adjourn until such time as the Secretary of State for Transport has made a definitive oral statement on the future control and operation of Manchester international airport. It is an extremely urgent matter which has been under consideration by the Department of Transport for many months.

Manchester airport, which is in my constituency, is of paramount importance to my constituents. It is by far the largest employer. The airport's future is, as the House knows, also profoundly important to the north-west region as a whole. It is the major British airport outside London and one of the fastest growing in Europe. Its achievements as a public enterprise for more than 40 years are, by any standards and by common consent, an outstanding success story. That success is now jeopardised by what is widely regarded in Manchester as a most scandalous abuse of political power. It is essential that the House should be put in the picture before we rise for the Christmas recess on Friday.

Earlier this year, Manchester city council, which owns and controls the airport in partnership with Greater Manchester county council, had to face the prospect of losing its partner because of the Local Government Act 1985. The city was not convinced that the airport's best interests would be served by either of the options covered in section 40 of the Act. A joint committee involving 10 local authorities would be unwieldy and unsatisfactory and the transfer of the county's interest in the airport to the passenger transport authority posed even greater problems. The objectives of the airport and the PTA were seen by people of all persuasions to be incompatible.

A concern common to both options was finance. Manchester airport, if it is to consolidate and develop the significant gains that it has made over recent years, must spend many millions of pounds further to develop and enhance its facilities. Neither a local authority nor a PTA-funded structure offered any scope for that crucial commitment to be met.

At the time that the city was considering those options, the Secretary of State for Transport introduced his White Paper on airports policy. It confirmed that the Government's intention was to introduce legislation to enforce the restructuring of local authority airports into Companies Act companies. Paragraph 9.15 of the White Paper confirmed that shares in such companies could be held, initially at least, by their local authority owners. Manchester recognised the undesirability of seeking to restructure the airport twice in little more than 12 months, and so produced proposals to create a public limited company with effect from 1 April 1986.

The proposals had overwhelming advantages: the ability to secure funding on the open market, the involvement of all the district councils in the company's affairs, the opportunity both further to underline the commercial orientation of the airport and to place the day-to-day management of the company firmly in the hands of the airport's senior management, and leaving the responsibility for strategy and policy development where it would rightly belong—with the shareholders. All the shares were to be held by local authorities, with Manchester city council as the majority shareholder. If the case for that is fairly examined, it will be seen to be wholly reasonable in terms at once of equity, of current law and of the Government's proposals.

The PLC proposals were subsequently agreed by all the district councils in October and they were seconded by the Conservative-controlled Trafford borough council. Yet before the ink on that agreement was dry, a campaign began that is said to have involved the Under-Secretary of State for Transport, the hon. Member for Worcestershire, South (Mr. Spicer), to overturn the agreement. The aim was to deny the people of Manchester their undoubted rights in relation to the airport.

Recognising that they had little or no power to intervene, the Government embarked upon a campaign to undermine the proposals that were unanimously agreed by the district councils last October. I am reliably informed that the Under-Secretary of State spoke to Councillor Warbrick, the leader of Trafford borough council, to point out the error of his ways in having backed the October proposals. If the Under-Secretary did so, it was a most scandalous abuse of his office as a Minister, and one for which he must be made to account before the House goes into recess.

Mr. Tony Lloyd (Stretford): Is my right hon. Friend aware that, as a Trafford ratepayer, I approached the district auditor and asked him to look into the behaviour of Trafford council in forgoing the asset values that it clearly wants to give to the private sector? Is he further aware that when charges are levelled about a conspiracy reaching ministerial level, that conspiracy actually goes much further—indeed, as high as the Prime Minister, who has been involved in the campaign. The hon. Member for Manchester, Withington (Mr. Silvester) wrote a letter, a copy of which is in my possession, in which he said:

"The PLC cannot proceed without Ridley's report. Ridley must refuse to approve the present scheme and wait until he has powers under the proposed Bill."

There was never any intention of allowing Manchester city council and the district councils to go ahead with the scheme. It was always planned to sabotage it—the question was: who would sabotage it?

Mr. Morris: My hon. Friend makes an important intervention. I hope that the Leader of the House will examine the document to which he referred. There is a smell of scandal. I have not myself seen all the documents. However, I know that in Greater Manchester there is strong feeling that there must now be an urgent inquiry into a matter which is of the first importance for ratepayers throughout the conurbation. My hon. Friend mentioned his approach to the district auditor, which emphasises the importance of the matter for Trafford ratepayers. I hope that the Leader of the House will not minimise the importance of this very serious matter for Greater Manchester ratepayers as a whole.

Mr. Ken Eastham (Manchester, Blackley): This is an important issue. I make the special plea that my right hon. Friend impresses upon the Leader of the House that when we speak about the high finances and the high investment of Manchester airport, the lion's share of the investment surely can be claimed to belong to the city of Manchester. It was only in 1974, during the reorganisation, that one tenth was apportioned to Trafford. Is it not important to recognise that, because of the very high investment of the city of Manchester, it would be a travesty of justice if the Government went against the wishes of the Greater Manchester area?

Mr. Morris: My hon. Friend speaks with considerable authority on this matter. For many years before coming to the House he was a distinguished member of Manchester city council. As he said, the airport was conceived and founded by the city council. We owned it and controlled it. We lost half of our property when the Greater Manchester council came into existence. As my hon. Friend said, it would be a travesty of justice if the people of Manchester were to be denied their rightful stake in the premier asset of the region.

Either the Under-Secretary spoke to Councillor Warbrick behind the backs of everyone involved in the matter, or he did not. After the Under-Secretary spoke, as I am informed, to the Trafford leader, the Department of Transport, which hitherto had adopted a constructive approach to the proposals, suddenly became hostile. There is no doubt that the Department's change of approach clearly reflected the Minister's opposition to what had been unanimously agreed by the district councils last October.

Mr. Peter Snape (West Bromwich, East): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the original proposals were, in fact, seconded by the representative of the Trafford borough council, the authority which is now refusing to ratify them? The pressure to refuse to ratify undoubtedly came both from the Under-Secretary responsible for aviation matters and from Back-Bench Conservative Members, none of whom are present this evening. By behaving in such a way, they are directly prejudicing the future of Britain's premier regional airport. Their action is that habitual mixture of spivvery and ideology that typifies the Government's approach to aviation and other matters.

Mr. Morris: I am very grateful to my hon. Friend who is extremely well-informed on such matters. It is eminently true that the Tory leader of Trafford council seconded the proposal that was agreed unanimously by the district councils in October. After the Department of Transport's change of approach, it became clear that Trafford, which had seconded the proposals, wanted to appease the Minister. Trafford council then described the proposals as a sham and demanded that the airport be privatised.

That was the attitude of a council which had seconded the proposals, as my hon. Friend the Member for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Snape) said, as recently as October. Its change of attitude shows the extent to which the authority's leadership was pressurised by senior Conservatives. That must have happened; otherwise why did Councillor Warbrick originally second the proposals in October?

I must point out to Councillor Warbrick and his colleagues on Trafford council, and to the House as a whole, that the only sham is the Government's White

[Mr. Morris]

Paper on airports policy. The Government are being grossly misleading when they say that there is no compulsion on local authorities to sell shares in airport companies. Local public representatives took that statement as being honourable and they genuinely tried to put together a package acceptable to all the parties. They now appear to have failed in that attempt, because the Government reneged on their commitment.

Manchester produced a reasoned response, backed wherever possible by expert independent advice, to each of the points raised by the Secretary of State for Transport about the October proposals. The response was intended to secure the best interests of the airport, and the reward has been political manoeuvring of the most odious kind.

There is now nothing but anger and frustration in Greater Manchester about the position in which the airport may find itself as a result of the Government's political intervention. The airport may be forced to work with an organisation which has motivations and concerns which differ fundamentally from its own. There is no certainty that the airport's growth will not be hindered, because the PTA will be severely cash limited. All the districts will also be prevented from participating in the airport. That will be the end result of all the manoeuvring that has taken place behind the scenes. Those who intervened to undermine the unanimous decision of the district councils last October may feel that it is a job well done. The people of Greater Manchester, however, will not forgive them for jeopardising the future of our region's most important asset.

I ask the Leader of the House for a clear undertaking that there will be an oral statement by the Secretary of State on the future control and operation of Manchester international airport, either later today or, having regard to the commitments of northern hon. Members, at the very least tomorrow.

6.54 pm

Sir Philip Holland (Gedling): You may, Mr. Deputy Speaker, find it difficult to believe that I have a very charming eight-year-old granddaughter named Claire. Last summer for her birthday she expressed a wish to see me at work, so my son brought her along one evening to the Strangers' Gallery and I dutifully took my seat in the Chamber.

The business of the House on that occasion was, as I recall, the Report stage of a non-controversial Scottish Bill. I must confess to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, in the strictest confidence, that I found the proceedings dull and almost entirely incomprehensible. That may have shown on my face because after five minutes in the Gallery my granddaughter said to her father, "Well, I can see him sitting there, but what is he doing?" Her father, accustomed to her penetrating questions, promptly replied, "He is listening to what they are saying so that he will know what to do." That is precisely what I hope my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House is doing at the moment.

I hope that my right hon. Friend will consider not pressing his motion today and will bring back a slightly revised one tomorrow that would allow time for a full day's debate — in addition to the business already planned — on the subject of non-departmental public bodies or, to put it another way, quangos. The House would not be entirely hostile to curtailing the Christmas recess by one day so that we might have a full day's discussion on that important subject. We could then formulate a plan for a new initiatitve to provide fresh impetus to the quango cull which presently has all the appearance of running out of steam.

In an effort to persuade the Leader of the House to consider modifying the Christmas recess dates, I should like briefly to explain why the time is ripe for such a debate and why it is of sufficient urgency to justify delaying the rising of the House.

As my right hon. Friend and other hon. Members may have noticed, I have for 10 years enjoyed participating in the sport of hunting that wily, sleekit and sometimes timrous beastie the quango. For the first four years I made little headway, but I occupied my time usefully in studying its habitat, its nature and its psychology. That bore fruit during the next five years. Steady progress was made in reducing the total——

Mr. Robert Kilroy-Silk (Knowsley, North): There are more than when the hon. Gentleman began.

Sir Philip Holland: If the hon. Gentleman will have patience, he may learn the true figure.

Steady progress was made between 1979 and 1984 in reducing the total by more than 700, in spite of the birth of nearly 100 new quangos. The new willingness on the part of Government to open up to public and parliamentary scrutiny the numbers, nature and cost of those bodies was of great importance in that period.

First the Civil Service Department, and later the Management and Personnel Office, published an annual list of public bodies, giving details of revenue from the main sources, the number of appointed "Quangurus" and the emoluments paid to each. That has now become an established annual practice; the latest publication for 1985 was published yesterday and is an excellent report.

More quangos have become subject to the attention of the Comptroller and Auditor General and I welcome that. All quangos are now open to investigation by the departmental Select Committees—though I fear that by and large those Committees seem to have little time to consider such matters as they perhaps do not have sufficient publicity value.

A most important innovation was introduced on 20 October 1981 when the Civil Service Department issued a code of practice entitled "Non-Departmental Public Bodies: A Guide for Departments". That publication was concise and succinct and it gave clear, simple and unequivocal directions and guidelines to Departments and opened up the whole subject to more detailed probing in the House than had previously been possible.

In November 1984, the Cabinet Office, in collaboration with the Treasury financial management unit, published a report called "Financial Management Initiative: Non-Departmental Public Bodies". In announcing that publication, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said:

"Over the next two years, therefore, Departments will be looking, in collaboration with the management of their sponsored bodies, at the scope for improving management and control systems and practices, with the aim of producing progressive improvements in performance." — [Official Report, 19 November 1984; Vol. 68, c. 58.]

My right hon. Friend also said that some bodies needed better systems for setting targets and assessing achievements.

The main programme is due for completion in April 1987. Last year I understood that that would be monitored by the Chief Secretary to the Treasury and the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. Since then there has been a Government reshuffle and both the Chief Secretary and the Minister in the Cabinet Office have been transmogrified. I fear that such monitoring of the programme as may have been in progress in the spring and early summer may have become lost as a result of the change.

During the past year there has been a marked change of tempo in the quango cull. Apart from a welcome cull of the nationalised industry boards, some lassitude seems to be besetting the Departments in their attitude to and enthusiasm for slimming and trimming the quangos and their numbers. There is also, to put it mildly, an increasing danger of Ministers being beguiled into creating new ones.

After a crescendo of activity for five years from 1979 to 1984, there has ensued a mere trickle of 28 abolitions during the past year. That has been recognised to some extent by the Management and Personnel Office, which produced a much larger edition of the code of practice three months ago. However, with my suspicious nature, I believe that in that context a larger code of practice might just mean a more verbose one. My cynicism tells me that it could just possibly be a great Whitehall ploy to smother its objectives under such a cloak of verbiage as to dilute and diffuse the guidelines so that the discretion of those whose task it is to interpret them may become unlimited.

Therefore, the appearance of waning enthusiasm for the quango cull, suspicions about the long-term aspirations of Ministers and their Whitehall advisers and what seems to be a growing threat of a return to the old order—that is to say, a reversion to the 1978 status quo—create the need for early consideration of those matters by the House.

I ask my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House to think carefully before he seeks the approval of the House for the motion. If he cannot find time for an early debate on quangos, I hope that he will seriously consider reducing our Christmas recess to make such time available.

7.1 pm

Mr. David Penhaligon (Truro): I should like to use this opportunity, which is made available by this semi-unique occasion, to draw to the attention of the House a tragedy that is developing in my county. I believe that I should be failing in my duty if I did not raise the matter on the Floor of the House before it goes into recess. The subject is the great difficulties faced by the Cornish tin industry.

Some 3,000 families in my county will have their Christmas ruined because of the doubt, anguish, fear, worry and speculation created by the current situation. I should like to put a simple question to the Government. In the final analysis, will they offer financial support to the Cornish tin industry? I am not pushing for specific details tonight of any particular scheme, but pleasure could be restored in many households if the Government said tonight, or at least before the recess, that assistance was forthcoming. Alternatively, will the Government take the risk of seeing the end of 2,000 years of extracting tin from my county? Will the only tin industry in the world to be shut down be the one in Cornwall? Are the Government willing to take that risk? That is the scale of the risk, and of the fear and despair in our county.

When one considers what has happened, one can understand the amazement of some people at how the situation has arisen. Just seven weeks ago, tin was being freely traded on the London metal exchange for £8,500 a tonne. At the turn of the year, it was being traded at prices that were sometimes over £10,000 a tonne. The industry announced its largest output this century in terms of quantity of minerals; not cash value. Various mines were developing their facilities or seeking planning consent to develop new mines. In my constituency, Concorde and Cligga are both in various stages—one is developing and the other is seeking consent to develop.

The prediction in my part of the country that the world demand for raw materials must lead to a redevelopment of hard rock mining in Cornwall seems to be coming true after a decade of steady and apparently never-ending progress. Tin, silver, zinc and lead are mined in large quantities, and the county is likely to produce tungsten in the not too distant future. The key to all those minerals is tin, because it is the most valuable mineral, and in every mine tin is a part of what is produced. If the tin goes, the rest of the industry goes as well.

To date, the Minister of State, Department of Trade and Industry has met two delegations, in which the hon. Member for St. Ives (Mr. Harris) and myself took part. Neither of us would complain about his attitude. He listened with interest to our account of the peculiarities of the mining industry in the far south-west. I do not think that the Minister would complain if I paraphrased his reply to us. Basically, he said that the Government were actively trying to sort out the international tin agreement in the International Tin Council and trying to get people involved, so that they faced their debts and responsibilities. He said that when the Government had done that, they would try to look at the situation in Cornwall.

Trading ceased at the end of October. It might start again in early January, but it will not start before then. People to whom I talk in the industry believe that a much more likely date for tin trading to start is early in February, which represents three or four months' uncertainty. When the trading restarts, there will be another three or four months' uncertainty until the price settles down to a price that is likely to be sustained for a substantial period. If nothing more than that happens, substantial parts of the industry will be eradicated by that time. Not many in the industry would doubt that. Geevor mine in the constituency of the hon. Member for St. Ives has given four fifths of its employees provisional notification of redundancy. Other mines—Wheal Jane, Pendarves and South Crofty—are big and play a major part in the local economy. They are currently taking decisions and wondering what will happen.

Mining is not a lame duck industry in my county—far from it. Last week ECLP, a china clay company in my constituency, declared a profit of £75 million this year. I estimate that about £50 million of that profit was made by exploiting the clay deposits in my constituency. If other extractive industries in Britain had the record of mining that my county has, we would have fewer financial difficulties.

The tin industry is in an area of endemic unemployment. I do not want to bore the House with figures, but I shall reel out the male unemployment figures in the travel-to-work areas most affected, so that one gets the feel of the local situation. In Falmouth, the figure is 24·9 per cent. in St. Ives and Penzance 26·1 per cent., in Redruth 22·8 per cent. and in Helston 23·6 per cent.

[Mr. David Penhaligon]

Virtually one quarter of the male population is unemployed. If the mines go, the figure will be substantially more than that.

Mr. David Harris (St. Ives): The hon. Gentleman mentioned Geevor in my constituency. Does he agree that the situation there is particularly desperate, in that the economy of the St. Just and Pendeen area is almost totally dependent on that mine? There is tourism and agriculture, but the livelihood of those villages and the one town is dependent on that mine.

Mr. Penhaligon: I confirm that that is correct.

I should like to make this rather urban House aware of the distances involved. St. Just is six or seven miles from the nearest town of any size, and real employment opportunities are 40 or 50 miles away. Three hundred jobs might not sound much to the House, but in a remote part of Britain they are the keystone of the local economy.

The industry is not a lame duck. It is in difficulties now, but it has been making profits over a sustained period, and most people believe that it can again, with assistance. The industry pushes some £27 million into the local economy, through pay and services. When trading ceased the value of the tin sold was £52 million a year, not including the other minerals, which are also valuable.

We want to know whether help will be forthcoming. We are not expecting details, but there is a great deal to be said in discussing the best ways to help. There could be some help towards capital investment to enable the industry to improve efficiency and to produce this valuable mineral at a competitive price. The Government could give some assistance in the development of new ore bodies. Hard rock mining is a two-stage process. One half of the mine takes the ore out to the mill to be crushed and processed, and the other half of the mine opens shafts, drives and stopes to mine the tin. The Government could offer some medium-term price support mechanism against the value of tin.

The real question tonight — for peace of mind at Christmas and in the new year — is: will the Government help? It seems inconceivable to those involved in the industry that Thailand, Malaysia, Bolivia or Brazil will allow their industries to be wrapped up and put into the history books. There is some risk that our Government will allow Europe's only supply of this mineral to close permanently. If a mine is closed and it floods, there is no future for that mine. The hon. Member for Swansea, East (Mr. Anderson) will be glad to confirm that.

Recently, at Prime Minister's Question Time I asked two questions: will the Government assist, and will the Prime Minister receive a delegation? The answer was not unexpected. The Prime Minister, once again, said that the Government were trying to encourage the Tin Council to find a sensible settlement of the difficulty in which it finds itself. That is a strategy to save the London metal exchange, and is of no help to those who live in Cornwall. It may well help to keep the London metal exchange within London, but it will certainly not help the industry within my constituency. Surely the Government are not saying that traders in tin are more important than those who produce the mineral.

I wish to seek from the Minister a broad-based assurance that some assistance will be given to the Cornish tin mining industry in its present difficulties. If the Minister can give the assurance that the situation is not terminal, people in Cornwall will have a much happier Christmas.

7.12 pm

Mr. Peter Viggers (Gosport): I followed the speech of the hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Penhaligon) with interest. I know that his concern is shared throughout the House, but I hope that he will forgive me if I do not take up his points.

I urge that the House should not rise for the Christmas recess until we have had a further opportunity to consider the threat to the position of young people and the family. I wish to illustrate my point with a true story which I was told last Friday at my constituency surgery. I was consulted by considerate, caring, responsible parents who, a year ago, had a 16-year-old son whom we shall call David. Their son was an intelligent boy who had O-levels and was working in a multiple store as a trainee. His parents expressed concern that he was attracted by the fact that he could, if he wished, leave home and gain board and lodging allowance of £55 a week plus £9 pocket money. That caused some mild family disharmony — not at all unusual in a family with teenage children. The parents found this carrot, in the form of a Department of Health and Social Security allowance, to be the cause of great difficulties since their son was tempted to leave home.

A year ago the parents' worst fears were realised, and the boy left home. The parents were concerned that he should wish to do so but, as they were caring and responsible, they took him to the hostel where he was to stay. Arrangements were made by the boy to receive DHSS payments. When the 16-year-old lad left home the DHSS made no effort to establish whether he needed to leave home or whether he had a home in which he could stay. A 16-year-old is entitled to benefits and it is none of the parents' business.

A few weeks passed and the boy, now 17, went missing from the hostel where he had been staying. The parents, who had been maintaining a tenuous contact with him, were distraught. They attempted to find out from the lodging house the whereabouts of their son, but the lodging house did not care. The DHSS may well be paying the lad for staying in a hostel elsewhere, but it would not tell the parents anything. For three weeks the parents were faced with this distressing situation. They were then contacted by the police, who had found their son's bag which had their address inside it. The police attempted to reassure the parents, despite the fact that they did not know his whereabouts. Imagine the parents' feelings when their son's bag had been found, but he was still missing and the police did not know his whereabouts.

Later the parents discovered — I use the word "discovered" advisedly — that their son, aged 17, had been charged with a criminal offence. They were not told this by the police, by the probation service, the court or by any other authorities. They had to find out for themselves. In Britain someone aged 17 is deemed, in the criminal courts, to be an adult. If a person aged 17 is in trouble with the law and tells the police that he does not wish his parents to be consulted, the police will abide by that wish.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk: It is not just that the parents are not consulted; they do not have to be informed.

Mr. Viggers: As the hon. Gentleman says, they will not be informed. If parents make inquiries they will not be told when their son will appear in court or even the exact nature of the offence.

At present David's parents do not know where he is living. The DHSS may know where he is staying, but will not say; the police may know where he is, but they will not say. Thus, the parents, the two people in the world who care most about this boy, cannot discover where he is and cannot do anything to help him.

How did we get ourselves into this situation? The DHSS and the police—they serve us very well in south Hampshire—are obeying the restrictions and rules laid down by this House. How is it that Parliament can be responsible for this framework of regulations against which this tragedy has been played out?

The first problem is that a person aged 16 is regarded as independent for DHSS benefit purposes. In Germany, someone aged between 16 and 18 can go into lodgings and apply for benefit. However, the authorities make sure that the parents are informed of his whereabouts because the authorities will recover the cost of the benefit from the parents. In Britain, a 17-year-old is regarded as an adult under criminal law. A probation officer in my area said that, if a 17-year-old does not wish his parents to be informed of his whereabouts,

"We have to respect his wishes."

In the Gillick case, it was laid down that the rights of parents dwindle as offspring approach the age of maturity. I am not concerned with the rights of parents because the parents in question are not trying to assert any rights. They are trying to fulfil their duty. It is insane that we should prevent parents from exercising their duty. We have gone collectively mad.

I am horrified by the facts in this case and by the light they throw on Parliament's attitude to the family as the basic unit of society. Current social and legal practice seems designed not so much to undermine the family as to deny its very existence. As the family festival of Christmas approaches, we should resolve to give more support to the family so that the members of a family give more support to each other.

7.20 pm

Mr. Robert Kilroy-Silk (Knowsley, North): I should very much like to follow what the hon. Member for Gosport (Mr. Viggers) has said as he dealt with an interesting and important subject, but instead I shall protest that the House should not adjourn for the Christmas recess until we have had an opportunity to debate the continuing and appalling unemployment on Merseyside, not least in my constituency.

The two subjects are not unrelated as many young people are unemployed and an increasing number of them have to leave home to get the financial benefits that are available from the state. The result is the break-up of families, which is manifest in Merseyside and my constituency. What the hon. Gentleman complained of is happening on an ever larger scale because of the economic policies of the Government that he supports.

I do not have to remind the House of the scale of unemployment on Merseyside. Nor do I have to catalogue the factories that have closed in the past six years or state the number of redundancies or job losses. The facts should be familiar. I hope that I do not have to remind hon. Members that 140,000 people are now unemployed on Merseyside. That represents 20 per cent. of the population. I remember when I and my right hon. and hon. Friends complained bitterly when unemployment on Merseyside was as low—as it now seems—as 70,000. No fewer than 20,000 people are unemployed in the small two-Member borough of Knowsley. There are 10,000 unemployed in my extremely small constituency and more than 1,600 of them have been unemployed for more than five years.

On Merseyside, and especially in my constituency, we have road after road, industrial estates, old industrial areas and factories which were once occupied and productive standing empty, vandalised, derelict and, in many cases, razed to the ground. Whole areas such as Kirkby have multi-storey blocks of flats in which no one has a full-time job. There are streets—indeed virtually whole areas—where not one person is earning a living. That is appalling. I know that all this has been said before, but there are still many hon. Members, not least Conservative Members, who, through no fault of their own, represent much more prosperous constituencies. They have no conception of the long-term, grinding poverty that is to be found in many parts of Merseyside, Liverpool and my constituency.

For example, 96 per cent. of people leaving school this year did not find a job. Only 4 per cent. went into a full-time job. That does not include the more than 5,000 in Knowsley who are in temporary employment schemes. Such levels of unemployment and such long-term unemployment leads to the winding down of whole areas. It manifests itself in shops closing. Even food shops that belong to major chains cannot sustain a profitable existence in my constituency. We have come to a sorry pass when people cannot buy enough food to sustain a food shop in a large town such as Kirkby.

This cannot go on. Why should my constituents be deprived of the opportunities that are available to others who, through accident, live in more fortunate parts of the country? Why should young people in my area suffer the injustice of their lives being destroyed or blighted? Why should they have to go straight on the dole having left school, get married on the dole, have children on the dole and face living permanently on the dole? That should not happen, and they know that it need not happen. It is not as though we are foisting inequities, inequalities and injustices only on certain parts of the community. If we continue like this, the social problems that we have witnessed will be as nothing to those that we are likely to experience in the future.

My constituents know that they do not have to be unemployed. They are not stupid. Indeed, some are very well educated. They know that the provision of jobs is a matter of Government will. They look around them and see inadequate housing. They see the paucity of social, welfare and health services. They see empty hospitals and unemployed doctors and nurses in dole queues, while in their neighbourhood people are dying in agony or distress on the waiting list. They see unemployed building workers, electricians and plumbers. They see old, inadequate and vandalised housing in need of repair. They know that it is possible to match the needs to the resources and that the result would be an improvement in the quality of life in the area and permanent jobs for them, their family and friends. That is possible, and they know it.

My constituents see evidence of a much more prosperous and materialistic southern part of the country. They see it every night on the television. They see it on television advertising. They see a Martini style of life which is available to the vast majority of the country but not to them. Nobody can be subjected to grinding poverty, humiliation, indignity, loss of self-respect and no prospect of employment, while the aspirations that others take for granted are held up to them, without feeling bitter and resentful. There is such a dichotomy and of course they are deeply bitter and deeply resentful.

[Mr. Robert Kilroy-Silk]

The surprise is not that we have had riots or disturbances. They happen much more frequently than we know. They might not be a nightly occurrence in my constituency, but it is not far off. They might not be on the scale of Toxteth or Tottenham, but they are serious and people are constantly being injured. We cannot create the circumstances that I have described and imagine that people will not react. We are storing up enormous trouble by creating a large pool of unemployed young people who know that things do not have to be so bad, have no stake in the country's future, no hope of a job and the dignity and self-respect that comes with it, and no hope of being able to lead a life such as their compatriots take for granted. That is wrong and will lead us into a great deal of trouble.

On those grounds alone it is incumbent on the House to have an informed and sensible discussion of the scale of unemployment and the poverty which accompanies it on Merseyside and in my constituency. We must come forward with practical and positive proposals to deal with the problem now—it can be dealt with now—and to give my constituents some hope. If we do not give them hope and the feeling that they belong to our community and that it cares about them, they will take their revenge. When their revenge comes, it will be horrendous.

7.29 pm

Mr. Colin Moynihan (Lewisham, East): In many ways the subject that I raise for consideration this evening is the most important one on which I have ever addressed the House. It relates to the relationship between a Member of Parliament and his constituents.

That relationship has long been nurtured, protected and valued. It has grown substantially in the volume of work during the past 15 years, to the point where hon. Members are often effectively ombudsmen between powerful institutions, such as the boroughs, which in many cases have burgeoned in size and power on the one hand, and constituents on the other. Anything that threatens that relationship should receive the urgent consideration of the House and a full day's debate before the Adjournment.

To assist the House, I shall place on record the series of events that have led to the blacking of correspondence between Lewisham council and me, when I write to it on behalf of constituents. That action is carried out by NALGO members working for the council. Such trade union action is neither legitimate nor constitutionally acceptable.

During the past year I have had cause to bring to the attention of the council housing department its substantial delays in answering correspondence from my constituents who have written to me requesting information. If one assumes a week's turnround for answering a letter, the 10-strong member support group are 3,000 working days overdue to date with my inquiries alone if one adds together the number of days overdue for each letter. They are important inquiries.

On 16 July I sought

"a full reply as soon as possible" about a case concerning a couple. On 21 October I sent a letter relating to

"obvious stress with four children in one bedroom."

On 16 October I requested a reply about eight people in a two-bedroomed house which I described as "a serious and urgent case."

On 20 December 1984 I reported "major problems" of a constituent. In all cases I requested information, but received no reply.

It is wrong when a Member of Parliament, in confidential dealings with a constituent, cannot take the case further either with the constituent or, with his permission, the press, or, at his request, in Parliament, for lack of information. The substantial delays led me last Thursday to telephone the council housing department about yet another long-overdue case. When my office contacted the allocation officer—one of the housing managers—she informed my secretary what she was instructed to transfer any calls from me to the NALGO shop steward for the support group. My office was informed that since 13 November—more than a month before—a motion had been passed to black all my correspondence, subject to decisions being taken at shop level. That had taken place in the members' support group. For more than a month neither NALGO nor any of the officers of the council informed me of that decision.

When I telephoned the NALGO shop steward, he said that because of my "supposed business dealings with South Africa", the local NALGO branch had decided that my mail to the council was to be intercepted, a mailing list drawn up, and a reply sent direct to the constituent concerned, without my knowledge or permission. Such a reply would include NALGO's reasons for blacking my correspondence. Such a process had already been partly implemented without NALGO, the council officers or the chief executive, who was also aware of this, informing me either verbally or in writing of their action.

That is a gross abuse of the correspondence of the man in the street, and, for my part, it is a gross interference in the relationship between a Member of Parliament and his constituents. I would make no distinction in my condemnation and anxiety should such action be taken by a council against a Labour Member because of his personal or political views. That is a matter for the electorate, not NALGO shop stewards.

For a month, many written representations to the council housing department have, without my knowledge, continued to be misappropriated, as the housing department has never sought to obtain my permission to use correspondence for any purpose other than to reply direct to me, as I have outlined in my written requests to them.

The weakness and temerity of council officers in the face of NALGO's grip on Lewisham council are regrettably self-evident. The fact that the chief executive was seen to take action only yesterday after I had insisted that a written undertaking be given to me that no employee of the council would be allowed to make use of any information obtained from correspondence in the way set out in the NALGO draft, the fact that his action is limited to that, and not to the central point about blacking correspondence, the fact that the allocations officer could not speak to my secretary, but had to pass the call on to the NALGO shop steward, and the fact that an important meeting scheduled for today to discuss urgent cases, some of which I have alluded to indirectly, was called off by the housing manager because NALGO refused to give her the necessary files, make it clear that NALGO runs Lewisham council. Regrettably, come May of next year in the borough elections the electorate of Lewisham will have a clear choice—Conservative or NALGO.

It is only fair to place on record NALGO's anxieties. The only public record of its anxieties was expressed in a document published on 27 November, entitled "Viewpoint Lewisham Nalgo." It stated that its actions were part of a "policy of non-co-operation with individuals who are helping to prop up the racist regime"—

I certainly have not—

"by having investment in South Africa" which I certainly have not. The document continues:

"One such individual is local Tory MP for Lewisham, East, Colin Moynihan."

That is not true.

"He is Chairman of Ridgway's Tea"

that is not true—

"a holding company for Tate and Lyle"

that is not true—

"which is South African based."

That is not true. It is pitiful that NALGO can use my constituents as political pawns and not even get its case right. Not one phrase of that document is right. I regret that NALGO cannot even spell my name correctly in correspondence.

I have declared an interest in the House regarding Ridgeways and Tate and Lyle, but never in its 150-year history has Ridgway had business dealings in South Africa. Of the five companies which I am informed have business activities in South Africa under Tate and Lyle, four were sold more than six years ago, and the fifth, a small company in Durban, handles molasses, as much for South Africa as for Swaziland and Zimbabwe. Does Lewisham NALGO know better about southern African politics than Mr. Mugabe does?

All hon. Members know that any accusations directed to me of racism, of propping up the apartheid regime or of supporting South Africa, are wholly inaccurate. I abhor apartheid and reject racism completely. I have views which may differ from those of hon. Members who might prefer an extremist resort to armed struggle, combined with a complete imposition of sanctions, which is the declared aim of NALGO in Lewisham. If that is their view, I respect the fact that it is different from mine. Equally, in our system of representative government, NALGO should respect freedom of speech, the rule of law, and the will of the people expressed through Parliament, and, in particular, through the ballot box.

Of far greater significance than the political or personal differences of opinion that separate a union or a far Left councillor from a Member of Parliament is the future relationship between an elected Member of Parliament and his constituents. Community politics is a growing phenomenon. Hon. Members differ in how far they should be involved in local issues. Some leave local matters exclusively to local councillors. If the local council is effective, that is fine. Others, like myself, believe that in an inner-city constituency, such as Lewisham, it is incumbent on the hon. Member to turn every paving stone, to take up personally every justified case and to do as much helpful work as possible on housing and other problems, irrespective of the personal and political views of the constituent.

That fundamental tenet of representative government is now jeopardised by union action. It is the constituents who will suffer. NALGO would do well to recognise that constituents who come to me about housing matters do so because they fail to get satisfaction from the housing department. They come to me as a last resort, often distressed and in need of moral and practical support. Because they are upset and frustrated by the combination of rudeness and inefficiency of the housing department, they seek my assistance. When I have had the opportunity to help, many cases have been successfully resolved. Many have not, but we must try equally on everyone's behalf. Many of those successful outcomes are now denied because constituents do not have the benefit of answers to my correspondence with the council. Without that knowledge, I cannot reply to the constituent to advise him.

Unless the problem is tackled now, for the benefit of both sides of the House, the constituents will suffer. What is worse is that the problem could increase, which would threaten our role as Members of Parliament. Is it right that we should have a political system under which the electorate expresses its view through the ballot box, but the local trade union can veto such an opinion? Is it right that the council should decide whether a policy is satisfactory to the Member of Parliament, whether it is satisfactory to NALGO and whether to employ a veto? Is it right to deny a Member of Parliament access to the information that he needs at his fingertips? I believe that it is not. I firmly believe in taking up constituents' cases and moving round the constituency to try to help. We are restricted greatly in what we can do, but we should at least attempt to solve, to the best of our ability, any constituent's problem, especially in the inner cities, where housing problems constitute over 90 per cent. of my cases.

Mr. Stuart Holland (Vauxhall): Yes, because of cuts.

Mr. Moynihan: Some individuals have come to see me about problems arising from a lack of resources for housing. That shortage can be attributed to money being siphoned off by the council and not used in the best interests of constituents. That is a political point, and is not the reason for my asking the House to consider the implication of the principle. The principle is whether a Member of Parliament should be allowed access to a council's information to assist his constituents.

Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark (Birmingham, Selly Oak): My hon. Friend makes a proper point. It is not a matter of cheap political points or whether Government money is available for one area or another. It is a matter of whether a Member of Parliament is impeded in his duties because somebody else wishes to use political means to stop him serving his constituents. My hon. Friend is right to press the point that he serves his constituents more than he serves an esoteric interest abroad.

Mr. Moynihan: I hope that I have made that point clear to the House. The issue does not rest on political grounds. The matter should now receive the closest attention and consideration of the House. I look to the Opposition and the Government to recognise the implications of my remarks.

[Mr. Moynihan]

I intend to explore every avenue available to serve once again my constituents to the best of my ability. If I do not succeed, the House must consider the implications that blacking an hon. Member's work have for the future working of this House.

7.45 pm

Mr. Stuart Holland (Vauxhall): I submit that this House should not adjourn for the Christmas recess until it has had the chance to debate the important question of corruption in small charities in the London area, especially the St. Olave, St. Thomas and St. John United Charities, to which I shall subsequently refer as St. Olave. This is an ancient charity in south London. In its current form it was established from an amalgamation of three Bermondsey parish charities in May 1939 with the purpose of helping the poor and elderly of Bermondsey. It has recently been seeking to sell property in my constituency.

I first drew attention to the activities of this charity in February 1985 when members of Vauxhall Labour party discovered that a block of flats had been advertised for sale in Kennington in the South London Press. On further investigation the flats were found to be offered for sale by the charity. It soon became apparent that none of the tenants in St. Olave's mansions knew that their homes were to be sold. Many were elderly and concerned for their future. Many had been bombed out during the blitz in Bermondsey and had lived in St. Olave's mansions all their lives. On meeting them it was quite clear that the charity had been a very poor landlord. Very few repairs were being done and the flats were run down. Contact with the charity proved difficult, if not impossible, for the tenants. All inquiries were handled by the clerk of the charity, Mr. Phillip Pollock—a name that will recur in what I have to say. It is to his misconduct and not to that of the trustees—several of whom, I stress, are blameless —that much of my speech will be addressed.

At the same time as secretly selling St. Olave's mansions, the charity was engaged in a peculiar exercise of preventing legally appointed trustees from Southwark council from participating in its affairs. St. Olave, in the memorandum of association 1939, had 13 trustees: eight appointed by the local authority, four co-opted by the trustees themselves and one ex officio.

In November 1984 Southwark appointed five new representative trustees to serve a five-year term of office from December of that year. The majority of the existing trustees refused to accept them. No explanation was given for this refusal, and the five new trustees were prevented from attending any meeting of the charity.

At that stage, I contacted the Charity Commissioner to express my concern regarding the activities of the charity and suggested that he investigate its affairs. I wrote to him in February of this year and had a meeting with Mr. Denis Peach, one of the chief Charity Commissioners. Mr. Peach seemed blithely unconcerned about this particular charity. On 1 March this year he informed me:

"in our dealings with the Charities (St. Olave's) Trustees over many years we have found them fully alive to their responsibilities and to the need to take expert advice in relation to sales of trust property."

That reply certainly did not resolve my suspicions, particularly after I had the opportunity to examine the accounts of the charity for the year ending 31 March 1984 —the latest available. From an income of £160,000 the charity had spent £51,000, or 31 per cent. of its income, on management expenses. The poor and elderly of Bermondsey, for whom the charity was originally established, received in the same year less than £15,000, or only 9 per cent. of its income.

Meanwhile, the five new local authority nominated trustees were still trying to attend meetings and were still being denied access. On 18 March this year I went with them to the offices of the charity at Druid street, SE1, when four of the five new trustees attempted to sign the record book of the charity and become accepted as trustees. Mr. Pollock, the clerk, refused to let any of these legally appointed trustees sign the record book, despite an assurance from a Southwark councillor, John Fowler, and myself that all five trustees had been legally nominated by Southwark council. It was only in April 1985, after a threatened court injunction by Southwark council, that the charity finally accepted those new trustees. But it soon became clear why there was so much resistance from Mr. Pollock to their appointment.

As well as owning property in Kennington in my constituency, the charity owned a substantial amount of property in Fairlawn park, Sydenham. There, too, there have been many complaints about its record as a landlord. With the assistance of the South West Law Project and Paul Foot of The Mirror, the tenants of Fairlawn park found that the company responsible for carrying out all the repair work for the charity was called Flowerbrook Ltd. That company, established in June 1984, had only three directors—a Mr. Brian Glen, Mr. Barry Rosomon and the clerk to the St. Olave charity, Mr. Phillip Pollock. Mr. Pollock had failed to inform the trustees that he was a director of the company responsible for the repair and maintenance of the charity's property, yet in 1983 and 1984—in the latter year I restate that the charity had disbursed less than 10 per cent. of its income to its alleged beneficiaries — it spent more than £120,000 with Flowerbrook in the project on Fairlawn park alone.

The charity was also trying to sell the properties in Fairlawn park, and the trustees were informed that only one bid had been received, of £432,000—or £11,000 a house—from Silvercount Ltd. The tenants, informed of the sale only at the last minute, were willing to pay up to £17,000 a house. The directors of Silvercount were Mr. Brian Glen and Mr. Barry Rosomon. As well as being a co-director of Mr. Pollock in Flowerbrook Ltd., Mr. Rosomon had other connections with the charity. Until 1984, his father was a trustee of the charity and his mother was assistant clerk to Mr. Pollock.

Increasingly alarmed at the activities of Mr. Pollock and the inaction of the Charity Commissioner, I tabled a parliamentary question to the Attorney-General on 25 July, requesting him to instruct the Charity Commissioners to conduct an inquiry into the charity under section 6 of the Charities Act 1960. My request was refused.

Since the arrival of the new trustees in April this year, the charity has elected a new chairman, Mr. John Thomas. He replaced the previous chairman of several years, Miss Lucy Brown. Miss Brown has ably served the people of Bermondsey as a councillor, especially—I understand—in the 1920s. But at the age of 92, I would suggest she was not the most suitable choice to be chairman of a charity with an estimated £7 million worth of assets, which were being stripped off by its clerk.

The new chairman, supported strongly by some of the former trustees, ordered an immediate inquiry into the sale of all property by the charity during the past five years, which produced some extremely interesting results. As well as owning St. Olave's mansions, the charity owned a large number of handsome Georgian houses along Kennington road and Walnut Tree walk in my constituency. The internal inquiry revealed that, in January 1985, 13 of those houses were sold to an Isle of Man registered company called Kindrid for a total of £52,000. Thus, 13 large, four-storey houses in Kennington were sold at an average price of £4,000 each. Incredibly, the Charity Commission approved that sale as the best deal possible for the charity—a point to which I shall return shortly.

This sale of the century was stongly urged by a so-called surveyor, Mr. Benjamin Gurvitz of Benjamin Glen and Company, Godalming, Surrey. Mr. Gurvitz was also strongly urging the charity to sell its property in Fairlawn park to Silvercount Ltd. Mr. Gurvitz is not a qualified surveyor. He was appointed by Mr. Pollock without any reference to the trustees, and in 1984 he received £31,000 — three times what the beneficiaries of the charity received that year—for his services to the charity. His reports on the condition of the property in Kennington road and Walnut Tree walk were completely fallacious. He referred to derelict property, when in fact most of the houses were tenanted and in the last two years had more than £70,000 spent on them, including new roofs. An independent assessment by a local estate agent reckoned that each house was worth at least £40,000—10 times what the charity sold them for, with the approval of the Charity Commission.

Kindrid Property, a faceless corporation registered in the Isle of Man, immediately resold two of its newly acquired properties to Apton Properties in January 1985. The directors of Apton Properties Ltd. are names which will be familiar to us — Mr. Barry Rosoman and Mr. Brian Glen. Just one of those properties is now back on sale for more than £110,000.

Apart from these sales to Kindred and Apton, other property owned by the charity was being acquired at knockdown prices—all with the approval of the Charity Commission. No. 126 Kennington road, a large five-storey house, was bought by a Mrs. Robinson for less than £17,000 in late 1984. No such person existed. The house was actually bought by Mr. Brian Clifford, a well-known criminal who was killed in Kennington in a gangland murder on 28 September. The police are currently investigating the connection between Mr. Clifford and the activities of the St. Olave charity. In all, it is estimated that the St. Olave charity has lost well in excess of £1 million in fraudulent property deals in 1984-85 alone; or, more precisely, the poor and elderly of Bermondsey and Kennington have lost more than £1 million.

The internal inquiry, following the appointment of Southwark council's new trustees, into the operations of the St. Olave charity included a report produced by its auditors Ball, Baker and Leake. It became apparent that Mr. Pollock had complete and total control over the charity. He authorised payments to the beneficiaries of the charity, he allocated empty property, and he authorised payment of all invoices, including those to Flowerbrook, the building company of which he was a director. None of this was referred to the trustees, and with respect to the allocation of empty properties, it is clear that he broke the allocation policy of the charity and simply favoured his friends and acquaintances. He even employed his father-in-law and a previous clerk to the charity as a consultant.

On further investigation it soon became apparent that there was a close and direct connection between Kindrid Property Company and Mr. Pollock. The Isle of Man is not renowned for the level of company information available to the public, but it was clear that Kindred was a shell company aimed to disguise ownership. More investigations revealed that the two signatories to the company's bank account were Mr. Barry Rosomon and Mr. Phillip Pollock. At this stage, the new trustees called in the fraud squad and Mr. Pollock was sacked as clerk in September 1985. Further proceedings now depend on the progress of fraud squad investigations.

The scandal surrounding the affairs of the St. Olave charity is an example of appalling personal greed and misconduct. It is also an indictment of, at best, complacency and, at worst, misconduct within the Charity Commission. That St. Olave's mansions and Fairlawn park did not follow the rest of the property of the charity into dubious ownership is entirely due to the efforts and hard work of the tenants, combined with members of the local community and Labour party, and assisted by the publicity given in The Mirror and in the South London Press.

Even now, many of those in the Charity Commission refuse to accept that they acted wrongly in allowing the charity to dispose of its assets — after I had made representations to and had meetings with Mr. Peach — on the basis of inaccurate statements from an unqualified surveyor. I accept that, under this Administration, the Charity Commission may lack the means fully to monitor the activities of charities. However, the suspicion surrounding St. Olave was first brought to its attention in February 1985 and it has consistently refused to investigate it throughout the year.

What is even more alarming is that the case of St. Olave is not the first of a major London charity being involved in fraudulent property deals. In the case of the Hampstead, Wells and Camden Trust, a charity well known to some members of the House, the trust's agent, Ronald O'Dell, disposed of 24 prime Hampstead properties for an average of £54,000 between 1979 and 1983. He was gaoled for fraud at the Old Bailey in February this year, for four months, with 11 months suspended.

There are three key questions now to be asked on the operation of key officials in the Charity Commission, and professional advisers in the asset stripping of the St. Olave charity. First, there is the role of the charity's solicitor, a Mr. Boodle, of George Carter and Co. It was Mr. Boodle who gave the advice to the charity to block the appointment of the new trustees nominated by Southwark in December 1984. It was Mr. Boodle again who, at the crucial meeting in November last year, approved the sale of the properties in Walnut Tree walk for £4,000 each, when any responsible solicitor would have challenged such a sale in such a location at such a price.

Again, it was Mr. Boodle who failed to take appropriate action to stop the sale of 126 Kennington road to the now deceased Mr. Clifford, who had applied to purchase it under a false name, following an evaluation by the unqualified surveyor, Mr. Gurvitz. Moreover, the same Mr. Boodle is failing to co-operate fully with the independent inquiry into the sale of properties by the St. Olave charity instigated by Southwark council. In my view, had the Charity Commissioner, Mr. Peach, been adequate for his job, Mr. Boodle's activities should already have been the subject of an inquiry by the commissioners themselves.

[Mr. Stuart Holland]

Secondly, there is the role of the accountants to the St. Olave charity, Ball, Baker and Leake. They produced a report on 29 August 1985, indicating clear evidence of maladministration and admitting that they were unable to confirm that they "have reviewed all relevant documentation, since the adequacy of the filing of information is insufficient to enable us to conclude with full confidence in this matter."

Yet despite this, Ball Baker and Leake made no recommendation concerning action to remedy the inadequacy of the information, and ended by thanking the clerk to the charity—the now sacked Mr. Pollock—for his co-operation.

Thirdly, and most important, there is the role of the Charity Commission in the approval of sales below market value to and through those who have been asset-stripping the St. Olave charity. The key here is the meeting that took place in the Charity Commission in November last year between Mr. Pollock and Mr. Rosomon and a member of staff of the Charity Commission. At this meeting, approval was given for the sale of properties belonging to St. Olave on the Fairlawn park estate in Sydenham at £11,000 each when the tenants of those properties were prepared to offer £17,000.

This situation demands answers to three questions. First, why was the sale approved at a price so clearly below value, and below what the tenants were prepared to pay? Secondly, why was there a change of policy by the Charity Commission or by someone in it within the half hour in which this meeting took place, granted that for months the commission had refused to agree to the sale? Thirdly, who in the Charity Commission approved such a sale during that meeting in November? Was it Mr. McManus, who also appears to have been involved in the approval of the sale of properties by Mr. O'Dell of the Hampstead, Wells and Camden Trust, which led to Mr. O'Dell being arraigned before the High Court and pleading guilty to fraud? If so, on what grounds did Mr. McManus come to such a change of mind so quickly on the matter of the sale? Was he offered and did he accept payment for such a change of mind?

It is clear that the matter must now be investigated at the highest level, since all the important prima facie evidence shows that corruption involving the asset-stripping of properties is not simply a matter of the abuse of a small charity such as St. Olave or the Hampstead, Wells and Camden Trust, but appears to extend into the Charity Commission itself. Let us by all means find that this is not the case and that individuals such as Mr. McManus can clear their names. Let it be a judicial inquiry instigated at the highest level, by the Home Office or the Solicitor-General rather than by the Charity Commission whose commissioner has proved utterly inadequate in his response to the grave charges brought now for nearly a year concerning the activities of St. Olave, just as it was for a longer period to the charges of corruption in the case of the Hampstead, Wells and Camden Trust.

Not least, let us, in such a judicial inquiry, have the full co-operation of hon. Members who have been associated with such charities, including the hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Sir G. Finsberg). He is, and for some years has been, a trustee of the Hampstead, Wells and Camden Trust, while Lady Pamela Finsberg was, until allegations of criminal activity were made, chair of the estates committee of that trust during the time of the offences for which the managing agent—Mr. O'Dell—of the trust was subsequently gaoled. I alerted the hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate that I would seek to raise the matter of this trust. I am sorry that he is not in the Chamber. Granted the hon. Gentleman's experience, and the direct parallels between the offences that have occurred in both St. Olave and the Hampstead, Wells and Camden Trust charities, the hon. Gentleman is admirably placed to be able to co-operate with and aid the public interest in giving evidence to such a judicial inquiry.

In particular, in relation to both trusts, the following questions should be investigated, and their results made public. First, when was the attention of the trustees first brought to the fraudulent sales? Secondly, why did the trustees wait for several months in both cases before seeking advice from the Charity Commission? Thirdly, why did the trust not bring the matters concerned to the attention of police at an earlier date? Fourthly, what business dealings has any member or trustee of either trust had with any property company, estate agent or developer and what has been the nature of those dealings, with what remuneration, at what times and on what terms? The Register of Members' Interests is quite inadequate in this respect. Whose fingers were in the till? Were they those of Mr. Pollock and Mr. O'Dell alone? Or was Mr. O'Dell, who has been given a sentence of only four months, the volunteer fallguy for bigger names to escape the courts?

Why did Mr. O'Dell get off with so light a sentence and the obligation to repay only £65,000 to the beneficiaries of the trust, having sold 24 prime properties in Hampstead, when this represented only a fraction of the value of the properties that he had sold to his advantage? Is the House to tolerate a situation in which, with millions of pounds of such asset-stripping, it may pay some individuals to go to jail for four months and then retire abroad on gains made—but unreclaimed—through tax havens, for the rest of their natural lives? Is this to be tolerated by the Charity Commission or the Government in the case of the St. Olave charity and its operations in my constituency?

The present procedure operated by the Charity Commission in regard to the sale of charitable land and property has shown itself open to gross manipulation and abuse. But in 1984 the Charity Commission gave nearly 2,000 orders authorising charity trustees to sell property. Given what has happened in these two individual charities in London, how can the public, the Government and the House be confident that other such sales among small charities are not similarly subject to peculation and fraud?

There is one final and outrageous twist to the role of the Charity Commission in the whole sorry saga of the St. Olave case. The new trustees, recognising the legitimate fears of the tenants of St. Olave's mansions, have agreed that the property should be acquired only by a socially responsible landlord, such as a housing association. They have now entered into negotiations with the London and Quadrant Housing Trust for the sale of St. Olave's mansions at a fair and independent price as determined by the district valuer. However, the Charity Commission has now intervened and insisted that the new trustees must sell to a property company at the highest possible price regardless of the future of the tenants. Having allowed most of the charity's property to be ripped off for a song, the Charity Commission's only action over all these months has been to prevent the new trustees from protecting the interests of its tenants and gaining a fair and independently assessed price for the sale of its assets to a housing trust.

The support and monitoring available to protect the beneficiaries of small charities need to be increased. If the Charity Commission is not up to the job, local authorities could and should be involved in the arrangement. Many trustees of charities are well-intentioned volunteers who are unaware of the full extent of their powers and responsibilities. They need support and training to ensure that their charities are properly administered. On the specific point of disposal of property and land, the present arrangements are patently quite inadequate. The whole concept of sale to the highest bidder, particularly in relation to tenanted property, forces charities into the uncharitable hands of property speculators and worse. The recent experience of the Church Commissioners with the sale of their tenanted property in Maida Vale is but one example of this.

Charities should be encouraged to dispose of their properties to other socially responsible landlords rather than to property speculators whose main interest is to secure vacant possession of property and make a quick profit. This could be achieved if charities were allowed to sell their properties at an independently assessed price determined by the district valuer, rather than open-market valuations which preclude all but property speculators from purchasing. That principle has been accepted by the Government in regard to council houses and it should surely apply to the sale of any property owned by charities.

The Charities Bill, which is awaiting Royal Assent, does not, unfortunately, address itself to these problems, as it is primarily concerned with charities having an annual income of £200 or less. St. Olave had an annual income in excess of £160,000, very little of which actually went to help its original beneficiaries.

The judicial inquiry for which I have called should produce recommendations for effective monitoring, support for trustees and guidelines for the disposal of land and property which should be incorporated into the amendments of the Charities Act 1960.

8.7 pm

Mr. William Powell (Corby): Like other hon. Members who have spoken, I seek to urge on my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House that our Adjournment be delayed, if only by a short time. Having heard the speeches in the debate, it is my earnest hope that we shall seek to adjourn the House more frequently than we do because we have had the opportunity to listen to a number of important speeches. One of the great advantages of a debate such as this over an ordinary Adjournment debate is that many hon. Members are present to hear what is said and all of those present in the Chamber for the debate have been educated and moved by what they have heard.

I have not the slightest doubt that the right hon. Member for Swansea, East (Mr. Williams) will take advantage of the opportunity that he will have to comment critically upon the conduct which has taken place in Lewisham and which has led my hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, East (Mr. Moynihan) to make his allegations. Equally, the hon. Member for Vauxhall (Mr. Holland) has brought before the House a series of matters of the utmost importance which it is entirely right that the House should debate.

As I am rather an old-fashioned kind of person, when the hon. Member for Vauxhall asked for a judicial inquiry, my mind turned to the device that was used very effectively by the House in days of old, which was to set up a Select Committee to investigate particular abuses and to make recommendations to the House. However, the hon. Member for Vauxhall is not the first person to make such allegations against the conduct of the Charity Commissioners, though it is exactly the kind of matter which, it seems to me, should properly be investigated by the House.

I want to refer to the speech of the hon. Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Kilroy-Silk) who, as always, spoke very movingly about the plight of the unemployed in his constituency and the horrendous problems with which he is faced in representing a constituency where 10,000 people are out of work and where there appears to be no prospect of work for them. I take advantage of this opportunity because, as a Conservative Member of Parliament, I have some qualifications for speaking on the subject of unemployment.

When I was elected a Member of Parliament two and a half years ago, I was the Conservative Member of Parliament with the highest level of unemployment in his constituency. At that time about 7,000 to 7,500 people were unemployed. That is a horrendous enough figure, but it is not as high as the unemployment in the constituency of the hon. Member for Knowsley, North. But he is not alone. Many Opposition Members represent constituencies where there is five-figure unemployment. There are no constituencies represented by Conservative Members of Parliament, thank goodness, with five-figure unemployment. We should not turn a deaf ear to the pleas that are made, even if the solutions that are brought forward, during the period of either the present Administration or a changed Administration, make only limited progress towards dealing with the problem.

I am blessed further because, although the hon. Member for Knowsley, North sees unemployment in his constituency rising inexorably and quite hopelessly—I accept his analysis—fortunately, unemployment in my constituency has fallen further and faster since the general election in June 1983 than in any other constituency in the country. I was representing just over 7,000 unemployed persons in 1983, but that figure has now dropped to under 5,500. Furthermore, I can look forward to a continuing and substantial reduction in unemployment. It is therefore a racing certainty, if ever there was one, that by the next general election unemployment in my constituency will have been cut by, at the very least, more than half.

Let me reflect for a moment upon why that should be so. There are two aspects to it, neither of which should be overlooked by right hon. and hon. Members. First, a responsibility lies upon the Treasury Bench. My criticism of the analysis put forward by the hon. Member for Knowsley, North — I regret that he is not in the Chamber — is that he concentrates too much upon a public sector solution to his problems. My contention is that the public sector has an important role to play. There is no running away from that fact. I want that fact to be understood by my hon. Friends, the Opposition and the alliance. Let us not forget that overwhelmingly, except in two cases, the alliance represents constituencies where there is extremely low unemployment. The two exceptions are the inner city constituencies of Southwark and Bermondsey and Liverpool, Mossley Hill.

[Mr. William Powell]

The public sector has a very important pump-priming role to play, but on the back of that pump-priming role the private sector must come in. That is exactly what has happened to a huge extent in my constituency.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): That would be the policy of a Labour Government.

Mr. Powell: The hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) is always helpful. He says that that would be the policy of a Labour Government. I accept that that is their ambition, but another factor has to be considered. Not all the hon. Gentleman's friends are as assiduous about this point as they ought to be in the interests of their constituents. If the private sector is to come in on the back of public sector pump priming, it is vital that the reputation of the communities where that is to happen should be as sky high as it can possibly be. If private sector finance is to be attracted, it is vital that the private sector companies that one seeks to attract to one's community should be encouraged to come in because of the good reputation of that place.

An unfortunate fact of life—although it may not be welcomed by all right hon. and hon. Members if I spell it out as clearly as this—is that not all areas of this country enjoy a high reputation not only in the rest of this country but in the rest of the world. When there is competition for private sector investment, it is always a handicap when the private sector says that it does not like the reputation of a particular place. I stress that it may be a false reputation, but it is the duty of local communities, if people have a false and misconceived view of their community, to do everything that they possibly can to dispel it. That message is not coming through as loudly and as clearly as it ought to do from some of the places where unemployment is very high. I make that point not as a general, sweeping criticism but as a fact of life. It is well known in the rest of this country. It is also well known to international investors.

Let us not forget that all the time we are travelling through time. I was born and brought up in rural Suffolk. Today it is a boom area, but 100 years ago it was not. The villages of rural Suffolk were then being depopulated. The best of the local population frequently went to the large towns, among which were Merseyside, Manchester and London, to find prosperity and work. Many of them, though not all, found exactly that. The reason that they went in particular to Liverpool, Bristol and Glasgow was that those port cities were geographically in the correct place at that time in history for the role that they had to play. The ports of Liverpool, Glasgow and Bristol were servicing our empire. Therein lay their prosperity.

Today the role of history has changed the geographical axis of this country. We are living in an age in which increasingly the bulk of our trade is exported through our eastern ports to Europe. It is not exported westwards, via the Atlantic ocean, to the empire. Our trade goes to the European Community and to other European countries. That is simply a fact of life in the age in which we live. There is not the slightest doubt in my mind that every community on the western side of this country is geographically at a disadvantage compared with every community on the eastern side.

The public sector undoubtedly has an important role to play. It has to do what it can to compensate for this very substantial geographical handicap. Nobody would be more pleased than I, except possibly the hon. Member for Workington, if unemployment in his constituency, on the western side of this country, were to be reduced to zero. However, because of the location of his constituency, he faces a very considerable handicap compared with mine where unemployment is falling substantially. It is on the eastern side of the country. It is two hours from the port of Felixstowe to which so much of its trade comes and from which so much of its trade is exported.

We have to face up to the many unfortunate, unpleasant and debilitating facts of life about the unemployed. I was grateful to the hon. Member for Knowsley, North for his contribution. However, we do not say enough about one other aspect of unemployment. I admit that unemployment in my constituency was high at the time of the last election. It is still very high, although it is falling.

One feature of the unemployment statistics in my constituency stands out. It is that the bulk of unemployed people there are middle aged. Middle age begins at a depressingly young age. At 30 years of age people are told that they will never work again. People aged 16, 17 or 18 have no difficulty in finding work, but at 30 finding work is difficult and it is even more difficult for the 35 and 40-year-olds. They are the forgotten unemployed. Yet the effect on people of that age is greatest because they usually have children.

A person of 30 is likely to have a young family. It is almost certain that the wife will be unable to work because of the responsibilities and demands of young children. The tax and social security systems act as a massive disincentive to work and that creates the grinding, deplorable, debilitating problem of family poverty.

I urge the Minister to counsel his colleagues on the Treasury Bench and in the Cabinet to do everything that they can, beyond the call of duty, to ease the effects of our social security and tax systems on young families when the husband is out of work and considered too old, the wife is unable to work and young children are growing up and imposing huge demands. The social security system does not provide sufficient for such families. The tax system bites too heavily and too low on the scale so that the disincentive to work is considerable. It is important to ensure that the thresholds are raised so that there is no disincentive to work if and when such people find work.

8.22 pm

Mr. D. E. Thomas (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy): The hon. Member for Corby (Mr. Powell) spoke about the difficulties in the western part of Britain. I want to refer to the difficulties facing one of the traditional industries in my constituency. It is an industry which you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, know well and to which you made a significant contribution when you were a Minister. You are perhaps the Minister who has made the most significant contribution to that industry because you introduced the pneumoconiosis compensation scheme which has benefited many slate workers and their families.

I want to highlight publicly the long dispute in three slate quarries in my constituency in the town of Blaenau Ffestiniog. The House cannot take much action in the dispute, but it is incumbent on me to exert as much influence and moral pressure as I can on the directors of the companies concerned so that a negotiated settlement is reached. To that end, I placed on the Order Paper this week an early-day motion which seeks to put pressure on the companies to refer the long-standing dispute to the Advisory, Conciliation and Arbitration Service.

I do not want to take advantage of my privileged position to go into detail about the causes of the dispute; that is not my role. I want to stress that this has been a long-running dispute for four months. It began during the summer recess.

The dispute is over a bonus payment scheme. The workers have been working to rule and some have been dismissed. The directors of the companies involved have not been prepared to refer this official dispute to conciliation. I pay tribute to the attempts that have been made by individuals, by the town council, by the official shadow spokesman for Wales who has visited the area, and by ACAS officials who have sought informally to persuade the managements to agree to further negotiations.

Unfortunately, at least one of the directors is not prepared to communicate with me. That director has not answered a succession of letters that I have sent to him. He is not prepared to meet me to discuss the issue. He is not willing to meet the regional secretary for Wales of the Transport and General Workers Union, Mr. George Wright. It is clear that the dispute will continue well beyond Christmas unless the managements of the companies are prepared to negotiate.

The dispute is dividing a community. It is creating bitterness. That seems to be part of the legacy of the slate industry's industrial relations. We have experienced long lockouts before. We experienced long disputes, known in Wales as streic fawr, in the slate industry at the turn of the century. I regret that small local companies, owned by local Welsh people, are behaving in a way which is reminiscent of the behaviour of the landlords and quarry owners of a bygone era.

I want not to recriminate but to stress that employers in a small community have a social obligation. One of those obligations is a willingness always to communicate with the work force. They must be willing to negotiate with the official spokespersons of the work force. I pay tribute to the way in which the lodge and the trade union official responsible for the area, Mr. Tom Jones, have conducted themselves during the dispute.

Picketing has not occurred as it did in another dispute in the mining industry. The conduct of those concerned has been restrained. Throughout the dispute the community has supported the workers, and support has come from beyond Wales. The quarry workers face a Christmas on a reduced income and are much concerned about their jobs. I am worried that the quarry owners will seek to recruit other workers and will not reinstate those dismissed during the dispute.

I hope that the companies will take heed of my request that they meet ACAS officials so that a peaceful solution to the dispute can be found. I urge other hon. Members, either in this debate or by other means, to join me in exerting pressure on the companies so that good industrial relations can be restored to the slate industry.

When personal relationships break down, the emphasis is on the need for conciliation, or even compulsory conciliation. Perhaps we should re-examine our industrial relations legislation and find ways to make conciliation procedures compulsory when relations break down. I hope that as a result of the publicity that the issue has attracted throughout Britain the companies will respond to our request for negotiations.

8.30 pm

Mr. Christopher Murphy (Welwyn Hatfield): Before the House rises for the Christmas recess it should consider afresh three aspects of reforming zeal affecting local, national and international policies, all of which are of interest to my constituents.

The first aspect is rating reform and its special local significance. Having for long advocated the abolition of domestic rates, I welcome the renewed Government commitment to action—better late than never, as may have been feared at one time. Although I favour a system based on a poll tax, I recognise that many gaily bedecked and bewitching paths may lead to the ultimate Christmas box desired by many, but let us venture at last along one of these tinselled ways.

The current system adds additional problems to the evident and inbuilt one of unfairness. The rate support grant formula inadequately reflects the needs of shire counties such as Hertfordshire, as I have drawn to the attention of the House in the past. I will only say, to avoid rehearsing my lines again, that this pantomime must be taken off and restaged, for as it currently performs—bearing in mind also the requirements of districts such as Welwyn Hatfield—it fails to persuade me to vote for such settlements.

Indeed, in consequence of today's announcement, regarding the district council, it is literally a case of "thanks for nothing," and from the point of view of the county council, "thanks for very little", as the rate support grant has been significantly reduced despite adherence to Government guidelines.

I continue with shop hour reform, which is of national importance. I have never opposed a voluntary approach to Sunday trading, but have always opposed any compulsory element. A previous attempt via a private Member's Bill to overcome the present anomalous situation was something that I could support, but now we are faced with a Government measure which goes far further, in that people's employment is also being tackled in a way that creates potential new anomalies, which I could not support.

It must be appropriate, as we approach the eve of Christmas, to consider such matters from a Christian and committed viewpoint. I urge the Government to reconsider the matter and to agree that to sell the Bible on Sunday is no crime, but that nobody should have to work against his or her conscience on that day.

I conclude with Northern Ireland constitutional reform and its international dimension. The Anglo-Irish agreement is in danger of becoming a donkey from two thoroughbred stables—I am keeping to the Christmas theme—and I fear that no amount of coaxing will achieve the necessary movement. All men of goodwill must want the Nationalist as well as the Unionist view to be represented, but that should not be by proxy via the Dublin Government with no democratic mandate. Rather, it should be by way of full and fair local government, and that is sadly lacking in the Province.

I wish to see an end to the bloodshed, and that is why I favour the closest possible co-operation with the Republic to defeat terrorism from whatever source. Such co-operation should be freely given, without any need to accept an erosion of the sovereignty of the United Kingdom or a weakening of the commitment of remaining British while the majority wish it—hence my opposition to the accord.

[Mr. Christopher Murphy]

To satisfy the angelic choirs that he has heard this evening, my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House will need all the sagacity of the three wise men. I wish him well.

8.34 pm

Mr. Jim Craigen (Glasgow, Maryhill): In some quarters this is regarded as the hypocrites' debate. I hasten to assure the Leader of the House that I want my Christmas break and I am taking the opportunity of the debate to raise a constituency matter, though it has considerable health implications for Glasgow and the west of Scotland.

It concerns the proposed closure of the infectious diseases ward, No. 12, at Ruchill hospital in Glasgow. This proposal by the Greater Glasgow health board arises out of the serious financial situation facing the board, both in the current year 1985-86 and in 1986-87. I am optimistic enough to believe that the Leader of the House, being a man of some influence in the Cabinet, will have a word in the ear of his colleague who is responsible for health in Scotland, because I am anxious to see some Government follow-up to the points that I am raising about the recommended closure of the ward.

It is an 18-bed adult ward and it is estimated that £300,000 would be saved by its closure. The implication, however, is that 25 per cent. of all the adult cubicles in the infectious diseases unit, or two fifths of the support beds that are currently available, would be lost.

I need hardly remind the Leader of the House that Glasgow recently experienced some disturbing cases of legionnaire's disease and that there has been an increase in the number of hepatitis cases. The new Minister for Health has been making it clear that the Government are keen to do more to assist the prevention of AIDS. In these days of greater international travel, the incidence of tropical diseases is also on the increase.

I am raising this issue because the main areas of work done at Ruchill merit close examination by the Scottish Office. Legionnaire's disease has become far more common. Indeed, it is now one of the more common causes of pneumonia, and a number of recent cases admitted to Ruchill have been of legionnaire's disease.

The incidence of AIDS is causing that disease to have a higher political profile. We cannot underestimate the interrelationship between AIDS and the growing problem of drug abuse. I shall not bore the House with the figures, but I gather from them that many youngsters are becoming involved in this horrendous area because of the effects of drug abuse.

About 8 per cent. of cases admitted to the unit at Ruchill arise from tropical diseases and fevers, and the World Health Organisation recently pointed to the growing number of new viruses which the medical profession is having to combat.

The Ruchill unit deals with a broad range of referrals. In this area of health, all admissions are, by their nature, emergency admissions; one cannot have an appointments system when coping with infectious diseases. Some patients are admitted and found subsequently not to have infectious and communicable diseases, but 93 per cent. of cases are confirmed, so facilities must be available for early investigation and medical treatment.

In 1980 the Belvedere hospital unit in Glasgow closed and its infectious diseases facilities were integrated and concentrated at Ruchill, which now has a wide reputation in Scotland for the work that it does. We have two paediatric wards. Originally we had four adult wards, but one was closed, and now the Greater Glasgow health board is proposing that ward 12 should close in order to save £300,000 because of the board's terrible financial position, which has arisen from the mean-mindedness of the Scottish Office in not realistically appraising the health needs within the Greater Glasgow area.

An audit on bed utilisation recently showed that if ward 12 were to close, on one day in three no isolation cubicles would be available for any cases that may occur. I need hardly tell the Leader of the House that the attendant risks to the community at large do not bear examination. What seems to be an economy may prove to be an expensive cut in public expenditure. All too often trying to save a penny or two here leads to spending a pound or two somewhere else because of the consequential effects.

I hope that the Leader of the House will use his good offices to impress on the Scottish Office the need to examine the position at Ruchill in relation to some of the wider problems that arise from infectious diseases, not only in Glasgow, but in the west of Scotland, which the unit presently serves.

8.41 pm

Mr. David Amess (Basildon): Before the House adjourns for what I trust will be an enjoyable Christmas recess for us all, we should consider the future of hospital radio broadcasting and certain anxieties about community radio. I have the privilege to speak in this place—I hasten to add, in an unpaid capacity—for the National Association of Hospital Broadcasting Organisations. Those unsung heroes and heroines are unique in that they are all unpaid, yet it is an extremely large charity. I should particularly like to take this opportunity to pay tribute to all the hard work of the executive committee.

I should say at the outset that my career as a hospital radio broadcaster has been extremely short. Some years ago I volunteered my services to Radio St. Andrews in Bow which used to operate in a cupboard underneath the stairs. After just three weeks the lady in charge of the station diplomatically told me that my services were no longer required. She implied that I did not have quite the sort of voice that they were looking for. Some other far less diplomatic person told me that I was just not cut out to be a disc jockey and that my voice was not altogether conducive to the recovery of patients. However, I did not take offence and I do not apologise to the House for having to suffer me at the moment.

The importance of hospital radio cannot be overstressed. There is an argument, backed by respected members of the psychiatric profession, that the therapeutic value of hospital radio contributes to the speeding of patients' recovery. People often come into hospital lonely and afraid. With the best will in the world, one's family, where there is a family, is not in a position to appreciate the problems. No one can be there all the time. The mental pain can be more traumatic than the physical pain which put the patient into hospital in the first place.

Hospital radio supplies a friendly voice, somebody who is of the local community and yet with the patient, somebody aware of the difficulties of that specific hospital. Indeed, the patient is likely to meet the radio voice as the person travels round the wards. That friendly voice takes the mind off the loneliness and pain, and that can only contribute to a successful discharge from hospital. As Seneca said over 2,000 years ago, the desire to be healed has always been part of health. Hospital radio assists in that desire to be healed by keeping a person in touch with the immediate outside world and away from the pain he experiences.

Practically all hon. Members will have some form of radio in hospitals in their constituencies. There are about 300 hospital broadcasting organisations which provide a service, in addition to that of relayed BBC and IBA stations, to their audience of over 217,000 patients. All hon. Members will have some of the 10,000 volunteers working in hospitals in their constituencies. We have 70 such people in Basildon, and I am delighted to say that a few weeks ago I opened the first television network in a hospital in my constituency.

I want the House to consider a fair charter for hospital radio. We are not asking for grants or funds, and we wish to retain our independence. Fund raising goes on through the year in order to keep items such as equipment up to date. However, hospital broadcasting organisations still meet opposition from within administrations. Each organisation is dependent for its existence on the attitude prevailing in each individual hospital. Many administrators are helpful and co-operative, but there are still some who are obstructive and unhelpful. One organisation was kept out of a hospital by a senior nursing officer who felt that the project was not worth while. Another had to argue for eight years to have the facility afforded to it.

Most stations can operate within a single room, 10 ft by 10 ft—the size of many hon. Members' offices. Many hospital radios interconnect with small hospitals in the same area. For some years they relied on telephone landlines whose price remained stable. Eventually, British Telecom had to bring prices into line with other charges to prevent large losses. BT co-operated to the fullest extent with NAHBO in trying to cost the alternative of using the private landlines of the hospital system. It was estimated that the use of such lines could produce savings of up to 80 per cent. Unfortunately, the Department of Health and Social Security wrote to NAHBO and put the entire burden back on to individual administrators, from which the organisation sought to remove the difficulty.

My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary is considering the implementation of community radio. I know that he has received my representations and those of the society on that subject. All the arguments that I have researched on the use of internal hospital radio apply with more vigour to the use of a low-powered radio frequency transmitter. Broadcasting to several hospitals would be enormously simplified. Initially, there would be no need to use the internal telecommunications system of the hospital network. Nor would there be any need to spend recurring amounts on British Telecom landlines. The transmitter would be relatively expensive but would probably pay for itself in a few years. It would also be non-recurrent capital expenditure, towards which fund-raising could be directed.

As headsets take such a low priority nowadays, many patients are encouraged to bring their own headsets and transistor radios with them into hospital. That tends to lead to them becoming out of touch with the local community and to miss the personal service of hospital radio. A transmitter, even on a time-sharing basis, would put patients back in touch. As most organisations intend running some kind of two-way family favourites programme, the implementation of community radio would result in a much closer, more supportive relationship between the patient and his family—the kind of relationship which sustains and encourages the fight against illness and for which the DHSS laid down guidelines when referring to children. Adults become as lonely and afraid as children, especially when faced with the unknown. The provision of low-power transmitters would undoubtedly assist in the crucial area of patient recovery.

In all those problems there can be seen one common denominator. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services does not issue guidelines to district health authorities on their attitude towards hospital radio. Indeed, the message from the Department is that the matter is for the individual hospital administrator. The association agrees that decision-making should be left to individual administrators. It is in favour of local autonomy. Nevertheless, it looks to the Department to provide some kind of leadership.

I urge my right hon. Friend to look again at the difficulties facing hospital radio; at the marvellous efforts of so many voluntary workers; and at the worth of their contribution to the healing process. He will find the case for guidelines overwhelming, and I ask him to issue a circular placing hospital radio in context for the busy administrators of hospitals in Britain today. Let us never again take hospital radio for granted, but give it the support and encouragement that it fully deserves.

8.51 pm

Mr. Harry Cohen (Leyton): Before we adjourn for Christmas we should have a proper debate on Britain's nuclear policy and the need for nuclear disarmament.

Yesterday I visited Greenham Common and met the brave women in the peace camps. They endure much in the protest against cruise missiles and against nuclear annihilation of Britain that the use of such missiles would mean. Theirs is a peaceful protest. They totally renounce violence to the police or to anyone else on the base, but the converse is not the case. Yesterday an elderly woman, Sarah Hipperson, was savagely thrown into a 12 ft ditch by the police because she was standing in front of a tree in which another woman was perched. Miss Hipperson suffered severe injuries and shock, but it could have been worse. There is a continuous history of such violence against the women and it has been increasing. I am told that in August Ms. Ann Harrower was knocked down by a United States road patrol vehicle which deliberately swerved to hit her—a clear case of reckless and attempted deadly dangerous driving. I believe that the vehicle had a Royal Air Force police escort who just left Ms. Harrower lying in the road. If thuggish behaviour of that kind by police and military authorities is allowed to continue unabated, one of those peaceful women protesters will die. If that happens, the Government will be responsible.

The principal purpose of my speech, however, is not to prevent deaths of that kind, although that is clearly vital, but to prevent the millions of deaths to which Britain's current nuclear policy is leading. The House, to its shame, provides scant opportunity to argue the matter. I intend today to show that Britain's nuclear policy is morally and militarily indefensible.

[Mr. Harry Cohen]

Of course Britain must defend itself. That is a straightforward moral and military stance which I accept, but our defence should be non-nuclear. Britain's long and unique history has always hinged on our ability to defend this sceptred isle. The history of the 20th century has brought home forcefully the moral and military imperative of protecting the people and boundaries of our nation from attack. Of course it was right to take up arms against Fascism in the second world war. Since then, however, there has been an immense break with our previous historic notions of defence—the development, proliferation and sale of nuclear armaments.

The scale of the current nuclear arsenal is monstrous compared with any previous arms accumulation. All the bombs dropped in the second world war amounted to about 3 megatonnes. The present nuclear capacity in the world is 15,000 megatonnes and rising. Our defence policies are now not just militarily but morally indefensible. They are indefensible, first, because they fail in their intended purpose of defending our nation state. In other words, they are dishonest and immoral in their own terms.

One of the best-kept secrets from the British people is that nuclear weapons are first and foremost weapons of attack. They are offensive, not defensive. They have never been developed as weapons of defence and star wars is no exception, despite the Government's shameful support of that policy. They may splutter, like President Reagan, about defensive umbrellas, but, as I discovered in the United States recently, the Pentagon makes no secret of the fact that if the Russians attempted to put a similar umbrella over the United States it would be interpreted as an offensive act. Essentially, the strategic defence initiative is a massive first strike capability. Nuclear weapons will be used to strike first or to counter-attack. Either way, there is no defence.

What possible defence of our nation state is envisaged in which there will be few, if any, survivors? Protection, in human terms, does not dispense with the population in favour of strategic war games designed to ensure that space weapons and ballistic weapons long outlive us. Yet the Pentagon's massive research programme into what it calls "survivability" is devoted entirely to arms survival, not to human survival.

Will civil defence come to the rescue? What have the Government planned for us in that respect? The Conservatives have decided on their own open-market, individualistic approach. At the top of the social scale, the stockbroker bunker will provide cramped accommodation with a chemical toilet for two weeks before jettisoning its occupants into the nuclear winter. For do-it-yourself addicts, the Government advise urine-soaked sheets, upturned mattresses and plenty of white paint. For those caught outside, in the words of City Limits magazine, the advice is to "lay face down and kiss your arse goodbye."

That is a direct quotation, but the sensitive reader of Hansard may insert the word "backside" — same difference. That is hardly a serious protection strategy for the people of Britain.

When one looks more closely at the civil defence plans, it is clear that they are irrelevant to the real protection that the population will need in a nuclear war. Drastic powers are given to the armed forces. They are to control movement on main roads from our cities, preventing civilian evacuation and keeping the way clear for the police and the military. They are to cut off our phones, isolating families, relatives and friends. The plans provide for arrest and internment of anyone opposing moves towards nuclear war. Indeed, summary executions were part of the "Brave Defender" plans. The plans further provide for the takeover of stocks of food, petrol and drugs and the movement of Ministers, officials and military commanders to protected bunkers.

In short, the Government's civil defence plans are for our own armed forces to be used against our own people, the very people whom they are supposed to be defending. Such strategies are morally indefensible in purporting to meet the needs of people suffering the physical, medical and biological effects of a nuclear blast. The Government's message is clear: "Stay at home and die at home if you don't want to be shot in your own streets."

It is hard to see what protection there is for Britain in our current alliance with the United States. We have given away our national sovereignty by allowing American nuclear bases and weapons to be sited here. It is Reagan's finger that is on the trigger ready to fire cruise missiles. British military personnel are relegated to patrolling the perimeter fences and subjecting peaceful women protesters to the thuggish tactics that I have described. By amassing our own and an American nuclear arsenal on our soil, we have become a major strike target for an attack against which no defence can be mounted. This country has become the unwilling site of a European nuclear theatre so that the super-powers can keep the nuclear fight out of their own back yards. That is scarcely a list of morally edifying examples to give people faith in the protection offered by the United States.

Why do we not take the protection of our nation state seriously, and without delay get rid of all nuclear weapons? We should begin to build nuclear shelters on the Swiss model designed for all the population in the event of our not becoming direct targets, and we should become allies with those nations that are taking a moral lead against the nuclear madness.

Our nuclear arms system is an indefensible corruption and waste of human resources. In human terms, it is a depraved use of labour power. What can be more alienating than to work on a nuclear production line? What moral ideas of human dignity, creativity and self-worth are extinguished during such work when the unanswerable necessity of the wage packet drives out higher considerations of the genocidal consequences of this macabre production? What kind of morality places a higher priority on nuclear arms at the expense of the wilful neglect of useful production and research to meet human needs in Britain? There is ample evidence to show that our high levels of nuclear defence spending have played a significant part in Britain's economic decline.

But there is a practical, moral alternative called arms conversion, whereby resources misused on nuclear production could be redirected to civil markets to secure real jobs and to meet our obvious needs. That arms conversion programme should be massively expanded.

Furthermore, it is a scandal that more than 50 per cent. of Government-financed research is for military purposes.

This deprives research funding of projects that are attempting to solve a wide variety of real problems that face ordinary people. How contemptible is the Chancellor's cry that we cannot afford the welfare state when he rubber-stamps a 29 per cent. real increase in defence spending between 1979 and 1984.

The misuse of nuclear arms resources is at its most wicked when we count the cost of human suffering and misery in the Third world. No amount of Band Aid can stick over the shameful cracks in Government policy. With redirection, the scale of help towards global sufficiency would be remarkable. The cost of nuclear arms expenditure for two weeks would rid the world of infected water—a glorious prospect that is miles beyond the shabby vision of nuclear arms pedlars such as Reagan, Weinberger, the Prime Minister and the Conservative Front Bench.

The final thrust of my argument is to point to the global havoc caused by our needless rush to nuclear power. Communities throughout the world have unknowingly been exposed to the awful effects of nuclear testing and production. The extent of genetic damage, environmental pollution, radiation sickness and death following Britain's nuclear testing in Australia 30 years ago is only just emerging. The Government's response is to equivocate on their responsibility lest compensation proves costly and widespread.

Meanwhile, nuclear trains, with their deadly load, still trundle through many built-up areas every day, including my constituency of Leyton, and all that the Government can offer is public relations. That is their main plank of action. They rename areas to banish their radioactive connotation—for example, Windscale to Sellafield. Is anyone fooled or impressed? Is it any safer for children to play on those beaches? Is this the extent of the Government's moral responsibility to our land and people, including the military personnel engaged for our defence who are so casually subjected to radiation?

Even these shameful practices pale into insignificance when we consider the prospects unleashed for the entire world following a nuclear exchange. After deaths from burns, blasts and fall-out, the short-term aftermath would involve the collapse of food supplies, contamination of the water supply, the threat of fire, disease and pests, and the destruction of farm animals. The environmental devastation that that would entail would begin to upset the entire balance of the world's ecological structure, hurling us into a nuclear winter for generations to come. What a price to pay for moral disregard on this scale! We would have a world without hope, life and a future.

I urge the House to heed the words of Martin Luther King:

"We must either learn to live together as brothers, or we are going to perish together as fools".

9.3 pm

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): I must say immediately that I do not agree with a single word of what the hon. Member for Leyton (Mr. Cohen) has said. I believe very strongly in a nuclear deterrent.

There are three important matters that I should like to raise prior to the House going into recess. First, too many of our children are going missing each year, and I again make the plea for a central computer to record the details of the circumstances in which these children go missing.

Last year 20,000 children disappeared, although most were found. What my hon. Friend the Member for Gosport (Mr. Viggers) said was perfectly correct. At the end of last year 4,500 children had still not been found, and 45 had been abducted, including two from my own constituency. I therefore call on my right hon. Friend to introduce a central computer to ensure that all the circumstances surrounding these missing children can be properly recorded. I congratulate and compliment the National Children's Home on what it is trying to do with limited resources.

My second point concerns motorway lighting. There are only 376 miles of lighted motorway, leaving 1,100 miles unlighted. It would cost £9 million to light the rest of the M1, and £81 million to light the entire motorway system. The Select Committee on Transport called for all motorways to be lighted. It said that lighting motorways at night reduced accidents by 60 per cent. As a fatality at night costs £205,460, that seems a reasonable amount to spend. According to column 112 of the Official Report of 17 December 1985, which lists motorway fatalities by lighting conditions, on motorways unlighted, at night, there were 62 fatalities in 1982, 54 in 1983 and 61 in 1984, on motorways lighted, at night, there were 40 fatalities in 1982, 24 in 1983 and 33 in 1984; and in the daytime there were 104 fatalities in 1982, 109 in 1983 and 117 in 1984.

Lives could be saved. As my hon. Friend the Minister of State has confirmed, if a serious night-time problem develops on a particular length of road, lighting is automatically considered. That should be done. My hon. Friend stated that she was "keeping under review the need to provide additional lighting on the remaining unlit stretches of the M1."—[Official Report, 12 December 1984; Vol 69, c. 532.]

The Transport Select Committee stated:

"We recommend the gradual installation of overhead lighting on existing motorways."

If there is a serious night accident problem which cannot be solved by other measures, lighting must be considered. That proposal has the support of the Royal Automobile Club, the Association of Chief Police Officers and the Royal Society for the Prevention of Accidents. The evidence shows that during the hours of darkness the accident rate is worse than during daylight. The time is right and the money is well worth spending. The Department of Transport has promised to provide a cost-benefit policy for allocating lighting on our motorways.

My third point concerns drinking and driving. Drinking and driving kills, yet the campaigns that the Department of Transport regularly puts forward never seem to get the message across. Last year's campaign at Christmas was "Stay low". It wrongly seemed to suggest that we should not drink too much before we drive. That campaign cost £880,000. My hon. Friend the Minister of State made it clear that she was against drinking and then driving. Unfortunately, the campaign's message did not get through completely. It is wrong to have a campaign only at Christmas. I ask everyone to be careful when drinking if he or she intends driving. I believe that the campaign should operate throughout the year.

As my hon. Friend the Minister of State said when launching her campaign on 9 December 1985, "Don't drink and drive." However, she went on to say, "If you think that you can drink and drive, think again." It is clear that that is not the right policy.

[Mr. Peter Bruinvels]

Alcohol affects the performance of any driver, so drivers should desist from drinking. This is one of the most serious road safety problems. With RoSPA making it clear that mixing drinking and driving causes 1,200 deaths a year—one fifth of all deaths on the road—it is clear that there should be no drinking and then driving.

The police have unrestricted powers to stop all motorists if they suspect that a driver has consumed alcohol. I urge them to do so, not just at Christmas, but throughout the year. I would prefer random breath tests, but the Transport Select Committee opposes them. I believe that random breath testing would be welcomed, because it would save lives. I should like an increase in the level of enforcement generally—north and south of the border — throughout the year. As drinking and driving is a problem throughout the year, the introduction of random breath testing would be a deterrent.

The numbers of deaths in drinking and driving accidents in which a driver was positively breath tested were as follows: 451 in 1982, 340 in 1983 and 338 in 1984. There is no doubt that fatal accidents are caused by excessive drinking. The numbers of people disqualified from driving because of offences involving driving after consuming alcohol or taking drugs were as follows: 64,000 in 1982, 86,000 in 1983 and 89,000 in 1984. I urge the House to give this policy the maximum support.

The policy will be effective. It will stop drivers taking the risk, especially at Christmas. We should take licences away immediately and not allow offenders to continue driving until their court appearance. That would have a deterrent effect. I want to see heavy fines imposed. The maximum should be at least £5,000, and not the present £2,000. If someone causes death by drinking and driving, he or she should go to prison for a minimum of 10 years. I want to see a Christmas clampdown on drinking and driving, and one that will continue throughout the year.

9.10 pm

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): The House should not adjourn until we discuss some elements of the Government's defence procurement policy. The elements with which I am concerned are of deep concern to my constituency. I refer to the placement of orders for conventional diesel electric submarines.

Last Thursday, I asked the Leader of the House whether he would ask the Secretary of State for Defence to make a statement in the next few days on the placement of these orders. The Leader of the House replied:

"I shall certainly convey that request."—[Official Report, 12 December 1985; Vol. 88, c. 1073.]

I should like to know whether the right hon. Gentleman conveyed my request to his right hon. Friend and, if so, the answer that he received.

In a letter of 28 November, the Prime Minister wrote:

"I understand that the competing tenders are still being assessed, but that Michael Heseltine intends to make an announcement on the placing of the order later this month."

I presume the right hon. Lady meant in December, before the House adjourned. A great deal of press speculation surrounds what appears to be a long-delayed decision.

I accept that I should not believe everything that I read in the newspapers, and that was pointed out to me by the Secretary of State for Scotland when I asked him to comment on his failure to persuade his ministerial colleagues at the Ministry of Defence to place these orders with Scottish yards. His press report suggested that the orders for all three submarines would be awarded to Vickers-Cammell Laird. I fully expect the Secretary of State for Defence to confirm that speculation. I say that with some confidence as the Minister of State for Defence Procurement stated on 26 November that the Government believed that there should be a number of submarine builders in the United Kingdom. He said:

"It is the Government's intention that there should be a number of submarine builders in this country, just as there are at present. Vickers has a monopoly not of conventional but of nuclear submarines. We envisage that there will be plenty of competition for conventional submarines".—[Official Report, 26 November; Vol. 87, c. 735.]

Much of the press speculation suggests that the orders are heading in precisely the direction of Vickers-Cammell Laird. If that is so, the statement which I have quoted is worthless. Two Scottish yards have tendered for the orders and I wish to confine my remarks—this should surprise no one in the House—to Scott Lithgow.

I was quoted recently in Lloyd's List as having said:

"there have been so many marked improvements in the yard that he"—

that is, the Minister of State for Defence Procurement—

"can be confident that any defence or offshore orders would not only be built to the high standards expected, but would be delivered on or before the specified delivery.".

Following that quotation in Lloyd's List, I received a letter from a consultant naval architect, who had this to say about Scott Lithgow:

"at the time of the 'Ocean Alliance' cancellation in 1983 and subsequently on four occasions since then I have been commissioned by Britoil to make a 'completely independent' evaluation of Scott Lithgow's performance.

It is my belief that your view is fully supportable. If you think I can be of any help, even at this late hour, I shall be very happy to do so."

He has helped me by sending me that letter.

If the Minister's words are to be believed, one of the three orders for SKK2400 diesel electric submarines should go either to Yarrows or to Scott Lithgow. All three should not go to Vickers because that would create a monopoly in conventional submarine building. Vickers already has a monopoly in nuclear submarine building. In fairness to Scott Lithgow, one of the orders should be given to that yard.

9.16 pm

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) for being so punctual in concluding his remarks on a matter about which he feels very strongly.

As the Leader of the House will appreciate, Back Benchers highly value both the time available to them on the Adjournment following the passing of the Consolidated Fund Bill and the opportunities that are provided by this motion to raise matters of concern to them. Therefore, it is to be regretted that today there were three statements before the debate on the motion for the Christmas recess. I cannot remember the Consolidated Fund debate starting so late. After all, the House made a concession to the Government by limiting the finishing time of the Consolidated Fund debate rather than it being open-ended as it was previously. In exchange, the Government owe it to the House to ensure that they do not hi-jack the time that legitimately belongs to Back Benchers. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman and his colleagues will ensure that it does not happen again.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris) raised the critical issue of Manchester airport. I know of the local bitterness over this issue. It is frustrating that, when local authorities have reached an agreement, as a result of doctrinaire pressures by local Conservative Members of Parliament the local authority which seconded the original proposal has about turned and is trying to frustrate the objectives of the people of the area.

We are even more cynical about the matter, having read the memo from a local Conservative Member of Parliament advising his colleagues not to pursue privatisation at this time because it might divert attention from the more important objective initially of separating management from the city. It is clear what the second objective would be. It is a clear case of doctrine having preference over local interest.

The hon. Member for Gedling (Sir P. Holland) pursued a subject which I know he has promoted over the years —the need to contract the number of quangos. He must feel rather bitter about the loss of momentum in that campaign when, at one stage, he appeared to have virtually succeeded in his aims. I find it poetic that the party that is committed to the ending of quangos should give the right to fluoridate to quangos scattered throughout the country, regardless of the wishes of the local people.

The hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Penhaligon) spoke of the problems of the tin industry in his area. I appreciate those problems, because, as he said, it is a saga that we experienced when I was the Minister of State, Department of Industry. I provided the finance that helped to save Wheal Jane at that time. I am sorry that the area is now going through the same torture of uncertainty. I hope that the Government will do everything possible to support and sustain that exceptionally important local industry. This industry is not just important in job terms, but is of symbolic and historical importance to the people of that area.

My hon. Friend the Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Kilroy-Silk) and the hon. Member for Corby (Mr. Powell) both spoke movingly and with conviction on the problems of unemployment. I can think of no hon. Member in the House who has campaigned more vigorously on behalf of his constituents over the years, under any Administration, than my hon. Friend the Member for Knowsley, North. I can imagine my hon. Friend's bitterness at seeing his area so deprived of hope.

The hon. Member for Corby referred to the locational advantages that the east of the country has over the west. That was a generous statement to make in view of the problems that his area has experienced. It underlines the Opposition's argument that there is a need for a strong regional policy. The Opposition bitterly regret the fact that regional aid has now been cut to 35 per cent. of the figure when the Government came to office.

I read the reaction of hon. Members as they listened to the speech of the hon. Member for Lewisham, East (Mr. Moynihan). All hon. Members were disturbed by the hon. Gentleman's speech, and it must be clearly understood that no one has a right to interfere with a Member of Parliament's correspondence. No one has a right to refuse a Member of Parliament in his duty to fulfil his obligations to his constituents. I hope that that point will be fully understood and appreciated by those who, for reasons which seem to them to be valid, interfere with the duties of an hon. Member. They should realise that that will inevitably lead to a clash with the House of Commons.

My hon. Friend the Member for Vauxhall (Mr. Holland) made a staggering exposition of detailed research. I congratulate him on that. At the end of his speech I concluded that there must be something wrong with the Charity Commission. As my hon. Friend said, there must be a proper inquiry.

The hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Thomas)—he has apologised for his absence—made a reasoned speech about a delicate situation in his constituency in Blaenau Ffestiniog. That area has been dominated for decades by the slate industry. A local employer is refusing to go to arbitration by ACAS, and one of the local directors refuses even to reply to the local Member of Parliament in writing or in person. That savours of stupidity as well as insensitivity. I know that area slightly, and the thought that the firm might recruit labour into the area to take over the jobs of local people is an unbelievably inflammatory thought and is absurd. I congratulate the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy on the delicate tone in which he presented his points.

I should like to make my own bid as to why the House should not adjourn for the Christmas recess on the proposed dates. We should not adjourn until the House has received an apology from the Liberals. Earlier this afternoon I brought to the House a document which detailed double standards in connection with the House. The document was a press release issued by the Leader of the Opposition—I am doing it again. Today would seem to be my day for errors. Of course I meant to say, "the leader of the opposition to everyone", the permanent antis, the Liberals. It is the leader of the Liberal party's document which contains the double standards.

Let us look at double standards and the Liberals. I have some extracts from the document which the Association of Liberal Councillors is sending to Liberal campaigners. It is entitled "Responding to the Competition".

Mr. Penhaligon: That document has been withdrawn.

Mr. Williams: The hon. Gentleman says that it has been withdrawn.

That document urges Liberal campaigners to "Appeal to people's prejudices"—hon. Members should note that they do not appeal to people's common sense or to people's sense of right and wrong, but to their prejudices—

"and encourage them to think (a) you are on their side, and (b) those attacking you are by implication attacking ordinary people as well."

The Liberals are not ordinary people. We all know that they are different from everybody else and hon. Members have permanent experience of that in this place.

The document continues:

"Make full use of your 'good guy' image".

At least the Liberals have the grace to recognise that they are pure image and front and very little substance. The document goes on to say:

"Find out where your opponents' supporters are: you may wish to feed them certain information to mislead your opponent."

That is what the Liberals call political integrity. It continues:

"It might be worth encouraging attacks especially if you are up against numerically superior opponents."

That means, "if, democratically, you are outvoted."

[Mr. Williams]

It continues:

"The British love an underdog, especially one who tearfully tells the press he was 'only trying to stand up for local interests' against a seemingly hostile . . . majority."

It sounds like a seminar in cynicism. That comes from the party that was lecturing us on observng the correct standards in public life. The document continues:

"Be more clever, perhaps by phoning the Tory/Labour agent to say how impressed you were with their production, offer to help deliver the next one, etc."

Where are the good guys? People can pick up a 'phone, lie, cheat and mislead, and it is all for a good, moral objective.

I have seen such cynicism in my constituency. My local Liberal candidate, presenting himself as a Life candidate, came to my surgery to raise an animals issue and told me that he thought experiments should be carried out on subnormal humans rather than on animals. He is now circulating leaflets, again presenting himself as the Life candidate, saying that everyone else is in favour of abortion, but overlooking the fact that the Bill for abortion reform owes its origin to the leader of the Liberal party, the right hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Mr. Steel). On Second Reading, 10 of the 11 Liberals voted in support of the Bill. That is the quality of life under the morality that the leader of the Liberal party would impose upon us. I should like to hear the views of the Leader of the House on that.

9.26 pm

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): I shall start by being remorseless and realistic: I stand entirely by my motion. The only thing that might be questioned is whether we are not staying here too late and coming back too early. Therefore, I say at once to all those who have impressed upon me that we should have a shorter recess than I have planned that I shall resist and, if there is a vote, I shall advise my hon. Friends to vote against them.

Hon. Members referred to the shortness of the debates following the passage of the Consolidated Fund Bill. That is not unprecedented. Of course it is not ideal, but it would have been more of a revolution if we had not had the statements on the rate support grant. We have to look at such matters and see whether we can order our affairs with a touch more brevity to protect the business for individual Members that lies ahead. No one can claim that my speech was too long.

I do not wish to be sidetracked by the extraordinary pamphlet prayed in aid to keep us here until Boxing day. It is a disagreeable combination of Machiavelli and Horatio Bottomley. There must be a better way than that of maintaining the moral and intellectual standards of our discussions.

Let me answer the points that were raised in the debate, which was opened by the right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris), who was a powerful advocate on behalf of his hon. Friends of the most important institution of the provinces, Manchester airport. I shall of course report what he said to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. I am sure that the right hon. Gentlman will appreciate that I cannot go beyond that at this juncture.

I say fraternally to the hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Penhaligon), in case he thinks that I am ambivalent about the Liberal party, that he and my hon. Friend the Member for St. Ives (Mr. Harris) have argued their case in measured, eloquent, restrained and therefore much more effective terms, saying what the tin industry means for Cornwall. As the hon. Member for Truro knows, there will be a debate upon that later this evening and clearly a ministerial statement would be appropriate on that occasion.

My hon. Friend the Member for Corby (Mr. Powell) and the hon. Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Kilroy-Silk) talked about unemployment, and both spoke with the passion that comes from direct constituency interests in these affairs. I was attracted by the argument of my hon. Friend the Member for Corby about the need to raise tax thresholds. It is a part of the debate that continues. Tax cuts are as often as not used merely as a headline to confuse rather than to clarify the nature of the debate. Most people do not think of raising the threshold which, in reality, is the most substantial tax cut and which has considerable potential economic consequences.

I come now to the speech of the hon. Member for Knowsley, North who has explained his absence. There is deep concern in all parts of the House about the continuing high unemployment. I do not wish to elevate the controversy except to say that I believe that there is emerging evidence that at least the phase of the relentless rise is over and we are getting some stability in the national figures. It is true, as we move into a happier phase, that it will be partial in its application across the country.

To follow the practice of the right hon. Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams), I couple the speeches of my hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, East (Mr. Moynihan) and the speech of the hon. Member for Vauxhall (Mr. Holland). I listened with deep concern to the points that were made by my hon. Friend, who has explained that he cannot be here for the end of the debate because he has gone to his constituency to deal specifically with this issue.

I do not know what possible distinction can be drawn between the work of an MP in his constituency and the work of an MP in the House of Commons. The work of an MP within the House of Commons is something we are concerned to protect. In all parts of the House — I welcome the remarks made by the right hon. Member for Swansea, West—there is concern that this matter should be resolved in a way consistent with the responsibilities of Members and their ability to discharge responsibilities without let or hindrance.

The hon. Member for Vauxhall elaborated a breathtaking state of affairs. I used to live in Vauxhall, and indeed the streets he mentioned were all familiar, but I had no idea that I was living so close to this extraordinary development. In my innocence, I used to pass by the Duchy of Cornwall property — which was absolutely blameless. I take his claim that there should be interest shown on the part of the Home Office and the Solicitor-General, and I shall ensure that his remarks are reported to my right hon. Friends.

The hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Thomas), like the hon. Member for Truro, raised, with great charm, a most difficult constituency case. All those who know north Wales understand and feel for a region that has its roots, history, culture and economy related to the slate industry. Those who have seen the decline of that industry over the decades would be immensely saddened if it were further debilitated by industrial action, which would proceed to some gloomy and inexorable consequence.

The hon. Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Mr. Craigen) drew attention to the inherent difficulties of the closure of an 18-bed ward at Ruchill hospital. I shall certainly pass on to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland the anxieties that have been expressed.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Basildon (Mr. Amess) on raising the question of hospital radio broadcasting. It was a happy circumstance that no Government involvement seemed to be implied and no public expenditure involved. I wish my hon. Friend many more crusades of a similar nature.

The hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) raised the question of defence procurement and the three submarines. My information from the Ministry of Defence is that it hopes that an announcement will be made shortly. I am aware of the deep and proper constituency concern entertained by the hon. Gentleman, and I shall do my utmost to see that he is correspondingly informed.

My hon. Friend the Member for Gedling (Sir P. Holland) reminded us that he has lost none of his skill, passion and advocacy in regard to quasi-autonomous non-governmental organisations. I shall report this rather daunting news to my colleagues. It means that they will have to be that much more alert as 1986 proceeds.

My hon. Friend the Member for Gosport (Mr. Viggers) most effectively used an example from his constituency to demonstrate a great many of the problems which relate to parents and their children, given the contrasting and often overlapping responsibilities of public authorities, and the need for the House to turn its attention to that in as much an administrative fashion as any other and to realise that this is a tangible way in which we can confer support on the family as the natural social unit.

My hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels) did a great tour d'horizon. I note his continued interest for a central computer to trace absent children. I also note his tempered involvement in public expenditure restraint when it comes to motorway lighting. I believe that £80 million was put into the kitty, which is not bad for a few minutes in the closing stages of this debate. He nevertheless made an extremely effective case because there are offsetting considerations. I wish him every success, without necessarily endorsing his campaign on drinking and driving.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Why not?

Mr. Biffen: Many others have campaigned. The hon. Gentleman must not get so excited. We are in the closing minutes of Christmas spirit. I am saying that from the great Plimsoll in the last century, who did a great deal for marine safety, hon. Members have campaigned on these issues. "Keep going" is my message.

My hon. Friend the Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Mr. Murphy) told me that he favours a poll tax, that he does not favour the rate support grant as it applies to Hertfordshire, that he is unhappy about the Government's Sunday shopping legislation and that he has views on the Anglo-Irish accord which are roughly in line with those of the Unionist parties. I shall convey all of those sentiments to my right hon. Friend the Patronage Secretary.

I come finally to the debate that we would all love to have about Government defence policy, nuclear policy and, above all, the delightful way—I accept his candour and sincerity—in which the hon. Member for Leyton (Mr. Cohen) says that we must disavow our reliance on nuclear weapons. Does that mean that we have to disavow any alliance which relies on nuclear weapons? [HON. MEMBERS: "No."] Oh, I see. We disavow nuclear weapons ourselves. I do not think that the Liberal party should laugh too soon because we shall examine such issues more and more as 1986 proceeds. It is no good believing that we can approach the matter on the basis of the bun and the penny. It is one or the other. Either we are involved with a reliance on nuclear weapons or we are not. To suppose that we can wash our hands but depend on the Americans is the most unseemly stance of all.

I realise that all that now stands before the next debate in which the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) will raise the problems of driver psychology associated with alternative crossing modes of the Channel. The hon. Member gave us Aldabra, Belgrano and the West Lothian question. It looks as though this evening we shall see another great parliamentary saga opening up—and what a glorious way to end this part of the Session.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House at its rising on Friday 20th December do adjourn until Monday 13th January, and that the House shall not adjourn on Friday 20th December until Mr. Speaker shall have reported the Royal Assent to any Acts which have been agreed upon by both Houses.

Orders of the Day

CONSOLIDATED FUND BILL

Order for Second Reading read.

Question, That the Bill be now read a Second time, put forthwith pursuant to Standing order No. 113 (Consolidated Fund Bills), and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read a Second time.

Question, That the Bill be now read the Third time, put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed.

Channel Fixed Link

9.39 pm

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Maude.]

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): This is a saga, because one of the prime duties of politicians is to warn their colleagues of all parties and their fellow countrymen about all-too-likely future fiascos and catastrophes.

I am no regular Jeremiah, but I foresee mid-channel mayhem in the mid-1990s, and 10-mile tailbacks in both directions under the Channel. Fanciful? If it can happen on the M6 and M25, why should it not occur under the Channel? I am using my luck in the Consolidated Fund draw, either to establish my fears about the Channel road link, or to have them refuted. I do not blame the Minister for not answering the questions about driver psychology that I asked in Monday's debate, which are reported in the Official Report c. 703, because I made a three-minute speech at the tag end of the discussion. Nevertheless, they remain unanswered.

In this era of "Members' interests," I had better say that I have the good fortune to be sponsored by the National Union of Railwaymen. But, as George Walkinshaw, Jimmy Knapp and Keith Hill will bear out, I initiated the discussion on this subject of driver psychology a month ago at the political committee of the NUR. Although the union has been extremely kind to my constituency Labour party, I am not a creature of the union

On purpose, I have never knowingly talked to, or had a meal from any commercial lobbyist or organisation involved in the Channel link.

The genesis of the debate was when, some years ago, I was stuck in the Dartford tunnel in a jam with my wife feeling increasingly sick from the fumes, and two whimpering small children in the back of the car. That is not an uncommon experience in the relatively short British tunnels.

The issue tonight is whether travellers who wish to accompany their vehicles across the Channel should be allowed to drive them, or whether they should be carried across with the vehicles by train. I am worried about highway hypnosis, and I had better define it carefully. It is "the rigid cognitive set developing and creating a subjective notion of unchanging visual surroundings."

Highway hypnosis is associated with mental relaxation and lowered alertness. Bluntly, a great deal has been said even about the flora and fauna of Kent but not much about the psychology of humankind. Motorway madness has not had the consideration for the dimension of the Channel tunnel saga that it should have had. The serious work that has been done should make even the friends of the M6 a little uncomfortable.

G. W. Williams in his 1983 paper on highway hypnosis suggests that the monotony of the surroundings and the necessity to attend only to a small part of the visual field may induce some kind of hypnotic trance. The Department may have carried out serious work, but Mick Hamer of New Scientist has outlined all the cuts that have been made in the Transport and Road Research Laboratory, and the work that I have seen leads to the conclusion that a road link is flawed.

I have received a letter from the excellent scientific librarian of the Library, Dr. John Poole, who has served many Members well. I asked him to establish what the TRRL was doing, and he replied: "I duly rang up a psychologist at TRRL, who rang me to say that he was not at liberty to tell me anything about the R and D programme. He referred me to an assistant secretary of the DoT." Why cannot the TRRL have frank relations with the Library? For time's sake—I think of those who will be present at 9 o'clock tomorrow morning—I refer the Minister to the article in New Scientist of 5 September 1985, which shows how the TRRL has been affected by cuts. What work is the laboratory doing on the psychology of driving through the tunnel?

It is not that I have a bee in my bonnet. I have permission from the first five parliamentary colleagues whom I approached, to read what they told me. My hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Barnett) states:

"I find even going through the Blackwall Tunnel a worrying experience. Certainly I feel a sense of relief to come out the other side."

That is after the long distance between Greenwich and Tower Hamlets. My hon. Friend the Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke) states:

"I find the short distance involved in driving through the Clyde tunnel to be oppressive; I hesitate to think what the cross-channel link will be like."

My hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Heffer) states:

"I am always reluctant to go through the Mersey Tunnel; I would find the Channel Tunnel impossible."

My hon. Friend the Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) states:

"I drive about 25,000 miles every year, and I do not suffer from claustrophia. But nothing would induce me to endure the tension of driving through a tunnel for half an hour."

My right hon. Friend the Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Rees), a former Home Secretary, states:

"It is one thing to sit in a train through a long tunnel—even if it requires a certain effort. It is another to drive a car through a long tunnel with that light at the end a long way off. It will be a long time before I drive from Calais to Dover and when I do I hope there is room to pass by easily those who have given it up as a bad job."

My hon. Friend the noble Lord Carmichael of Kelvingrove, formerly responsible for transport, said:

"The second reservation is perhaps more substantial, and it has been mentioned by many noble Lords here. It concerns the question of driving through a 30-mile tunnel. I am always amused when I see the rather over-enthusiastic artists' impression of such things as these tunnels. You always see the lone motor-car, the Fiesta, the Metro or the Novo driving through a beautiful, clean well painted bright tunnel. You never see Aunt Agatha"—[Official Report, House of Lords, 13 December 1985; Vol. 469, c. 515.]—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I hope that the hon. Gentleman is not quoting from the Lords Hansard.

Mr. Dalyell: I must confess that I was, but I know that I should not.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): How does my hon. Friend respond to the experience of those who travel between France and Italy, who regularly pass through the 20-kilometre Mont Blanc tunnel but have no difficulties?

Mr. Dalyell: Ten miles, but I shall come to that later.

Mr. Donald Dewar (Glasgow, Garscadden): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Dalyell: No.

[Mr. Dalyell]

Those were the collected views of people in the prime of life. What about our weaker, less experienced brethren, or sisters too, for that matter?

Some of my constituents say that they will drive from Edinburgh to Paris. Bluntly—I do not know whether this is a parliamentary word—they will be knackered by the time that they reach the entrance to the Tunnel. Most of my constituents are sensible people, but even in Linlithgow there is the occasional nut behind the wheel. That proves the case, because it needs only one nut to create motorway havoc.

Consider driving from Paris after that last good meal. The whole scenario of returning from a continental holiday has the ingredients of tragedy. Motor magazine of 28 September 1985 states:

"It's the last weekend in July 1992, and you're driving at 70 mph in bumper-to-bumber traffic in a tunnel 120 ft below the sea bed, halfway between Dover and Calais. Suddenly a 12-year-old Cortina seizes up in front of you and, as you stand on the brakes, you hear the screech of a dozen massive tyres behind you as a fully-laden juggernaut skids towards your rear bumper."

The longest tunnel in Europe, for the information of my hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours), is the Gotthard, which is 10·1 miles long. First-time motorists have difficulty envisaging the experience of travelling through it. Would any of us drive through a tunnel at 60 mph? Most of us would not go at more than 40 mph. What about overtaking, and what happens when the lighting goes wrong? What happens when cars run out of petrol? Some of us have suffered the indignity of running out of petrol when the gauges in our cars were defective. It happens to the best of us. What about the weekend drivers, just popping across to the Continent?

In the experience of the Simplon and of Japan, we have nothing like this. No one has driven through a 30-mile tunnel. I should tell my hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) that the Channel expressway would be four and a half times longer than the Gotthard tunnel.

The subject has been studied by many psychologists. A paper published by Wertheim explains highway hypnosis, based on a theory validated in experimental research. Wertheim acknowledges that the explanation of Williams and others is difficult to verify, not least because the concept of monotony is not easily measured in such a way as to enable scientific experimentation. However, he argues that it is not monotony but predictability of the road situation that is crucial to the explanation of highway hypnosis.

The main points in the theory are as follows. Some of our mental abilities are related to the activity of our oculomotor system—the neurological system responsible for the initiation of eye movements. Car driving is a task where specific eye movements are required to follow predictable movements in the visual environment—other traffic vehicles as well as changes in the road. The more predictable those movements and changes, the more oculomotor control becomes intentive at the expense of the attentive component. As a result, drivers disregard most of the information present in the external visual field because of its irrelevance to driving performance. Thus, oculomotor control may become dependent on information derived from the perception of very few visual signals. In addition, those signals may become highly predictable in their movement pattern, especially during prolonged driving on long unchanging stretches of highway or during prolonged single file driving. That is what we are talking about in relation to the Channel. The Minister will contradict me if I am wrong about that.

The conditions thought to cause highway hypnosis would appear to prevail in the tunnel schemes; the visual images presented to a driver going across the bridge or through the tunnel seem especially prone to the predictability of the road situation examined by Wertheim. If it is, effects of such conditions on drivers should be understood in much greater detail during the design stages of the tunnel schemes. Symptoms affecting only a few drivers could have significant dangers for the functioning of the tunnel. Even 1 per cent. of drivers could create a dramatic incident in mid-Channel. It would need only a few fools, a few inexperienced drivers or a few panicking drivers to create such trouble.

Fatigue is not necessarily related to highway hypnosis but, according to the man who has done the work—Wertheim—it may sometimes have a facilitatory effect on its development. In general, there is likely to be recognition by motorists that there is danger in driving where certain circumstances may induce boredom, lack of attention or drowsiness.

Psychologists at the Institute for Science of Labour in Kawasaki, Japan, undertook a study of fatigue of bullet train drivers operating on multi-tunnelled sections. They recorded changes in the cab environment, heart rate, ear lobe, blood pressure, eye movement, flicker fusion frequency, responses to secondarily given visual signals and subjective fatigue. They concluded that continuous driving through tunnels "significantly hampers vigilance" and requires "countermeasures against monotonous driving situations."

The generally monotonic driving situations through tunnels caused gradual decrease in heart rate and low flicker fusion frequency. The subjective fatigues scores "increased remarkably during the journey."

Although driving such trains may not be strictly comparable with driving vehicles in well-lit tunnels, it is further medical research evidence that moving through a tunnel over long distances may have effects on driver vigilance that are not sufficiently understood.

I do not wish to boast about it, but I studied psychology for a year at Edinburgh university, and I know enough to say that this is a serious argument.

There is a serious risk of accidents in road tunnel schemes. The consequences of simple errors in driving in tunnels are illustrated in the case of the Caldecott tunnel. This extract from the official investigation serves to illustrate the possible dangers of road accidents in tunnels. This is from the official documents from California. They say:

"At about 12.12 am on April 7, 1982, several vehicles on a westbound California State Route 24 entered the north, No. 3 Bore of the Caldecott Tunnel near Oakland, California. A Honda car driven by an intoxicated driver struck the raised kerbs inside the tunnel and came to rest at the left edge of the roadway about a third of the way through the tunnel. It was struck soon afterwards by a following gasoline tank truck and tank trailer and then by an AC Transit bus which subsequently struck the tank trailer. The bus driver was ejected, and the empty bus continued west, exited the tunnel, and struck a concrete road support pier. The tank trailer overturned, and gasoline was spilled inside the tunnel. A fire erupted and heavy black smoke quickly filled the tunnel. The tank truck and tank trailer, the Honda car, and four other vehicles that had entered the tunnel were completely destroyed by the fire. Seven persons were killed and two people were treated for minor smoke inhalation. The tunnel incurred major damage."

What happens should that happen mid-Channel? The National Transportation Safety Board determined that the probable cause of this accident——

Mr. Peter Snape (West Bromwich, East): It might well happen here.

Mr. Dalyell: Of course it might.

The board said that the probable cause of the accident was a combination of events involving first the erratic driving by the intoxicated driver of a passenger vehicle which stopped in a through-traffic lane, creating a traffic obstacle. It is perfectly possible for somebody who enters the tunnel from France or England to be intoxicated—there are no checks on that. A second factor in the accident was the inattention of the truck driver in causing his vehicle to strke the passenger vehicle. Many of the main lobbyists for a tunnel are the big truck-driving firms, whose drivers have to wait for the boats.

A third factor was the bus driver overtaking the truck too rapidly to avoid striking the passenger vehicle when it unexpectedly appeared in the path of his bus. There we return to the point made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Morley and Leeds, South.

Contributing to the cause and the severity of the accident was the presence of a flammable cargo tank truck and cargo tank trailer in the tunnel and the damage to the overturned trailer, which permitted a loss of flammable cargo and a fire. How does one control a fire in a confined space of parked vehicles? That question is at least worth answering.

Also contributing to the severity of the accident and injuries were the lack of adequate monitoring capabilities and the variable message signs or traffic signals at the entrance of the tunnel and within the tunnel, and the lack of a communications system betwen the tunnel personnel and the tunnel occupants, which if present, might have facilitated occupant evacuation.

Related to this is the proposition of driving over long bridges. I represent the area at the south end of the Forth brige. The vehicles have to go over, in moderate and high winds, two by two like the animals into Noah's ark, because, rightly, of police regulations. The winds in the Forth are nothing like those that blow up the Channel. Once again, problems are caused.

I refer to one letter of many that I have had, from Mr. G. D. Austin of 28 Alexandra road, Peterborough:

"Dear Tam Dalyell,

I noted your little piece in the newspaper about driving twenty five miles through a proposed Channel Tunnel, yes the Dartford tunnel is bad enough, we have to pass through the Dartford Tunnel when visiting my son in Canterbury, and I note when looking into the driving mirror that my wife always covers her eyes when going through this tunnel (she always prefers to sit in the back).

Now! on our last trip through the Dartford Tunnel in the late summer, the atmosphere was like a blue mist, being an ex-fireman I quickly realised the risk with what of course were petrol exhaust fumes, we were at the point of no return, so I at once instructed my wife and son, to close all windows tight, and to shut all ventilators in the car, even so the smell of exhaust fumes was terrific, and it was with a sigh of relief that we emerged at the Cambridge end."

If people cannot cope with the Dartford tunnel, how the heck does one know that they can cope with a Channel tunnel? Having skilled and experienced railway engine drivers — trained professionally — is one thing. Letting loose Uncle Tom Cobbleigh and all behind the wheel of a motor car is another.

We have to look at the effects of stress. The research by Dr. Ivor Brown and Dr. Roger Watt has shown that a large proportion of professional drivers flout the European Community regulations on hours of work. Many heavy goods vehicle and public service vehicle drivers are therefore suffering from the effects of driving fatigue, sleep loss and sleep disturbance. Many tourists are also fatigued from over-long periods at the wheel between home and their holiday destination. An enforced speed limit and the tedium of convoy driving may therefore depress to dangerously low levels the alertness of many commercial and private motorists using the tunnel, particularly from the southerly direction.

It is possible that the unusual conditions of tunnel driving will be sufficiently stimulating as largely to offset the effects of fatigue and sleep loss, at least initially. Thus, the effects of these forms of stress are likely to appear later in the journey through the tunnel, if they occur at all. Serious consideration must be given to the alleviation of these effects, if mid-tunnel multiple collisions are to be avoided. It is the multiple collisions, mid-tunnel, that concern many of us.

The two main effects to be guarded against are so-called "micro-sleep" and distraction. Micro-sleep, as the name implies, is a condition in which the driver actually loses consciousness for very brief periods. The experience is quite common. In a study of some 2,000 motorway and A-road accidents among truck and bus drivers, it was found that around 10 per cent. were preoccupied or distracted and that about 5 per cent. were actually asleep, just prior to the collision. Distraction occurs because fatigue causes the composite skill of driving to disintegrate. Thus, attention is given to events which may be of only peripheral interest for driving, and important sources of information are ignored.

Remedial measures against fatigue can therefore take two forms. The first is the establishment of advisory or mandatory, headways which are greater than the normally safe two seconds. This allows more time for recovery, even in the event of micro-sleep, but clearly it is not an infallible remedy. People are usually very good at detecting closure with an obstacle ahead. This ability could be aided by requiring the use of lights by all vehicles in the tunnel, but again this will be an ineffective measure if drivers are distracted. Are we to say that drivers will never be distracted? The introduction of special "arousing" stimuli to maintain the driver's level of alertness at an appropriately high level should be seriously considered.

Arousing stimuli can be visual or auditory. The former can take the form of verbal messages, light signals or markings on the road surface or tunnel walls. The latter can take the form of music, speech or warning tones. If one has to go to the length of introducing music or warning tones, one cannot be certain that there will never be major accidents. I repeat that, if this can happen on the M6, resulting in the kind of tragedy that has been reported to the House, how can one say that it will never happen on the Channel tunnel motorway? Repetitive stimuli produce a condition termed "reactive inhibition" in which the person ceases to respond appropriately to external stimuli. Any alerting system for drivers therefore needs to present continually changing sensations if it is to remain effective.

[Mr. Dalyell]

The auditory channel is more effective than the visual for alerting drivers, since it does not require the conscious direction of attention. However, specific applied studies would be required in order to establish the feasibility of auditory alerting devices, since ambient noise levels in the tunnel are likely to be high and warnings must not be pitched so high above them that they produce startle responses.

If auditory alerting techniques are adopted, advantage should be taken of the research on auditory warnings conducted at the MRC's applied psychology unit. The aim of this research has been to develop a technique by which the spectral characteristics of signal and background noise are specified so as to maximise the warning effect at minimal sound pressure levels in the signal.

Many users of the tunnel, at least in the summer, will be families. Young children will perhaps find the experience unpleasant and could then become an extra distraction for the driver. There is considerable scope for providing entertainment for young children. A painting of a different "Mr. Men" character at frequent intervals could help the time to pass quickly for them. In a similar vein, weather reports and pictures of tourist landmarks could be useful for passengers who are not quite so young. Clearly these should not be eye-catching to the driver, and high pressure advertising would be undesirable.

It is strongly recommended, say the psychologists, that some form of visual or auditory alerting system should be incorporated in the tunnel design to offset any difficulties which may result from driving fatigue or the tedium of tunnel driving. Research is required on the specific form that this signal should take.

If one goes to that extent to try to provide safety, how can any of us think that safety can be so certain as to ensure that there is not the nightmare of accidents which could lead to catastrophe?

What about the mixture of right-hand and left-hand drive vehicles in two-lane, one-way tunnels? What about the change at the French end? It is one matter to drive on the other side of the road after a two-hour boat journey, but if there are no boats and no bateaux and people suddenly have to change over, what difficulties will that create? We must remember that reflex actions are involved, especially when overtaking. Such details must be discussed now rather than later.

We could be the biggest Charlies of the 20th century. Let us imagine, week in and week out, sub-Channel pile-ups. It would be like the road between Cockbridge and Tomintoul. That is just about as reliable as the road from Banchory to Fettercairn in mid-winter. To imagine that we can have a successful road under the Channel is ill-conceived to a hazardous extent.

What work did the Department do before presenting a fait accompli? The trouble is that civil servants did not give evidence for the rail-only solution to the Select Committee because they did not think that Ministers would wear it. Civil servants should present to the Select Committee all the options, if there is a convincing answer to the problems that I have raised, either now or by letter in the new year, which should be made public to my colleagues. I would accept that publicly and privately. If a convincing answer——

Mr. Snape: Has my hon. Friend considered the role of civil servants, because like Ministers they are hostile to a rail link as they are hostile to railways anywhere else in the country?

Mr. Dalyell: I have a high regard for the Civil Service. I have been listening this afternoon to the Select Committee chaired by my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) which was examining Clive Ponting. Civil servants have difficulties, but I agree with my hon. Friend's substantial point. The Civil Service should be able to speak frankly and fearlessly, without ministerial pressure. However, I am upset that the TRRL apparently is not to be able to make its views known. I should like to have the candid view of those experts about the points that I have raised.

If Ministers at the Department of Transport cannot produce convincing answers, officials and Ministers will, I fear, find me as persistent, as difficult and as time-consuming as do their colleagues in the Ministry of Defence.

10.9 pm

Sir John Osborn (Sheffield, Hallam): Last week, on 9 December, I declared my interest in that debate because I am joint chairman of the all-party Channel tunnel group. The hon. Member for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Snape) is the other chairman. We have tried objectively to examine the options which the Government are considering. As I explained then, the group goes back about 50 years, and I have been associated with it for 25 years.

At a conference and exhibition in Lille last Monday, the French, because of this event's association with Trans Manche, insisted upon introducing me as the president of the British fixed link committee. I shall try to be objective, although the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) has confessed his interest in and sympathy for the National Union of Railwaymen. In a humorous and delightful way he described the horrors of driving through tunnels.

They are also the anxieties of a motorist, whether he is stuck on the boulevard peripherique or the latest innovation of that—judging by the comments of some motorists who live near it — the M25. It must be accepted that statistically motorways are safer than other roads, though when an accident does occur it can be horrific, as many know to their cost.

I have previously said—I shall illustrate the reason for holding this view—that I like the idea of driving through a Channel tunnel. However, the point that the hon. Member for Linlithgow raised needs close consideration, for it is necessary to bear in mind the psychological reaction of drivers in a tunnel 27 miles long. Frankly, I do not know what that reaction is likely to be.

When the House debated this issue recently, the Parliamentary Under-Secretary pointed out that that and other matters were being examined by the Transport and Road Research Laboratory, an organisation for which, I am sure, the hon. Member for Linlithgow has as much respect as I have, but is it possible to simulate the reaction of a driver in a tunnel for 30 minutes when at present no such tunnel exists? Is it possible to gauge that, whatever equipment is devised? I am not criticising the transport laboratory.

I, too, have made inquiries, being an enthusiastic motorist. You will know, Mr. Speaker, that the House of Commons Motor Club, in which you have taken a close interest, is a body of which I have been chairman. By chance, that club visited the Institute of Advanced Motorists' centre at Chiswick today. The institute's theme is "Safe driving", and I have been president of the Sheffield branch for 25 years. I wanted to obtain the reaction of that institute, but I was not able to get a considered reply about whether it was safe to contemplate driving through 27 miles of tunnel. Thus, the motoring organisations are not united on whether the projects that have been put forward have been well worked out.

I have examined again the excellent report of the Select Committee. That Committee doubted the validity of the traffic forecasts and pointed out that they were not required by the Government to be submitted in the same format and to be based on common assumptions. The Committee added:

"It is consequently very difficult for the Committee to make detailed comparisons between the schemes."

I should have liked those detailed comparisons to enable me properly to discuss this issue, but I could not obtain them.

Those advancing the Channel expressway put the case over in Lille extremely well. They have their own views on the number of air travellers that the expressway will attract. They believe that passengers and cars with drivers will number 2·4 million in 1991, that there will be just over 1 million lorries, and that rail and foot passengers will number 4·4 million. I should like to compare those with other forecasts, and I hope that the Minister will give some statistics of traffic forecasts.

The promoters of the expressway said:

"All types of internal combustion engine vehicles can drive through at 100 km/hr (62·5 mph) taking 30 minutes to do so."

I was interested to read in one of their documents in respect of safety and the problems of fatigue or becoming mesmerised through driving for 30 minutes along a straight tunnel:

"There is not a shred of evidence to support the allegations of driver fatigue or uncontrolled operation of motor vehicles in excess of that incurred on motorways by virtue of driving through a 50 km properly designed tunnel . . . All modern devices which have been found useful for keeping the driver alert for open road and tunnel driving have been incorporated into the Channel Expressway, such as strong lighting, signalling, roadway surface variations, painting and closed circuit radio systems."

That was described in their video. I hope that the assessors will question whether that has been gone into in adequate detail.

Sir John Wells (Maidstone): Is it not true that the expressway scheme has been vetted by some eminent medical people? Naturally we want to have a governmental medical view, but I believe that the expressway promoters have gone to a lot of trouble on the medical point.

Sir John Osborn: Yes, and their report refers to that. The assessors must question that medical evidence, and I would wish to see that. Of course the adequacy of the ventilation must be questioned.

Euroroute has a slightly different idea of speeds—100 kph on bridges, 80 kph in tunnels and 50 kph on the islands—the spiralling projects. Euroroute states that it will install sophisticated traffic management and control systems using closed circuit television cameras, excellent lighting throughout the link, frequent patrols and 24-hour assistance teams to provide fast response. That is all nicely put down in the document, but how will it work in practice?

Will the spirals be safe? Will traffic be able to move without problems, without skidding or braking? The report says that the maximum gradient of 3·5 per cent. is half that on the Hyde Park underpass, and it points out that the radius of the helix is considerable, making the diameter rather larger then Trafalgar square. However, on a long journey, four of five circles, particularly for a heavy goods vehicle driver, could be a little detrimental. It says that two independent driver psychologists have reviewed the road link and reported that driving conditions on the bridge and tunnel sections will be as good if not better than on existing roads.

The hon. Member for Linlithgow makes me want my hon. Friend the Minister to look at the matter. Obviously I have looked at the traffic density put forward by the Channel tunnel group. It is definitely using a shuttle—a railway carriage in the old definition; one able to carry heavy vehicles, another with two tiers to carry cars. It points out that passengers will suffer less stress; that there will be none of the disorientation that could arise from driving through a long distance tunnel. There will be immunity from road traffic delays, traffic accidents and the vagaries of the weather. It also points out that accident rates on straight rail lines with no interconnecting rail line compare favourably with the accident rate on motorways.

I come back to my own experience. I have said previously that there was a debate on the bridge versus the tunnel in the early 1970s, at the Institute of Civil Engineers. The hon. Member for Linlithgow might have been there, through the parliamentary and scientific committee. A paper was given by General Sverdrop, who had just built the tunnel embankment bridge complex across Chesapeake Bay. I described how in 1972 I went across Transpo' 72 in Washington and met General Sverdrop. He arranged for me to visit that complex. I think that I crossed 22 miles in 17 minutes. I am not sure of my facts, because I might have been travelling above the American speed limit. I might have had a slightly fast driver. I liked that. However, the first year of work on Chesapeake Bay had a setback because a ship rammed into the bridge and it took several months to repair it, with a consequential loss of tolls.

Another experience was more than 30 years ago, when I drove from Milan to Zurich over the Lukmanier pass, which is next to the St. Gotthard pass. It was a tiring, all-day journey. I set off in the morning and arrived at around 8 pm or 9 pm, rather late for a business dinner. This summer I drove through the St. Gotthard tunnel—unaware that there was a tunnel, let alone that it was 17 km or about 10 miles long. I understand that it is planned to have two tunnels, but at the moment there is one tunnel with two-way traffic. There are notices telling cars and lorries to keep their distance and I had no problem in driving through that tunnel with the other vehicles, even in two-way traffic, although it was a novel and unexpected experience. I understand, however, that one or two drivers who have deliberately driven through the tunnel three times in quick succession to achieve the distance have found the 50 km drive far more exhausting.

Mr. Dalyell: The hon. Gentleman is a good driver.

Sir John Osborn: I like to think so, and I aim to be so. I am grateful for the hon. Gentleman's kind words.

Mr. Greg Knight (Derby, North): In the light of my hon. Friend's remarks and of the earlier comments, is not the answer to have a road and rail link both going through the tunnel so that the driver has a choice? If a driver feels tired, he can use the rail link and have his car transported, but if, like my hon. Friend, he regards it as a novel experience, he can choose to drive.

Sir John Osborn: My hon. Friend tempts me to embark on a full discussion of the wider options.

My hon. Friend organised an excellent meeting at the Institute of Advanced Motorists, which now has about 85,000 members out of perhaps 25 million drivers. A further 260,000 or so have taken the institute's test, so there might be 500,000 drivers in this country who can claim to be able to concentrate and to cope with any situation. I have no doubt that they could drive through a tunnel of the proposed length, but whether the entire 25 million would be capable of doing so is a matter of doubt.

The hon. Member for Linlithgow referred to a fire in a tunnel in the United States. Matters of that kind must constantly be borne in mind. I ask my hon. Friend the Minister, however, to inquire what problems the Italians, the Austrians or the Swiss have had with the Mont Blanc tunnel or with the St. Gotthard, which is currently the longest in the world. I believe that when drivers, especially heavy vehicle drivers, become used to driving through tunnels they temper their manner and drive more soberly, just as British drivers are now better adjusted to motorway driving than they were when motorways were introduced 20 years ago.

The hon. Member for Linlithgow has convinced me by raising the subject today and by his comments that the concept put forward by the Government in 1974 and by the Channel tunnel group now has much to commend it. My hon. Friend the Member for Derby, North (Mr. Knight) has drawn me slightly on this. I should like him to consider the possibility of a shuttle as the first move. This would accommodate drivers who did not wish to drive through the tunnel. Certain categories of heavy vehicle which should not be allowed to go through the tunnel could be diverted to ferries or go on a shuttle if there is subsequently a road tunnel as an additional option. In my view, certain types of goods—for instance, dangerous chemicals and highly inflammable materials—should not go into the tunnel at all, but should always be carried by ferry.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Derby, North will agree that I am concerned about these issues. I am concerned that the two Governments should make the right decision, and also that that decision should not eliminate the use of ferries when the first tunnel is built. I have been drawn a little further than the question of safety, but I look forward to the Minister's reply.

10.25 pm

Mr. Peter Snape (West Bromwich, East): The House will be grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) for raising this subject and for the way in which he expressed his point of view.

In a way it is ironic that we should need such a debate, because one would have thought that a Government who were so obviously committed to some sort of fixed link —as the present Government appear to be—would have undertaken some research into the effects of driving long distances in a straight line. I hope that in his reply the Minister will address himself to the questions put by my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow and also to some of the points that were understandably and relevantly raised by the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Sir J. Osborn), who is co-chairman of the all-party Channel Tunnel Group.

I have not had the same number of years in that position as has the hon. Gentleman, but he will be aware, as other hon. Members are, that I have been in favour of a rail Channel tunnel for some years. I hope that that will not affect what I shall say tonight.

Sir John Osborn: Perhaps I should point out that my hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone (Sir J. Wells) was chairman for many years. Along with the hon. Gentleman, I have been co-chairman for only 18 months. I would not like him to give the impression that I have been chairman for 25 years.

Mr. Snape: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. I should have said that in one way or another he has been connected with this project for considerably longer than I have.

The fact that we are having this debate demonstrates the enormous power of the road lobby, which insists that Governments of both political hues should cravenly accept that, whatever improvement is needed to our transport infrastructure, the road lobby must be catered for first and foremost. It continues to demand enormous public expenditure on such improvements on the ground that the lorry and private car should be allowed to go anywhere the driver wishes to go.

Mr. Greg Knight: What about the rail lobby?

Mr. Snape: If the hon. Gentleman has something to say, he should get to his feet in the normal way.

Mr. Knight: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. The points he is making could just as easily be applied to the rail lobby.

Mr. Snape: That might well be so, but, given transport history over the last 25 years, it is clear that the road lobby has been far more successful. Given the way in which the hon. Gentleman has put his view, it looks as if even he has succumbed to the argument that the private motorist and the heavy goods vehicle driver should be allowed to go wherever he or she likes and that it is the job of the Department of Transport to provide the infrastructure to allow them to do just that.

I make no apology for disagreeing with that view. I am well aware that many of the proponents of the fixed link have referred to public opinion polls which have shown that people would prefer to drive all the way across the Channel. There is nothing surprising about that. Ask average motorists whether they would prefer to go to the moon in a spaceship or to fly themselves, and a substantial proportion would say that they preferred to fly themselves rather than rely on someone else. I must therefore discount that sort of evidence.

The tragedy is that, if the Channel tunnel had been built when the idea was first mooted, it would have been a rail-only tunnel. I do not normally praise the foresight of Victorian business men, but I believe that Sir Edward Watkin, the chairman of the London and South-East Railway, was right when he said all those years ago that a channel fixed link—he did not say rail-only, but it was presumed that it would be—was sensible. In talking of through trains from Waterloo to Paris and other continental cities, he was speaking with a great deal of foresight.

These days it is different. The fact that there is a demand for the type of options that the hon. Member for Derby, North (Mr. Knight) mentioned owes much to the strength of the road lobby. The lobby seems to forget that a torrent of cars and lorries will cause immense environmental problems in south England and north France. They will cause immense traffic and pollution problems in the tunnel.

Most hon. Members spend a considerable time behind the wheel of their cars. Some might say that they prefer to travel by some alternative means, as I do. I would prefer to go to my constituency—or at least as close as I can get to it—by rail, but it is often necessary for me to use my car. Those of us who travel a considerable number of miles are aware of the stupid behaviour of the minority of motorists, which can be seen most days, especially on the motorways but also on any trunk road or road in an urban area. Most people would be prepared to concede that an accident in a 21-mile or longer tunnel would have a greater effect than a similar accident on a motorway. Of course, our motorways are safer than most other roads, but, by the nature of the speed and type of traffic on motorways, an accident on a motorway is normally more serious than an accident on a minor road. I think that anyone who is prepared to be fair would concede that it is a matter of time before a major accident takes place under the English channel, if there is a fixed link that provides an opportunity for the two modes of transport—road and rail—to be used.

I do not want to be accused of painting an unduly lurid picture of what might happen. My hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow showed the picture humorously and dispassionately in talking about accidents in tunnels in other parts of the world. I do not think that any of us would like to be in our cars if carnage of the sort that happened on the M6 a few weeks ago were to take place within the confines of a tunnel. I imagine that the tragic and appalling loss of life that occurred on the M6 would be multiplied considerably if there were a similar incident in a tunnel stretching across the Channel.

My hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow talked understandably about the problems of exhaust fumes and the ventilation of a Channel tunnel. I am aware that some of the bidders have said that with the technological developments of recent years it will not be too great a problem to extract exhaust fumes from a tunnel, but there will be a navigation hazard wherever the fumes are extracted.

It is argued that it is safe to sail across or up and down the Channel. If we are talking about hazards below the Channel, we should talk also of some of the hazards on the surface, and I should like to know what research the Department of Transport has undertaken. We all know that there are about 300 near misses or near accidents in the Channel each year. If we were to add even more navigation hazards, as some of the schemes for the fixed Channel link are supposed to do, it is likely that there would be even more problems or accidents than at present.

I am aware that the Minister might say that there is nothing new about the bridge technology that would be involved. I accept that modern ships are equipped with better navigational equipment than hitherto, but, I have in mind a large tanker, such as the Torrey Canyon of 1960s fame, drifting out of control in the Channel and striking one of the likely navigation hazards. There are problems with a fixed link above the surface as there are with one below.

Of the schemes that are shortly to be considered by the Department, one of the front runners appears to be the Euroroute, which is the part-bridge, part-tunnel scheme. According to the newspapers, it was regarded as the favourite a few months ago. It has the drawback of featuring a bridge out to an artificial island, and my comments about shipping hazards must apply to an artificial island. Road traffic would have to travel to the island before descending a futuristic spiral which would take it beneath the sea.

If the average motorist is asked in a questionnaire whether he or she would prefer to drive across the Channel, I do not believe that he or she would pause to consider factors such as strain and sheer boredom, which would be involved in driving for a considerable time in a straight line in a tunnel below the sea. Those who built some of the long-distance roads in other parts of the world soon realised that straight-line roads were a likely cause of accidents. Most of us know who spend any time on motorways how easy it is to lose concentration and to indulge in what my hon. Friend described as microsleep. How much more likely it is to lose concentration and be more susceptible to microsleep when travelling in a straight line.

We all know that if we open the Channel fixed link to everybody, among those sitting behind the wheel will be a fair proportion of people with things on their minds that stop them from concentrating on their driving, a proportion of drivers who have drunk too much, a proportion of people who should not be allowed behind a wheel at any time, on any road—but who, thanks to our 50-year-old driving test, can drive legally — and a proportion of drivers, especially of heavy lorries, who will be anxious to get to their destination as quickly as possible because time is money.

That explosive mixture below the surface of the English Channel is an unacceptable risk. I hope that the Minister will tell the House what research is underway into those factors, and whether they will be taken into consideration before the Government announce which of the proposed schemes is to be accepted.

The hon. Member for Derby, North said that if drivers felt that they were not up to the psychological impact of driving through a tunnel, they could take the train. If he thinks about it, he will recognise that that is a naive way of looking at the matter——

Mr. Allan Rogers (Rhondda): The hon. Gentleman is daft, not naive.

Mr. Snape: I would not be so unkind. It is a naive way of looking at human reactions. If someone was driving from the West Country to Scotland, but not feeling quite up to that, it would be possible to put the car on a motorail train in ride to Scotland. But the number of impulse buyers of motorail tickets is infinitesimal, to say the least.

If a driver has decided to drive to the Continent and back, he will do so regardless of his physical condition or the availability of alternative services.

Mr. Greg Knight: The hon. Gentleman is slightly distorting what I said. My earlier intervention was in response to the point of my hon. Friend the Member for

[Mr. Greg Knight]

Sheffield, Hallam (Sir J. Osborn), who referred to the person who had driven through the tunnel once, then back through the same tunnel, then back again, and then back yet again for the fourth time.

While I accept that someone going on a long journey who has packed his car might, if he had the choice, decide to drive through the Channel tunnel, if on his return from his holiday he felt rather tired when he reached the link, if there is the alternative available of using a rail service, many sensible and reasonable motorists would decide to do so. That choice should be available.

Mr. Snape: I know that the Conservative party makes a song and a dance about availability and freedom of choice. The hon. Gentleman's view is unrealistic. A motorist in the position that he described will have psychologically decided to drive.

The argument that clinches the debate on the fixed link is this. Anybody with a grain, an ounce, an iota of common sense, rather than drive to a terminal at Cheriton, would prefer to load the car on to a train at a place away from the tunnel mouth, and pass the long journey in comparative comfort and safety on the train, through the Channel tunnel.

Notwithstanding the advanced technology from Japan that one of the fixed link advocates has talked about, I hope that the Government, despite their avowed dislike of commonsense solutions for transport, will opt for the only sensible cross-Channel link of the ones before them and for once will have the courage to say what Max Hastings, the well-known Left-wing journalist, said. He referred to the detestable road lobby. I hope that the Government will say "This time you are not getting your own way. We shall be sensible about our transport infrastructure." However, I believe that the French will tell them that anyway. Normally on the continent Governments are less susceptible to the wiles, blackmail and arm twisting of the road lobby than successive Governments have been in this country. I hope that the decision will be made for the Government by the French.

The only sensible solution is that of the Channel Tunnel Group. The points raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow not only should have been discussed a long time ago and should form a part of the decision-making processes of the Department of Transport, but should provide an unanswerable reason why the only cross-Channel link that we should have is one connecting Britain with the continent by rail only.

10.47 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. David Mitchell): The hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) helpfully sought to give an airing to several matters affecting the Channel fixed link, if any, and the decision that the Government have to make. I am grateful to him, for reasons that will come out during my remarks, for having initiated the debate, even at a later hour than both he and I thought it would be.

The hon. Gentleman drew attention to an experience that he had had while driving—[Interruption.]—through the Dartford tunnel. It is helpful that that was imprinted on his mind so clearly that he was able to describe it—[Interruption.] I do not think that the hon. Members for Rhondda (Mr. Rogers) and for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron) wish me to give way, but they keep interrupting from a sedentary position. I shall give way if they wish. [Interruption.] I apologise for interrupting the hon. Members' conversation, but I was trying to answer the hon. Member for Linlithgow, who raised serious points, which the House needs to examine carefully.

The point that I was trying to make was that the hon. Gentleman's Dartford tunnel experience, which was imprinted so clearly on his recollection, is the sort of thing that we have to try to ensure is covered when we make our assessments.

The hon. Gentleman also referred to the tailback that can be found on a motorway-type road and said that one nut can create havoc. That highlights vividly why we must consider the promoters' proposals carefully.

The hon. Gentleman rightly attaches importance to driver safety. It is a key element in our assessment. We are not simply considering the type of catastrophic event which he and his hon. Friend on the Government Front Bench——

Mr. Snape: The Minister is two years too soon.

Mr. Mitchell: ——the Opposition Front Bench described. We must be sure that the link is designed to cater for all conceivable conditions and incidents. It must therefore have adequate crossovers, high quality surveillance, traffic control equipment for close and constant monitoring and satisfactory contingency measures to deal with breakdowns or emergencies. The promoters' proposals are therefore being examined to see how they would cope with the three operating states.

The first hypothesis is the normal free-flowing condition, when the main need is to provide for the occasional breakdown. The second is when it is necessary for the operator to take a complete lane or carriageway out of service. That has not been mentioned, but it must be taken into account. The main need is the ability to divert traffic safely. Finally, we are considering the promoters' contingency plans to deal with emergencies. Important requirements in this regard are immediate response from rescue crews, clear and effective traffic signals and control of the ventilation system in case of fire.

Hon. Members have mentioned other aspects, which I shall ensure are drawn to the attention of our assessment teams. The drive-through schemes are being assessed critically on that basis. The Department's highway engineers, outside experts and experts from France will have to be satisfied on all of the counts that I have outlined before any road scheme could go ahead.

Mr. Dalyell: Will the findings of the assessment teams be made available to the Library for those of us who are interested? As I said in my speech, I was a little disappointed that the TRRL could not talk to the Library.

Mr. Mitchell: I give way to my hon. Friend.

Sir John Page (Harrow, West): Are some of the teams joint British and French teams, or is it possible that the two Governments will come to dramatically different conclusions?

Mr. Mitchell: The hon. Member for Linlithgow asked about the TRRL report. We will publish a White Paper. Some of the information from the promoters, for example, is commercially confidential. The White Paper will give the House as much information as can reasonably be made available. My hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, West (Sir J. Page) asked about the possibility of divergent views. We have 20 assessment groups, and the French have other groups covering the same issues. The two teams are in touch with each other. That does not necessarily mean that they will come to the same conclusions. So far there appears to be general consensus between the assessment groups about the risks that they have been asked to identify, consider and recommend on.

The question of driver psychology was also raised in the debate on 9 December, especially by the hon. Member for Linlithgow. That gave me the opportunity to satisfy myself that the question was being thoroughly considered in the assessments. The matter was also dealt with in the Transport Select Committee's report published on 2 December. Interestingly, the Select Committee referred to the need to be satisfied about the psychology, not only of driving through tunnels, but of loading and unloading vehicles from trains.

The promoters of the two fixed link schemes which involve drive-through tunnels have adduced evidence about driver psychology in support of their, admittedly different, schemes. Both promoters propose a range of measures to guard against any difficulty on that account. There will, for example, be permanent patrols throughout the link. Their evidence and measures are being examined closely by the assessment teams. For that work we are calling on the resources of the TRRL.

The hon. Gentleman said that the TRRL did not report direct to the Library or to hon. Members who had made inquiries. It is doing research for a client, and it is normal to report to the client—in this case the Department of Transport — and for the client to make available requested information. Certainly the hon. Gentleman's points will be kept in mind for the White Paper.

An important area in which we need to be satisfied is how the less expert non-professional driver will cope with what may be unfamiliar conditions. We need to know the answer to that question, both for safety and to determine whether the psychological effects of driving through the tunnel would affect usage and the viability of the scheme. The hon. Gentleman quoted extensively from a document which has come to me from the Channel tunnel group. I assure him that it has come into his possession, mine and that of the assessment teams. Therefore, they can take account of the points that are made.

Mr. Dalyell: I told the Minister's office that I would quote from it, as soon as I knew I was lucky in the ballot——

Mr. Mitchell: I am not complaining, but merely saying that the Channel tunnel group has sent that information, and that we have ensured that it has reached our assessors and is being covered.

The hon. Gentleman drew attention to the arguments in that document about the monotony and predictability affecting drivers, and the possibility of micro-sleep. Sometimes when hon. Members are in the House until late into the night and drive home, I am surprised that there are not more examples of that. The circumstances of the tunnel may induce boredom, lack of attention and drowsiness, and that must be considered carefully. There are ways which hon. Members have described, in particular my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Sir J. Osborn), which seek to deal with that problem. The question is whether they deal with the problem effectively.

The question of inebriated drivers has been raised, and of holidaymakers tired from long journeys. Some people drive long distances, for example across France, at the end of a holiday, flop into the ferry and are happy to put up their feet and let someone else do the work. I have no doubt that, should there be a Channel fixed link—we do not know that yet—many people will still wish to use ferries for those clear advantages.

Much more serious questions were raised by hon. Members who drew attention to the potential of fire hazards and of carbon monoxide hazards in long tunnels.

Mr. Dalyell: Rational people will use the ferries, where they can flop, but people who want to flop usually want to do it at home. Therefore, they will take the risk of using the tunnel. They will do so at the expense of others and themselves.

Mr. Mitchell: The hon. Gentleman is right to point out that danger. However, that danger also exists on our roads. The House will be well aware that tiredness slows people's reactions and helps to turn small accidents into major ones.

Mr. Rogers: Can the Minister illustrate in our roads system the comparable physical circumstances of a Channel tunnel—for example, a straight 20-mile road?

Mr. Mitchell: I am sorry that I gave way to the hon. Gentleman, because that was not the point raised by the hon. Member for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Snape). I was trying to reply seriously to his question about multiple accidents and the pile-ups that can happen even on open roads such as the M6. We shall have to consider carefully what the effects will be, not just what we should do when a tunnel is jammed and the emergency services cannot reach the scene of an accident as easily as they might reach an accident on a motorway, but whether the tunnel ventilation will be able to cope in the event of such an accident. All of those are important matters of which we are aware, and during this short debate some of them have been highlighted. We shall ensure that they are covered by our assessment teams as they consider the problems.

All tunnel schemes require special ventilation measures. The invitation to promoters made it clear that the ventilation of a road link should comply with the recommendations of the PIARC tunnels technical committee report of October 1983. The Channel expressway scheme uses two systems of ventilation in conjunction: electrostatic precipitators and longitudinal jet fans. Electrostatic precipitators have not before been used in Britain, but they have a proven record in Japan and should be an interesting concept. Their purpose is to clean diesel smoke by scrubbing out the solid particles that it contains. The additional longitudinal jet fan system is required to dilute the carbon monoxide in the air. The hon. Member for Linlithgow referred to the Dartford tunnel. He also drew attention to a letter about the matter. It is clear that we are concerned, not only with the ability of precipitators to take out diesel smoke, but with the level of carbon monoxide, and whether we can ensure that people's health will not be put at risk by driving through the tunnel.

We are examining the details of the proposals as a matter of priority. The tunnel environment will have to meet acceptable standards in carbon monoxide levels and in visibility. In particular, we need to be satisfied about the performance of these combined systems in the range of traffic conditions, and especially their effect in dealing with fires and smoke control. Ventilation shafts are being examined by two assessment groups. The engineering group is assessing the vulnerability of the shafts to impact from shipping. The risks to shipping and the implications for the International Maritime Organisation are being considered by our marine assessment team.

[Mr. Mitchell]

My hon. Friend the Member for Hallam drew attention to the ventilation in the Channel tunnel. He described his fears about the possible risks to shipping, and we have indentified that as something at which we must look carefully.

A number of other matters were raised by other hon. Members. The hon. Member for Linlithgow raised a question about civil servants and evidence to the Select Committee. I understand that none was called to give evidence to the Committee. I shall consider releasing the advice of the TRRL in the White Paper.

The hon. Gentleman also raised the problems of vehicles that might run out of petrol, experience a failure of lights in the tunnel and so on. I am grateful to him for having raised these matters, because again this adds to the valuable way in which, both this debate and the earlier debate, hon. Members have pointed their fingers at things that we have to consider thoroughly.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hallam drew attention to the differing forecasts of the traffic and asked me to publish them. Some of that is commercially confidential imformation, but we shall publish a White Paper. I can give a provisional timetable, which involves a decision in late January, a White Paper at about the same time, with a view to a treaty being signed in February.

My hon. Friend also spoke about the gradient on the artificial islands, and I shall certainly look at that. They are large, about the size of Trafalger square, and my hon. Friend's point is important. He also described his experience of driving through the St. Gotthard tunnel, which is about 17 km long. There is a great difference between his driving as an advanced driver and that of my elderly aunt, whom I would not encourage to take this journey.

Sir John Osborn: Surely there must be a fund of experience of good and bad drivers going through these tunnels. I hope that that experience, some of which will be coming from the Mont Blanc tunnel, will be made available to the French and British assessors.

Mr. Mitchell: My hon. Friend has drawn to my attention a point that was made by my hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone (Sir J. Wells) when he sought the Government's view on the medical aspects of drivers going through such long tunnels. We shall be drawing on the experience of the operators of Swiss and other long tunnels before we make a decision. We shall also be taking expert advice about driver behaviour in a road tunnel.

The hon. Member for West Bromwich, East said that it was odd that we should have this debate. It is not odd at all — it is helpful that the hon. Member for Linlithgow has given us the opportunity to hear more from the House. It is not odd, it is felicitous, because it has enabled me to recover from my disappointment at the absence of the hon. Member for West Bromwich, East from our proceedings when we last debated this subject. I am glad that the inhibition that kept him out of sight on that occasion has now gone.

Mr. Snape: I am grateful to the hon Gentleman. I hope to participate in many such debates——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): Order.

Mr. Dalyell: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I should just like to thank the Under-Secretary of State for the seriousness and courtesy of his reply.

Juries (Practice for Challenge)

11.9 pm

Mr. Toby Jessel (Twickenham): In the debate on the Loyal Address on 7 November, in reply to an intervention from me, my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary expressed concern about the current position on peremptory challenges of jurors. He was kind enough to say that he had read the speech that I had made the previous night in the debate on the Loyal Address, in which I put the case to curtail the right of peremptory challenge of jurors in Crown courts, especially in multiple cases with several defendants, which tends to handicap the police in their efforts to deal with violent and serious crime.

Before I develop that argument, may I please make two points clear? First, in the debate on the Loyal Address on 6 November I said:

"I do not blame defence counsel – they do their best for their clients within the rules. The rules are wrong, and it is up to us to change them."—[Official Report, 6 November 1985, Vol. 86, c. 92.]

That is consistent with early-day motion 152 which was tabled by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Warrington, South (Mr. Carlisle), together with several other leading and distinguished parliamentarians who are also lawyers.

My right hon. and learned Friend's early-day motion says:

"That this House reasserts that so long as the right of peremptory challenge to members of a jury exists then, in accordance with the traditions of an independent legal profession, it is the right and duty of defence counsel to exercise that right if he considers that it is in his client's interest to do so, or if he has received instructions from his client to do so."

I added an amendment to the effect that I agreed with that.

Secondly, I believe that it is important that juries should comprise a broad cross-section of the adult population. We do not want to replace one slant by another slant.

Next, may I remind those right hon. and hon. Members who are not lawyers of the current position. In Crown courts, there are two types of jury challenge: peremptory challenge and challenge by showing cause. Under peremptory challenge, each accused person, through his lawyer, can challenge and remove three jurymen without giving any reason whatever. Thus, in a multiple trial where there are four accused there can be 12 challenges. Where there are seven accused there can be 21 challenges. Several defence counsel, either acting singly or getting together to work out their policy, can continue to challenge and to remove jurors until they get a jury that is broadly to their liking.

There is also the right to challenge jurors by showing cause. In that case, the accused has to show good cause why a juryman or jurywoman should be removed and to justify his objections. Nobody is saying that that second right should go. I would add that in criminal cases the prosecution also has the right to both types of challenge, but so far as I am aware nobody has suggested that the prosecution systematically uses that right to challenge in order to unbalance the composition of juries. Defence counsel, however, sometimes do so.

Lord Denning has said that peremptory challenge should be abolished. He said so in another place as recently as 4 December. In his book "What Next in the Law?" the passage on this subject caused such a reaction that he resigned as Master of the Rolls and the book was withdrawn from sale, but not before the House of Commons Library had obtained a copy. I shall now quote the relevant passage, which is headed "Packing the jury." Lord Denning wrote:

"It is now becoming apparent that the accused, by using the 'peremptory' challenge, may seek to 'pack' the jury-box with jurors who are sympathetic to his side, or at any rate to get enough so that more than two will disagree. The most important case in recent times was when there was a riot in a coloured area of Bristol called St. Paul's. The police moved in to make inquiries as to illegal goings-on there, such as prostitution and the like. They were attacked by mobs of the coloured people living there. They did not like their illegal activities being stopped. There was most serious disturbance. The police were outnumbered and had to withdraw for a time. Many police were injured. Twelve of the ringleaders of the riot were arrested. They were charged on indictment with riot at common law. The panel of jurors was composed of people of Bristol, both coloured and white. On the jury being called, each one of the twelve accused used his right of 'peremptory' challenge. So there were thirty-six challenges available to the twelve. They used up thirty-five of them. It was done so as to secure as many coloured people on the jury as possible – by objecting to whites. This meant that five of the jury were coloured and seven white. The evidence against two of the accused was so strong that you would think they would be found guilty. But there was a disagreement."

Lord Denning refers to another case, and continues:

"the right of 'peremptory' challenge has been used to secure for the defence a jury thought to be more sympathetic to the defence —such as long-haired youths—or timid women—according to the nature of the case. Sometimes it is used so as to object to any man who is dressed well or who looks intelligent or middle class.

This prompts the reflection: What is the justification today of the right of the accused to 'peremptory' challenges? Should we any longer permit the accused to exclude a juror simply because of his looks?"

Mr. David Ashby (Leicestershire, North-West): My hon. Friend talks about packing a jury. How can any one challenging a juror say where the juror lives, what his occupation is, what his interests are, whether he is married or single—or anything about him? If one has no such information, how can one pack a favourable jury? Is not suggesting that that can be done unworthy of those people who spend so much time on jury service for which they are low paid?

Mr. Jessel: I hope that my hon. Friend will contribute to the debate later, since he made five or six points. I cannot answer them all. However, to tell what a juror is like one must go by the average and take into account certain characteristics. As a leading article in The Times said last June:

"Today the peremptory challenge seems to be used by defence counsel in an endeavour to achieve as far as possible a jury composed of people believed by the defence to be likely to be hostile to the prosecution and sympathetic to the defendant. Race, class, age, sex and education all seem to play a part in the selection process.

There is a discernible tendency to favour those who seem to be . . . unskilled and relatively uneducated . . .

The principle of random selection is fundamental to our jury system . . . What is now happening is that the right of challenge is being used not in order to achieve a fair and just trial but in order to defeat the principle of random selection and replace it by a partial, or in some cases a total, selection of the jury by the defendant . . .

If the jury system is to survive in this country, it must retain public confidence. The present abuse of the defendant's right of peremptory challenge is bringing the system into serious disrepute. This should be a matter of concern for all who care about jury trial. There is no longer any sensible justification for preserving the right of peremptory challenge, which ought now to be abolished."

I received a letter from a lady in Surrey a couple of weeks ago. She said:

[Mr. Jessel]

"I was recently a juror on a case involving the dealing and selling of heroin. The two defendants challenged five jurors, four of whom were elderly, the fifth was a very smartly dressed young man in suit and tie.

The drug squad and the police presented the fact very clearly and one of the defendants admitted that he smoked heroin and that it was found in the the squat where he and his girl friend lived. In spite of this, we were unable to return a guilty verdict.

Three youngsters on the jury were anti-authority, anti-police and in fact anti-everything to do with law and order. One said that all his friends were on drugs and he certainly wouldn't return a guilty verdict."

How can any hon. and learned Member justify that? We all know that it is wrong, that it is unjust, that it undermines the fight against violence and serious crime, that it undermines respect for the law, for the Bar and for the courts and that it must stop, and quickly. We know that it is going on and anyone who pretends that it is not or who plays down its importance is acting against the public and national interest.

I tabled an early-day motion a few weeks ago about the Cyprus secrets trial, in which I set out an account of a pre-trial meeting which took place at 9.35 am on Sunday 14 April in a private room at the Old Bailey. Because that motion was long, I will not read it. It was abundantly clear that leading defence counsel in the case got together and discussed how best to obtain a jury to improve the chances of acquittal — that is, to diminish the chances of conviction. It was, no doubt, a lawful exercise, but its revelation met with a deafening silence from the Bar Council.

Sir Anthony Meyer (Clywd, North-West) : I do not wish to express an opinion one way or the other on the fundamentals of what my hon. Friend is saying. However, will he agree that a consequence of what amounts virtually to a selected jury may not merely be that guilty people are not found guilty but that people who are innocent walk from the court with a cloud over their heads because people will say, "The jury which found them not guilty was not a proper kind of jury."?

I am particularly concerned about that because, in the case of the Cyprus accused, one of them who was my constituent was, I am convinced, entirely innocent, and I believe that that was true of one or two of the others. They now feel that they have been acquitted by a jury about which there is some suspicion.

Mr. Jessel: I accept what my hon. Friend says, though it seems an added reason for getting rid of the peremptory challenging of jurors, or at least sharply curtailing the number of such challenges.

I should make it clear that a leading defence counsel in the Cyprus case—one of the seven—Lord Hooson, who was formerly a much-respected Member of this House, and his junior Mr. Britton were not present at the meeting to which I referred. All the other leaders were.

Challenges should be used to remove jurors who might be biased. Yet challenges are now being used systematically to introduce bias — a bias towards acquittal—and that is not fair to the public, who want to help the police deal with serious and violent crime.

The Home Secretary told me that the Crown prosecution service would look into the matter. I fear that that could take too long. The Crown prosecution service seems likely to have some teething troubles and manning and salary problems. It will not begin in London until April and in the rest of the country until October. We do not know how long it will take over its inquiries; how long the Government will take to consider its findings; or how long the Government will need thereafter to prepare legislation, which might then get caught up in an election period. Thus, any new law might not be on the statute book before 1988 or even 1989. Three or four years is too long to wait.

The Home Secretary was kind enough to see me in his rooms on 27 November last to discuss the matter. He referred to the forthcoming White Paper, early in the new year, on next year's Criminal Justice Bill. At that time he gave no undertaking about whether there would be any reference in the White Paper to the peremptory challenge system, but he said that it might be under consideration. I understand that since then there have been discussions between different Government Departments on the matter and I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will reflect the need for urgency when he replies.

11.24 pm

Mr. Mark Carlisle (Warrington, South): We will all be grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham (Mr. Jessel) for raising this matter tonight, because it needs to be aired in the House, and I hope aired with some realism. I was delighted to hear my hon. Friend's acceptance that the use of the system that exists is not an abuse of the system by those who use it.

We are told that there is great concern about the use of the right to peremptory challenge. There is nothing new about this. The right to peremptory challenge by a defendant of members of the jury has existed for many hundreds of years. Indeed, under the Criminal Justice Act 1948 every individual defendant had the right to challenge without cause seven members of the jury. It was only in 1974 that that number was reduced to three. Throughout the years, as the Solicitor-General reminds us in a statement that he has issued, that right has been in existence, has been used and has been properly used by defence counsel on behalf of their clients.

So long as that right exists, it is the right and responsibility of defence counsel to use that right if they believe it to be in the interests of the client whom they are defending. My hon. Friend was good enough to say that he agreed with the terms of the early-day motion which I put down and which was supported by all parties. He was good enough to say that he was not suggesting that defence counsel had abused their right. But, unfortunately, he then went on to use language of the type which has led the press to suggest that counsel have behaved wrongly. He said that, when he raised the fact that counsel had objected to certain jurors in the spy case, it had been met by a deafening silence by the Bar Council. The only implication of that must be that my hon. Friend is suggesting that there was something that the Bar Council should have been inquiring into. I repeat that, so long as the right to object to jurors without cause exists, it is, in my view and I believe in the view of hon. Members and the legal profession, the right and duty of defence counsel to act in the interests of their client and to object to jurors if they are either instructed to do so or believe it is in their interest to do so.

The real issue is not the use that is made of the right at the moment but whether that right should exist. There I must confess that I share my hon. Friend's view. I am a radical on the issue. In 1970, when I was a junior Minister in the Home Office and there was a right to seven peremptory challenges, I argued that we should not reduce that to three but should get rid of them entirely. I was overruled and those who overruled me may have been right. I take the view that the right of jury trial is a sacred right in this country and that every man has the right to be tried by his peers, but that he does not have the right to choose who those peers shall be. I question the right to peremptory challenge without cause rather than the right to challenge with cause. I appreciate, however, that that is a minority view in my profession. Most of my colleagues, whom I respect, believe that there is a case for limited use of peremptory challenge as a safety valve against an individual feeling that he is being tried by a jury which may be weighted against him. That may be right. Therefore, although I am prepared to reconsider the need for peremptory challenge at all, the matter is not so one-sided as my hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham suggests.

In ordinary cases, I do not believe in using the right to peremptory challenge. I am no psychiatrist and I do not accept that a man in a jacket and tie is necessarily more likely to convict my client than is a man wearing a sweater. Indeed, I find the suggestion offensive to the man in the sweater. In my view, it is impossible to tell from the look on a juror's face what his attitude may be. In multiple cases, however, in which there are many defendants, I accept that defence counsel will use that right to try to eliminate certain jurors if they or their clients believe, rightly or wrongly, that the jurors in question are apathetic to the case being made for the defence.

Finally, my hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham must not forget there is an equivalent right for the prosecution. Indeed, the prosecution has an unlimited right to stand aside anyone it wishes. I have no objection to re-examining the right of challenge because I personally question its validity, but if we do so it must be on the basis that we look at the rights of defence and prosecution alike. In other words, if we consider removing the limited right of the one we must also consider the unlimited right of the other.

Therefore, I say to the Minister: let us have a serious examination of the present situation if that is necessary, but let us not imagine that it is a major abuse of the legal system, because it is not. It is a limited area which may require examination—but in the light of reality and fact rather than in the heightened atmosphere of an individual case.

11.33 pm

Sir John Page (Harrow, West): I often think that debates of this kind, especially those which take place late at night, are of great importance because only those who are really interested in the subject bother to be here. I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham (Mr. Jessel), who I hope will shortly return to the Chamber to receive his bouquet from me, for raising this important matter. I am here because I thought that, as a non-lawyer amateur, I should stand shoulder to shoulder with my hon. Friend in case that proved necessary.

I am reminded of an occasion when I spoke—rather well, I thought — on the Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction Measure. On leaving the Chamber, I was greeted in the Lobby by Lady Gammans who at that time represented Hornsey. She said, "I would like to congratulate you on your tremendous speech tonight, Jack," and I said, "Thank you, Muriel. How kind." She replied, "I felt you were speaking for all of us who knew nothing whatever about the subject."

Tonight I speak for the well-mown and carefully nurtured grassroots of Harrow. There is definitely concern in the country about whether there is a possible abuse of the peremptory challenge in the jury system. As my hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham will be aware, there is also a danger of what my hon. Friend the Member for Warwick and Leamington (Sir D. Smith) calls the "Alsatian syndrome". When an Alsatian dog attacks a person or child, for the following three or four weeks the newspapers are full of stories about Alsatians attacking people and there are demands for greater control of such dogs. Subsequently another fad occurs, and one never hears of the Alsatian attack again.

But that is not the case in this important aspect of our legal system. As the son of one lawyer and the father of two, I have always felt that the jury system should be preserved and is something of which we should be proud. As a pretty hard-line Conservative, I feel that there are dangers in changing, without the most careful thought, systems that have stood the test of time.

But my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Warrington, South (Mr. Carlisle), in a well-measured, eloquent and impartial speech, reminded us that the last time peremptory challenge was tested was in 1974, when the number was reduced from seven to three. There is something innately fair in the opportunity for challenge to be made. In the case of a single accused the challenge of three merely on visual attitudes seems to be quite successful, but in cases involving multiple accused, I wonder whether each should have an equal chance of challenging three of the jurors.

A thought that I throw into the limpid pool presided over by the Under-Secretary is that, if there is more than one accused in a multiple case, there might be good sense in reducing the numbers that could be challenged by each individual. I would like to think that never more than nine out of 12 jurors could be replaced by this challenge.

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): If all men are equal before the Crown, and if one man has a right to three challenges, how can it be argued that in a multiple defence case each man should be treated differently?

Sir John Page: I am grateful to the hon. and possibly learned Gentleman because I have been tussling with that very point this evening. If people are being jointly accused of a single crime, they may have a kind of joint attitude towards their defence — [Interruption.] The hon. Member for St. Helens, South (Mr. Bermingham) may laugh, but at least I have taken the trouble to think about the problem, and it seemed to me that that was not a bad way of getting over the hump.

Mr. Ashby: What happens if there are three people, all of whom are pleading not guilty initially and have all had their right to challenge, the jury is duly sworn, the prosecution opens, and two of them plead guilty?

Sir John Page: I am no Rumpole of the Bailey. I thought my hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham got out of answering the question rather neatly when he said that he hoped that my hon. Friend the Member for Leicestershire, North-West (Mr. Ashby) would have the opportunity of asking the question in his speech and answering it as well.

[Sir John Page]

Having suggested that there should perhaps be a limit to the number of challenges in one case, I wonder whether there is something to be said for looking at the catchment area for juries in cases where there is a major local interest in a case. It is difficult to find unbiased juries in an area where a local crime has had considerable local publicity. There is a danger in such cases of not having a completely impartial jury. An accused person has to be tried by his peers, and it is worth considering rather carefully who our peers are.

11.42 pm

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): One of the investigators in the Cyprus spy trial is a constituent of mine. He came to see me recently, and I was very disquietened by what he said. I know that there is a Government inquiry into the circumstances which led up to the trial. As far as I am aware, the accused have not participated in the inquiry.

I have great sympathy with what was said by my hon. Friends the Members for Twickenham (Mr. Jessel) and for Harrow, West (Sir J. Page), as well as by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Warrington, South (Mr. Carlisle). The matter requires careful consideration, and I congratulate the Government on setting up the inquiry. The outcome should help us to arrive at a conclusion, not only as to the facts in the Cyprus case, but as to the principles on which peremptory challenge takes place.

I conclude my very brief intervention by saying that I have every intention of returning to the matter when the Government inquiry has concluded. I believe that it will lead to a very satisfactory outcome in the last resort.

11.43 pm

Mr. David Ashby (Leicestershire, North-West): It is important to recall the more recent history of the jury system. In the days when Sir Edward Marshall Hall made eloquent speeches in which he quoted from the Greeks and the Latins, they were addressed to juries of householders. They were well educated people who had achieved a certain status in life. We enlarged the category of people who were eligible to serve on a jury as we spread the franchise—to women, to people over 21 and then to all people over 18. I am not decrying that, but we must look at the realities. Juries can be drawn from a complete cross-section of the population—good, bad and indifferent. We may have a jury on which some of the jurors cannot read or write, or on which some of the jurors are not the most intelligent people. There is a problem in fraud cases involving complex issues and many documents if the jurors cannot read, let alone understand, the documents. That is one of the fundamental problems that we must consider.

My hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham (Mr. Jessel) has relied on anecdotal evidence with respect to a secrets trial, the details of which I understand to have been improperly leaked by some dishonourable member of the legal profession who had a duty not to disclose that information and who cannot therefore be trusted in any way. That dishonourable person gave anecdotal evidence about who decided within the meeting to take certain action with respect to the jury. Some people decided that one approach was a good idea, another group decided that another approach was a good idea, and yet another group decided that a third approach was a good idea. My hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham is trying to say that a disgraceful action arose out of that, but it did not. As far as I can make out, the people had totally differing views on the composition of the jury. That is the fundamental problem to which my hon. Friend must address himself.

We do not know the composition of a jury. We can go on challenging until we are blue in the face, but we cannot be certain of what we are getting. That is right and proper. That is how it should be. In challenging juries, one has a right, as my hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham said, to have "a broad cross-section of the population". I have seen juries comprising 11 women and one man and have thought to myself, "That is not a broad cross-section of the public. The population is not composed 11 : 1 of women. Should I use my challenge to reduce the ratio so that it is closer to the proportion in the population?" I have come across a jury composed of people of 50 or more and have said to myself, "That does not reflect the population. The jury can include people from the age of 18. Should we not have a few people on it who are between 18 and 25, or between 25 and 30?" Is that not a proper challenge to make?

One may look at the jury panel on the right and the jury panel on the left and say, "There are 10 people of 50 or more. Should I challenge three to try to get some of the younger people on to the jury?"

Mr. Jessel: Can my hon. Friend say with his hand on his heart that it is not his purpose when making those challenges to obtain a jury that will improve his client's chances of an acquittal?

Mr. Ashby: It is first of all my responsibility to do my best for my client, just as it is equally the Crown's duty to do its best for its client. The Crown has the police as clients. It is my duty to try to get a good cross-section on to the jury. With my hand on my heart I can say that, by and large, I challenge juries to obtain a good cross-section — to use my hon. Friend's words, "a broad cross-section of the population."

I speak for my colleagues at the Bar, with whom I have discussed the nonsense that has been talked about juror challenging in the past few weeks. Almost all my colleagues at the Bar take the view that it is nonsense. They have all asked, "How can we pack a jury when we do not have a clue who the jurors are? We do not know where they come from. We do not even know which part of London they come from, for example. We do not know what their views are or anything else about them."

Mr. Jessel: Why is the peremptory challenge employed?

Mr. Ashby: My colleagues at the Bar all say that some juries are not composed of a broad cross-section of the public. There are some unbalanced juries.

If I could be sure of a number of factors, I should happily give up the right of peremptory challenge. First, I look for an intelligent jury. If a barrister has a good defence, he will want to submit it to an intelligent jury. He will not want a dumb jury to listen to his defence. Secondly, I should be happy to revert to juries of householders, but that will never happen and so it should be forgotten. Thirdly, if I could be assured that a jury consisted of a good cross-section of the public, I should be happy with it. I want to know that the jury is composed of men and women in equal numbers and that it is representative of age groups in the population and of the area. That will not be achieved by the present system, and that is why the preremptory challenge is available.

I intervened in the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham because I wanted to pay tribute to juries. I have been involved in a case which has run for five weeks, and the jury gave up its time to hear it. Jurors are virtually unpaid, and they give up their families, work and many other things. In the five-week case in which I appeared, the jurors listened to the evidence day after day with the greatest attention, as well as to counsel's closing speeches and the summing-up. I pay tribute to jurors throughout the country for undertaking that responsibility willingly.

To talk about juries being packed, to suggest that some jurors are less worthy than others and to refer to the jury in the secrets trial as one which was incapable of coming to the right decision on the evidence, is to mount the most scurrilous attack on the integrity of honourable and decent people. I challenge my hon. Friend to name one person on the secrets trial jury who was not honourable and did not come to his decision rightly on the evidence. The jurors came to their conclusion on the evidence. My hon. Friend was not there, and neither was I.

I listened to my hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham referring to Lord Denning's anecdotal story about the Bristol riots. When a number of black persons come from a black area and they are charged with the most serious offences, is it not right and proper that they should ask, in keeping with having a broad cross-section of the population, that there should be a few coloured people on the jury? Where is our idea of justice and fairness? It is an idea that has evolved over the years. It has created a wonderful system which is the pride of our nation. It is one which we have exported, and one which is held in the highest esteem by many countries throughout the world. Where is our sense of value that we should try to denigrate something that has grown up well and honourably over the years?

The jury system is a well tried and true system; it is an honourable system; it is the best system that we can devise. We should uphold it, not denigrate it. What other country would acquit six people who had allegedly confessed to what amounted to treason? It says much for our system—and I have been proud to be a party to that system for 23 years—that that should happen in such a serious case. Indeed, the system is highly thought of by other countries.

What do people want? Do they want a system of rough justice? Do they want juries to be packed so that those who may be innocent are convicted? The tenor of the debate has been totally to misunderstand the system — that people are innocent until they are proved guilty; that each individual is to be tried and treated as an individual so that each should have the right of jury challenge; that cases should be tried separately and that evidence against persons should be judged separately. Those six people may have been on trial together, but they were not considered as a lump; each was considered separately.

I entirely disagree with the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham. I believe that three peremptory challenges are right and proper to ensure a proper balance and a proper cross-section of the population.

11.57 pm

Mr. Neil Thorne (Ilford, South): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham (Mr. Jessel) on raising this important issue. It should be aired in the House because, whatever hon. Members have said this evening, there is great cause for concern in the country. If there is cause for concern, the matter should be debated here. Where else would we want it to be debated? The question of peremptory challenges is a matter of some concern.

I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Leicestershire, North-West (Mr. Ashby) for explaining why the number of challenges has been reduced from seven to three. I now understand that in the old days it was householders who usually served on juries, so by and large they were people of more mature years.

There are a number of defects in our present system because we do not provide that those who have been recently convicted should be excluded from jury service. Nor do we take account of those who have been awarded suspended sentences. When the present system was introduced, suspended sentences did not exist, so we have a right to reconsider the matter. Anyone who has been convicted, has served, or been awarded, a suspended sentence of two years or more, should be excluded from jury service for life. Clearly they are not the sort of people who are likely to apply a clear mind to the matter.

That causes considerable concern. I have no objection to people aged 18 serving on juries, but several people in the lower age bracket of 18 to 25 have no interest in serving on most juries, and those who serve with them confirm that. They are only anxious to get out of the jury room as quickly as possible, which is not good for justice to be seen to be done. Therefore, people under 25 should have the right to opt out of jury service if they wish.

I should like the age limit to be pushed up because people of 65 and over could ably and willingly serve on juries. Even some judges are considered capable of working until the age of 70, so there is no reason why people up to 70 should not be allowed to serve on juries, which might help considerably.

The problem today is that so many people try to get off juries when they are put on them. Many self-employed people and others could give extremely good service on juries, but they do not have the time because they are not sufficiently rewarded for the service that they provide. That is a major handicap. Undoubtedly the people who are given a pittance for their jury service do everything they can to get out of it. That is not good for justice.

I have watched with concern the high rates of acquittals in some courts—some are as high as 75 per cent. I am in doubt whether that is because cases are brought unsatisfactorily in the first place or because the juries are not capable of considering them adequately. I fully accept that juries that have given many days, if not weeks, to considering a case, are to be thanked for their public service, but unfortunately many of the people who could contribute greatly to that work are using every opportunity to be excluded.

My hon. Friend the Member for Leicestershire, North-West was honest in his reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham when he was asked to say that he did not try to choose jurors who would help his case. Rightly, he said that he must put his client's interests first. That is fully accepted. I do not think that anybody in the House would believe that that was the wrong thing to do.

[Mr. Neil Thorne]

When my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Warrington, South (Mr. Carlisle) was challenged by my hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham about what interest the Bar Council should take, he was trying to say that the Bar Council should take an interest in the matter, from the point of view of justice being seen by the public to be done. If it felt that that was not so, it should be expressing an opinion, not allowing the problem to run on. My right hon. and learned Friend is absolutely right in his view. I fully support him in saying that peremptory challenges should be abolished. It does not stop people being challenged, but the explanation will have to be given to the judge, which is always right and proper.

My constituents have told me of their experiences. One bank manager told me that when he was called for jury service, on the first day he appeared in a blazer and grey flannel trousers, and he was objected to each time he appeared. The next day he appeared in sweater and jeans, and no objections were raised to his appearance. That seems strange. For the rest of the week he played a full part in the court.

Mr. Bermingham: Does not the hon. Gentleman accept that if one looks at any jury panel on any day, one sees people dressed in almost anything? It is almost impossible for somebody appearing on behalf of the defence or the prosecution to know anything about them from their dress. To draw conclusions because of anecdotes is to mislead the public, and indeed the House, about the reasons why objections might be obtained. Would it not be fairer to say that people appear and serve because they believe in serving? We should stop the farce of alleging that there is a devious motive in objections.

Mr. Thorne: If someone finds that his dress has a bearing on whether he is objected to, he is entitled to express such an opinion. It is also right for him to express some anxiety if he is objected to in court while wearing a collar and tie. I appreciate that a person's dress does not necessarily mean that he will deal with an accused person in a given way.

Mr. Allan Rogers (Rhondda): They could be bank managers.

Mr. Thorne: Indeed they could. One, a constituent, spent the rest of the week in sweater and jeans serving on the jury. My advice to bank managers who want to serve on juries is to wear sweaters and jeans.

Mr. Rogers: Would not the hon. Gentleman's argument be completely destroyed if the bank manager turned up on the first day in jeans and sweater?

Mr. Thorne: He would not have been rejected. That proves my point. My advice to people who want to do their bit is to appear in such dress if they do not want barristers to object to them. That is unfortunate.

Mr. Ashby: Will my hon. Friend please explain how he knows that his constituent would have been rejected on the first day? It is fascinating us all.

Mr. Thorne: I can only say that that was my constituent's experience. He was objected to each time he appeared in the jury box on the first day and was not objected to for the remainder of the week. We must draw our own conclusions whether he was rejected because of his dress.

This matter requires careful consideration. My hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham is right to draw it to our attention and I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will be able to give some encouraging news that the Government have the matter under consideration and will seriously consider doing away with peremptory challenges.

12.7 am

Mr. Clive Soley (Hammersmith): It was a pleasure and a relief to listen to the hon. Member for Leicestershire, North-West (Mr. Ashby) make such a spirited defence of juries. If I had not heard him, I should be getting deeply depressed by some of the speeches that I have heard today. They were not founded in fact and were insulting to many juries.

Whether intentionally or not, the hon. Member for Twickenham (Mr. Jessel) has gone a long way to undermine public confidence in the jury system by the cheap publicity that he has obtained in the handling of this case. He has done it unacceptably and he should review his method of tackling the matter.

We have heard comments from the hon. Member for Twickenham and, I am sorry to say, from the hon. Member for Ilford, South (Mr. Thorne) about the type of dress and the type of person who might be acceptable in a jury. The hon. Member for Twickenham talked about working-class people being less likely to convict.

Mr. Jessel indicated dissent.

Mr. Soley: The hon. Member strongly implied that. He also implied that young people were less likely to convict. The hon. Gentleman should look at the evidence that is produced by the Government whom he supports. He should examine the British crime survey and other surveys, which show that the typical victim of crime is the young working-class male—young blacks as well. If any lawyer or solicitor is stupid enough to select people from working-class or black backgrounds simply because he believes that that will get his client off, he is wrong, because those people are more likely to take an authoritarian view towards people appearing in court.

Mr. Jessel: Did the hon. Gentleman hear me say almost at the beginning of my speech that I wanted to stress that a jury should be a typical cross-section and that I emphasised that I did not want to replace one slanting with another?

Mr. Soley: I heard the hon. Gentleman say that, but if he reads his comments in Hansard tomorrow he will find that he implied that working-class people and young people were likely to be anti-authoritarian and to let people off. I shall have to look carefully at his words about ethnic people, because I am not sure whether he also included them in that statement. That is wholly wrong, even according to the Government's evidence.

The hon. Gentleman could have told us that every member of the jury was vetted by the special branch. Let us have some balance. If we are to have peremptory or other challenges for the defence, we should extend them to the prosecution. If we are to have some form of vetting, let us vet both sides. My advice would be to defend the jury system, not undermine it.

The failure to get convictions in courts has nothing to do with the jury system. The Government and the hon. Gentleman are worried about the failure of their law and order policy. They cannot face the increase in crime. In 1984, one half of all the Crown court acquittals were by judges, not by jurors. Is the hon. Gentleman saying that we should sack all the judges because they are not doing their job properly? Are they undermining the police as the juries are, according to the hon. Gentleman? Perhaps the judges are wearing the wrong clothes. Perhaps they are working class. I rather doubt it. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman had better start attacking the judges too.

In 1983 the Home Office conducted a study, and the Minister will undoubtedly advise his Back-Bench Friends on it. It found that jurors were not becoming more cynical or doubting of prosecution evidence. Indeed, I am not sure why we need the study by the Crown Prosecution Service.

Mr. Bermingham: Does my hon. Friend agree that if we were to carry out a survey of acquittals in the metropolitan area, as opposed to in the shire counties, we might find that the rate of acquittal in the shire counties was much lower? Does he further agree that that might have something to do with the quality of preparation for the cases, as in the shire counties there are professional prosecuting teams for that? One finds that the standard of preparation is better in those areas.

Mr. Soley: My hon. Friend has much more knowledge of the law than I have, and I shall take his word for that. I am sure that he is right.

The hon. Member for Twickenham is saying that he did not like the result of the Cyprus case. Therefore, he wants to change the jury system. I do not accept that. The jury system is much more important and longer lasting than one particular case, be it right or wrong. I cannot judge that, but I accept that 12 citizens can and should judge a case properly. Juries were never meant to be a rubber stamp for the Government or case-hardened judges.

Juries are there precisely because they represent the community. They are not supposed to be lawyers or to have detailed knowledge of the law, or to come into court with preconceived ideas. They are there to listen to the evidence that is put before them and to make up their minds on the rights and wrongs of the case. That is part of the democratic judicial system, which we have had for a long time, and we should go a long way to protect it.

The prosecution has the power of the state behind it. At present, the defence can rely only on appearance. It cannot even know the occupations of jurors. In Scotland, it is possible to know their occupations. Of course a defence might wish to challenge a shop manager on a jury if his client is charged with armed robbery in a shop, but he would not be challenging only on appearance. The right to challenge is exercised to obtain a different sexual balance, as the hon. Member for Leicestershire, North-West said, or a different racial balance. There is nothing wrong with that if the defence lawyer believes that the jury is out of balance.

The hon. Member for Twickenham gave the example of the lady who wrote to him about a drugs case. He should have been a little stronger and clearer in his principles when he answered that lady. The implication of the way in which he used her letter in this debate was that he would wish to exclude from the jury anyone who was in any way sympathetic to drug abuse. I have no desire to rake over the past, but the implication is that anyone who appears before a jury on a drink-driving charge would want to exclude from the jury everyone who believed that drinking was bad. Anyone opposed to drink might be seen as opposing the defendant. What sort of jury system do we want? What right do we have to challenge the attitudes and values of all the people in the jury system? I would have replied to that lady: the jury system is supposed to represent a cross-section of the community. In that community are people of different ages, sexes, ethnic backgrounds, views, attitudes, beliefs and everything else. That is what we should aim for, and that is what the right of challenge is about.

The Crown prosecution service is supposed to conduct a study, but I am not sure why we need it, in view of the 1983 Home Office study. If, according to the Home Office, there is no sign that jurors are more likely to be biased against the prosecution than they were previously, why are we asking the Crown prosecution service to study the matter? Why on earth are we asking the prosecution service of all people? That service is on the side of the prosecution, and no one has yet suggested that the Crown's rights should be restricted. It would be nice if the Crown Prosecuting Service studied the matter and decided to restrict the rights of the prosecution to challenge or vet. That would at least put some balance back into the system.

I draw to the attention of the House a few quotes from the debate which the hon. Member for Twickenham introduced in the press, when he used the press to make his case. The Solicitors' Journal, which wished to introduce hooded jurors, said:

"Most effective would be gowns buttoned up to the neck and hoods similar to those worn by visitors to a hospital operating theatre when surgery is in progress."

One could add that such hoods are worn when raiding banks or by members of the paramilitary groups in Northern Ireland. The Home Office response was:

"A jury ought to be a random selection of people and it would be artificial to insist on a standardised form of dress."

I wish that that response had been tougher and that the Home Office had said that such suggestions should not be considered acceptable in a sophisticated democracy. It is an insult to that democracy.

In the Sunday Telegraph, Paul Williams—who also appeared to wish to put the knife into juries—said:

"Those most likely to be challenged are middle-class matrons."

That is news. I do not know whether it is the experience of the hon. Member for Leicestershire, North-West that lawyers always challenge middle-class matrons. Paul Williams continued:

"they have probably themselves suffered at least one theft and are likely to be sceptical about the ludicrous alibis often presented. In the case where I played my little trick"— he was talking of the trick that he played on the court—

"it was clearly the comfortable-looking ladies who were on the top of the list of objections."

Mr. Williams is making many assumptions, but perhaps more stupidly he seems to have misunderstood the pattern of crimes. Middle-class ladies are not highly represented in the crime figures. Again, these are prejudices based on fiction, not fact.

My final quote is from the Solicitor-General. I was a little puzzled when I found myself at short notice on the Front Bench to answer this debate, because my immediate reaction was that this should be Solicitor-General business. Only when I had discovered a little more about the law did I realise that the debate involved the Home Office. I saw that the Solicitor-General is strongly in favour of the jury system, and I give him full credit for that. In response to the hon. Member for Twickenham, he said:

[Mr. Soley]

"The right to make a peremptory challenge of jurors without giving a reason has existed for the last 600 years. Until recently each defendant was allowed seven peremptory challenges."

He went on to refer to the 1977 Act, and said:

"So long as that law remains as it is, then counsel have a right and duty to use the peremptory challenge as they conscientiously think best for the interests of their clients."

I agree with the Solicitor-General, and I hope that the Minister does as well. For one wild moment I thought that he had been sent out to have tea with the Secretary of State for Defence to work out their policies against the Government. I hope that the Minister will come out strongly in favour of what the Solicitor-General said.

There is a major law and order problem, which to a considerable extent has been created by the Government's policies. They have a disaster on their hands, but there is no way that they can use the police and manipulate them to deal with the social and economic consequences of their policies, and using the jury system as a scapegoat for defendants getting off in court will not be acceptable.

This is a serious matter, and any attempt to continue the erosion of the rights of juries is a retrograde step. We should at least be looking at a balance between the rights of the prosecution and those of the defence. If we can do that, some good will have come out of the debate.

12.27 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. David Mellor): This has been a lively and absorbing debate and it is a genuine pleasure, notwithstanding the hour, to have the opportunity to respond to it.

The hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) has rightly reminded us of the sage words of my hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General, and in particular his remark about the antiquity of the jury challenge. From as far back as 1509 comes a statute that restricts challenges to 20 for each defendant, and we know that, in the Juries Act 1825, provision was made for a right to challenge up to 20 jurors per defendant in a case of murder or felony, and up to 35 challenges for a case of treason.

We also know that changes have been made in this century, so that in 1984 there was a reduction to seven in the number of challenges that each defendant could make without showing cause. Even then, there was pressure to abolish the right altogether, and no one must think that what my hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham (Mr. Jessel) has said is raising a new matter. He speaks as the latest in a long line of hon. Members who have expressed concern about this matter. These points were raised during the course of a debate in 1977 in which my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Warrington, South (Mr. Carlisle) played a leading role. As a consequence of those debates, and the concern that was expressed, the number of peremptory challenges permitted per defendant was reduced from seven to three.

It is important to begin by setting out why peremptory challenge has been permitted for so long in our law. It was very well stated by Mr. Arthur Davidson, who was then the Parliamentary Secretary, Law Officer's Department, in the debate on the Report stage of the Criminal Law Bill in June 1977. I cannot improve upon his formulation. He said:

"If someone, for whatever reason, thinks that a particular person is likely to be prejudiced against him or, for some reason, he feels that that person is not likely to give him a fair hearing, it is right that he should have the right to challenge him."

That is the basis for the peremptory challenge having been permitted. It was put very eloquently by Blackstone, one of the great creators of the English legal system. Many years ago, in justification of the system, he referred to the right to object to a person whose looks the defendant does not like. He said:

"It is . . . a provision full of that tenderness and humanity to prisoners, for which our English laws are justly famous . . . As every one must be sensible, what sudden impressions and unaccountable prejudices we are apt to conceive upon the bare looks and gestures of another; and how necessary it is, that a prisoner (when put to defend his life) should have a good opinion of his jury, the want of which might totally disconcert him; the law wills not that he should be tried by any one man against whom he has conceived a prejudice, even without being able to assign a reason for such his dislike."

The point that Blackstone makes is related to the occasions when almost all felonies were capital offences. Therefore, the right to alter the character of a jury in a capital offence trial might take on a rather different perspective from the right to alter the composition of a jury in a minor matter that is before a Crown court.

May I turn to the 1977 Act and perhaps have the attention of the hon. Member for Hammersmith as I do so, because I am trying to reply to some of his points? Whether or not he agrees with the concern about peremptory challenges—the same is true of my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, North-West (Mr. Ashby)—that concern has never been confined to one side of the House. it has a lengthy provenance and it cannot be dismissed simply as an unfair response to a particularly celebrated acquittal or, even more inappropriately, as an attack upon the jury system.

The hon. Member for Hammersmith may be interested to know that the person who played the leading role in the 1977 changes was somebody whom he would be pleased to hail as a defender of civil liberties in this country. He was a man of great experience in the law and in the Home Office, Alex Lyon, the former Member for York. In the debate he said:

"it seems to be an anomaly that an accused person, or his counsel, should be able to prevent someone from going on a jury simply because, for some visual reason, he seems to the defence to be inappropriate for the particular trial . . . We have to ask ourselves whether in principle it is right. I have argued that it is wrong in principle."

That view, interestingly, was strongly shared by another hon. Member who is no longer a Member of this House; however, he was held in considerable respect as a lawyer of integrity, as I know that my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Warrington, South will agree. That was Mr. Edward Lyons. In that debate he said:

"It is obvious to anyone who goes to the Old Bailey that most of the peremptory challenging that goes on there is based on calculation about whether a particular juror is likely to be helpful or not to the defence."

At a later stage he said:

"At the Old Bailey—although it must be said that many counsel refuse to participate in this practice—the defence appears to operate in favour of whoever is likely to be least intelligent and most anti-establishment. The very young, those without ties and those who look stupid to the challenger are not challenged. But it is expected that the middle-aged may be worried about their houses being burgled and may not be sympathetic, and therefore it is thought best to get them off the jury. Those considerations are not proper. They are designed to achieve not a jury best able to deal with a particular case but, often, one which is least able to deal with the case."

My hon. Friend the Member for Leicestershire, North-West might not agree with that, but please let it not be said that my hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham is off on a mad frolic of his own. This case has a decent provenance and is argued by people whose experience of the law and of practice in the courts is every bit as lengthy and distinguished as that of my hon. Friend the Member for Leicestershire, North-West.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Warrington, South, who in a previous incarnation was Member for Runcorn, made then a speech which reflected the points which he made today. As ever, he was right at the heart of the matter. I cannot improve on his phraseology. He said during the debate in 1977:

"The principle we should work on is that the individual is entitled to be tried by 12 of his fellow citizens, but he has no right to choose who those fellow citizens should be." — [Official Report, Standing Committee E, 28 June 1977; c. 642-9.]

That is an eloquent statement of the case against the peremptory challenge; it deserves not to be satirised and not to be regarded as an attack on the jury system. It should be recognised as a strong, dignified and sensible argument when we consider the detail of our criminal justice system.

In that light, I detain the House about the Cyprus case. I do not know whether what was recounted in the document put before the House is right or wrong. One counsel apparently wanted a young, middle-aged, middle-class jury, another wanted a young, working-class jury. I am not sure what a young, middle-aged person is. It is what a sycophant would call you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Another silk is alleged to have said:"We couldn't improve on fate." That piece of philosophy, no doubt, was worth the fee charged. Determining a person's attitude is like asking how long is a piece of string. We do not want to worry too much about that.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General was right. It is permissible under the rules for this to be done and counsel should not be blamed for doing what the House has said is right, after hearing the opposite arguments. If counsel chose not to exercise that right they would be blamed. But should they be put in their present position?

Anyone reading the document is bound to find it unedifying. We must question whether the practice should be allowed to continue. We must ask whether it contributes to the elevated principles upon which we pride ourselves and our criminal justice system rests. That is a proper question to ask and Government must try to answer it. That is exactly what we are trying to do.

Let us be clear that this is not an attack on the jury system. I do not blame the hon. Member for Hammersmith or my hon. Friend the Member for Leicestershire, North-West for saying that it is, because no less a person than Mr. Bernard Levin, perhaps one of the most noted polemicists, said in The Times the other day:

"I find the increasing pressures on the jury system, of which this particular criticism constitutes only the latest of many, alarming and even sinister."

But surely we show our respect for the jury system by evaluating it and subjecting it to scrutiny, and particularly any aspect which might threaten the reputation and standing of the system. We cherish it by keeping it in good running order, and that means making changes from time to time.

That is exactly what we have done. We radically changed the basis on which jurors are selected less than two decades ago. We widened the base for disqualification for people serving on juries on the basis that those with criminal records should not serve, and in this Parliament we doubled the number of people disqualified from serving on juries.

Mr. Soley rose——

Mr. Mellor: No, only a few minutes remain and I will not give way. The hon. Gentleman overran the time by which I suggested he might finish.

The only way to achieve our aim of preserving the integrity of the system and public confidence in it is to take these issues as they arise and examine them sensibly, and that is what we are doing. The Home Secretary said in the debate on the Address that we shall be asking the Crown prosecution service to gather some factual information on the use of challenges — by the prosecution and the defence—and our research and planning unit will assist in designing the survey and the analysis of the results.

We hope that the Director of Public Prosecutions can make a start on those cases in which he is involved now and that the Crown prosecution service, which comes into force in April in the metropolitan counties and in October in the rest of the country, will continue from there. No survey can be conclusive on all the matters that have been canvassed in this debate, but it can provide a factual base, enabling us to get away from some of the anecdotage which, while in some cases it is illuminating, can in others be misleading.

We must recognise that for those who believe that, as a matter of principle, the defendant should not be able to influence the composition of the jury, no amount of research will make any difference to what is a perfectly honourable and considered position. In 1977, by consent of the whole House, a reduction was made from seven peremptory challenges to three, without any clearly researched basis at that time. There can be no reason why, in the interim, consideration should not be given to a further reduction—from, say, three to one—without any necessity for further research on the matter. The question of an upper limit on total challenges in multihanded cases also arises, as does the position of the prosecution and their right to stand by.

I wish to make it clear that the Government have reached no settled or concluded view on this matter, and it would have been wrong for us to do so at this stage. I agree with my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Warrington, South that this is not a major abuse but a limited area that should be looked at again. I endorse that observation and that, calmly and sensibly, is what we are doing.

No one has any interest in delay, and I assure my hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham that there will be no question of unnecessary delay. I hope that we shall arrive at a conclusion that will commend itself to the whole House on a matter which, if it is interesting enough to arouse the passions that it has aroused tonight, is certainly interesting enough for mature reflection and a considered response in due course.

City of London (Fraud)

12.38 am

Mr. Allan Rogers (Rhondda): Recent happenings in the City of London have given rise to great public concern. What strikes Labour Members so forcefully is that those happenings seem not to have been treated by the Government with the same concern or urgency. Indeed, who believes that we would be having the debate tonight if it were not for the persistence and insistence of my hon. Friends the Members for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) and for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Mr. Sedgemore)? I am pleased to see that they are present.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer has attempted to claim otherwise, and we heard his false claim yet again yesterday. That, of course, was graphically exposed today for its falseness. But, even if his claim were true, it should be part of the Chancellor's duty, and it should not be something extraordinary that he should come to the House and claim bleatingly that he had done his duty. His response should have been normal and ordinary.

Of course the matter that we are dealing with tonight, fraud in the City of London, is extraordinary. It is extraordinary in moral, legal, criminal, financial and social—or perhaps I should say anti-social—terms. It is extraordinary in its scale, in the number of frauds that are perpetrated, in the audacity of the frauds that are perpetrated, and, indeed, in the treachery of the frauds that are perpetrated. We should remember that frauds in the City of London are frauds against the ordinary decent people of Britain who create the wealth of the country and entrust it to the financial institutions that lie within the City of London.

Of late, the Government seem to have an obsession with standards, probably because they do not seem to have many these days. Not long ago we were listening to the leaders of the Conservative party talking about standards in society — the need for more law and order, for hanging terrorists, for birching hunt saboteurs, for flogging miners, and, as Max Hastings said:

"All the other little human touches that would make British civilisation a better and a finer thin . ."

I am glad that the Right-wing extollers of those particular virtues have seen fit to join us, and I greet them.

The one area in which they seem to be lacking in standards is in dealing with their friends in the City of London. The Lord Chancellor and the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry have relatively recently stated that the standards of probity in the City have not declined. This is manifestly not so. Either that shows an appalling lack of judgment on their behalf or a great naivety, or probably both.

One of the things that we have to consider in the background to the frauds is the fact that the City has changed. The image that people often want to put forward these days in defence of their friends in the City of London is that it is filled with good men and true, working hard and honestly for God, Queen and country; people whose word is their bond, who meet together in their clubs or in their old boy reunions and order the world for the benefit of the others. That is the image that they would like us to accept of the City of London — a square mile of integrity and honesty. But, of course, that is a mirage.

That might well have been the position some time ago, but it is an image that bears no relationship to the modern high technology money markets, where vast sums of money are moved and manipulated, and where the measure of success is not integrity but acquisition and greed.

We know that nowadays the City of London is a dynamic institution, in that it is constantly changing. Andrew Philips, a City solicitor, writing in The Observer on 15 December, said:

"With all this, London has become an international crime haven, allowing financial racketeers from mainland Europe and the United States to continue their commodity swindles, advance fee frauds and the like unmolested. But we also have a fraud boom all of our own. Any firm you talk to will have its own in-house tale of woe. But it will probably remain under wraps. Exposing crooked employees in court is a rarity."

That is the City speaking of itself.

In the relatively superficial research that I have done for this debate I have been impressed by the scale and number of frauds perpetrated. [Interruption.] Yes, I am impressed — I came to the subject an innocent. Conservative Members may be experts on fraud, but I am new to the game. I bow to their superior knowledge of the criminal world. In my innocence, I was frightened rather than impressed by the volume and number of frauds perpetrated.

In 1981 the City of London police fraud department had 80 cases under investigation. In 1984 there were 117. New matters recorded were 536 in 1981 and 621 in 1984. In 1981 there were 35 arrests. By 1984 the figure had increased to 77. [HON. MEMBERS: "They are catching them."] Before the Conservatives draw any conclusions from those figures, let them consider the fact that there were 18 Crown court cases in 1981, and only 18 in 1984. If Members reflect on that, they will be led to certain conclusions.

The sums involved are extremely large. Andrew Philips writes:

"A recent study, for example, calculates that British companies are now defrauded of £3 billion and more a year."

An informed insider reckons that the recent reinsurance frauds netted £500 million, and the City of London company fraud squad reports ever increasing numbers of ever larger financial crimes.

The Government's own Inland Revenue sings the same song. Earlier this year Lloyd's agreed to pay the Inland Revenue £42·5 million in respect of liabilities wrongfully secreted by members of Lloyd's. That was a settlement by Lloyd's to buy off the investigators. There are now 77 major fraud cases awaiting trial.

All this is further compounded by

"the bizarre under-resourcing of those responsible for policing the City and bringing its malefactors to book. The Fraud Investigation Group of the DPP, for example, has a paltry qualified staff of 21. By contrast, for the last three years the Government has had 30 Specialist Claims Control Units in the DHSS comprised of 175 staff, chasing welfare chisellers", as Conservative Members would describe them. There are only 21 investigators chasing the £3 billion, but 175 chasing the odd amounts that people might get away with under the welfare system. There is one law for the rich and another for the poor—steal £20 from the DHSS and one ends up in gaol, but steal £20 million from the City and one will end up in the Cayman Islands. That is the Conservatives' attitude to their friends in the City.

Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark (Birmingham, Selly Oak): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Rogers: I want to finish, as a large number of Members want to speak tonight.

There is only ruthless severity for those whom the Government push into the ground, but for the Government's friends—the offshore dealers, the greasy manipulators, the property sharks—there is only laxity. I asked the Library today to provide details of instances of fraud on the stock exchange, the commodity markets, Lloyd's and banking. I was given a large sheaf of papers and told, "I have only gone back a short time, Mr. Rogers, as there were so many." I have with me the details of the frauds that have taken place during the past year, and any Conservative member can inspect them if he so wishes.

Mr. Patrick Nicholls (Teignbridge) rose——

Mr. Rogers: City fraud is not a new phenomenon. The Opposition have always known that corruption has existed in the City, and it is a shame that it has not been dealt with previously, but in recent years this problem—as with all law and order problems under this Government—has exploded in size. Getting near the truth of City corruption is difficult and has been difficult. The old boy network prevented it in previous days, when it was called the guarding of institutional solidarity, and today's instant electronic manipulations make it much more difficult to detect fraud.

There has been an enormous increase in City activity. It is no longer a square mile of honesty and integrity. Reputations mean nothing to people whose God is money, who travel fast and who can easily put their money and that of others beyond the law. — [Interruption.] They are aided and encouraged by Conservative Members who mutter from sedentary positions and by the quick buck, free market amorality of this Government.

Yesterday my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-East (Mr. Leighton) asked the Chancellor to explain where market forces end and fraud begins. To his great shame, the Chancellor replied:

"If the hon. Gentleman does not know that, he is not fit to be a Member of the House". — [Official Report, 17 December 1985; Vol. 89, c. 162.]

We could well say that of the Chancellor and of his actions over the last six to nine months. Indeed, I honestly believe that he gave that answer because, like his hon. Friends, he did not know the difference between fraud and free market forces. He does not know where one begins and the other finishes. He does not know the difference between fraud and an insatiable greed——

Mr. Tim Smith (Beaconsfield): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The suggestion that the Chancellor does not know the difference between what is fraud and what is not fraud is surely totally unacceptable, and I suggest that the hon. Gentleman should withdraw that remark at once.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): I am listening very carefully, but I have not heard any personal accusation against the Chancellor.

Mr. Rogers: I am pleased that the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) defends the Chancellor. I do not know whether he has a particular interest in doing so, but we shall have to look into that. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman does not know the difference between fraud and insatiable greed——

Mr. Richard Ottaway (Nottingham, North): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is the hon. Gentleman suggesting that Conservative Members are party to some of these frauds?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: We must get on with the debate. I am listening very carefully. All hon. Members know that personal accusations are not allowed, and I have not heard any so far.

Mr. Tim Smith: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The hon. Gentleman said that I do not understand the difference between what is fraud and what is not fraud. I am not prepared to accept that, and I ask him to withdraw.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I simply heard the hon. Member for Rhondda (Mr. Rogers) suggest that the hon. Gentleman did not understand it. He was not suggesting that the hon. Gentleman was guilty of any kind of fraud. Hon. Members should not be too sensitive. Let us get on with the debate.

Mr. Rogers: I would hate to say, "Methinks he doth protest too much". I have merely said that Conservative Members do not know the difference between fraud, an insatiable greed as practised in the City of London, and, as Andrew Philips said

"a mechanistic commitment to the free market" which

"is the perfect anaesthetic to moral disquiet. Some find it difficult to know where market forces stop and illegality begins. One opportunity can look very much like another, including the opportunity to escape the UK tax net. Hiding capital abroad is now widespread, as is juggling with the rules relating to tax residence and overseas earnings."

Many people in the City do not want to know the difference, and on occasions neither do some hon. Members.

In the City today, straight dealing is being sacrificed on the altar of competition. The Government, the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the leader of the Conservative party, with their hypocritical cant about moral standards, do not know the difference either.

Mr. Nicholls rose——

Mr. Rogers: The Lord Chancellor, Lord Hailsham, stated last week:

"The bottom seems to have dropped out of morality".

Yes, indeed, my Lord Chancellor, it has, and especially in your party, and especially with your Ministers. What is grossly unfair——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must not accuse Ministers, and he certainly must not accuse the Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Rogers: I am not quite sure when we can condemn Ministers for their laxity. All I said was that the Lord Chancellor said last week:

"The bottom seems to have dropped out of morality".

Some of the responses that we have had suggest that it has dropped out fairly close to home.

What is grossly unfair in this situation is that the wealth creators — the ordinary decent people in factories, mines, shops, offices, and also in the City of London— are being ripped off by the friends of the Tory party, who scuttle off to their tax havens to enjoy their illicit wealth. Considerable sums are involved, and it is no good Conservative Members scoffing at the huge sums of which the country is being defrauded.

The City of London must give a lead. It should purge itself and re-establish its reputation. Unfortunately, the Government seem not to want to come to grips with the problem, and foolishly and naively believe that a system of self-regulation is enough. I said yesterday that the Government's proposals would be seen by many to smack of setting a thief to catch a thief. There are many unanswered questions in relation to yesterday's proposals and the Financial Services Bill which is to be published tomorrow. I should like the Minister to answer one of them.

[Mr. Rogers]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, the hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard), who is in charge of the Financial Services Bill, is a clever young lawyer. He is evidently quite a rich one, too, for he admits to being in membership of five Lloyd's syndicates. Lloyd's is not, however, covered by his Bill. It is not, the Minister says, an appropriate vehicle. Perhaps in the reply to the debate we can be told what would be an appropriate vehicle, or when the Government intend to find an appropriate vehicle to regulate Lloyd's.

Many people would ask whether the Parliamentary Secretary is an appropriate Minister to bring in the regulation; whether he should be responsible for regulating his friends and colleagues, or his erstwhile friends and colleagues. How can Conservative Members talk about the probity of Lloyd's after recent disclosures? To argue that most other financial centres are more corrupt than the City of London, or that there have always been rotten apples in the City of London, is not an answer.

The debate is vital for the interests of Britain. The collapse of the integrity of and trust in the City of London is incalculable in relation to the economy. The debate on whether there should be self-regulation or legislative control could now well be sterile. We cannot legislate for an institution where the underlying moral foundations are crumbling. The opportunities for crime in today's financial bazaar are immense. Laws may not be enough. Perhaps nothing short of a moral reformation can prevent the City from drowning in its own excesses.

12.59 am

Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark (Birmingham, Selly Oak): This is an important occasion, because it is the beginning of a debate that will continue for many months. In July 1983, in the first debate on this issue, I said that I thought that this would be one of the most important matters that we would consider. The City of London is one of those great important institutions not just for the few to make fortunes and certainly not just for the few to make illegal and immoral fortunes—it is a great earner of capital for the growth of this country.

I deprecate the grapeshot technique that is being adopted. It is not helpful. It is based not on evidence but on the belief that, if enough barrels are fired off, a crook will be hit. It is like some of the wild accusations made against the Governor of the Bank of England, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor or my hon. and learned Friend the Under-Secretary of State — the Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard). That is not helpful to the debate. It will not be helpful in regulating the City. It diverts attention from the fact that the changes that will occur in the City with the big bang and the financial conglomerates that will be formed will require severe regulation or there will be large-scale fraud. The stock exchange recognises that.

I mention one point that has not been mentioned in talk about people being employed to regulate fraud and to limit the possibility of fraud. Forty-five members of the stock exchange are employed in a surveillance department, which is separate and separately administered, to look at fraud and movements in share prices—not as they are reported to them but as they come over on the screens —to ascertain whether there are illegal dealings. If there is fraud in a business where the turnover through the stock exchange alone is £350 billion, that is wrong and it should be investigated. The people charged should be sent to prison. If there is one thing that the Americans have over us, it is not the Securities and Exchange Commission itself, which is a very heavy bureaucracy, but the fact that they are faster at punishing malefactors. Since 1980 the stock exchange has conducted 278 investigations, 89 of which have resulted in information being sent to the Department of Trade and Industry, resulting in only five prosecutions. One cannot help thinking that nothing would concentrate integrity more than mounting some of these prosecutions faster and more thoroughly and meting out the right sentences.

The hon. Member for Rhondda (Mr. Rogers) made it sound as though making a profit was quasi-evil.

Mr. Rogers: No.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: The implication was that somehow profit was evil. If there were not profits and people who wanted to use the capital structure, all our constituents would be much poorer because thousands of millions of pounds are added to this country's wealth every year — not through the malefactors but through the majority of honest people. The trade unions invest hundreds of millions of pounds each year on behalf of their members so that their members get better pensions and benefits, and it is right and proper that they should do so.

There is no doubt that the past of Lloyd's gives rise to dismay and not merely concern. The phrase "A1 at Lloyd's" has taken on a meaning that the great majority of its members would not want. It was excellent that Ian Hay Davison was appointed director-general, and it gives rise to ominous concern that the chairman of Lloyd's, Mr. Miller, who himself might be busy answering questions, or should be in due course, said in getting rid of Mr. Hay Davison that he wished to be the Prime Minister of Lloyd's. I wish to cast no reflection upon my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister—on the contrary—but we all know of the power that Prime Ministers have. I believe that the Bank of England and the Government wanted Mr. Hay Davison to be in the end the true director-general of Lloyd's, to ensure that it was run properly and not by those who, by jove, were pretty close to getting their fingers in the jar.

If a director-general is appointed to Lloyd's, it should be with the advice and consent of the Department of Trade and Industry. The Government have a presence in these matters and no Government can say that there can be entire self-regulation. It is not possible to have entire self-regulation, but it is possible to have self-regulation with the provision that there shall be a Government presence in those who are appointed to top jobs and, even more important, to those who are dis-appointed from them. The more effective people like Mr. Hay Davison are, the better for Lloyd's and the country. It strikes me that the more effective he became, the more some people wanted to get shot of him. That was bad for the City and for Lloyd's, and I think that it was bad for the Government.

I made another suggestion to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who said, in his sweet way, that I usually meant well. I think that he meant well in saying that I meant well. I say in no patronising sense to my betters that the Department of Trade and Industry, or the Treasury, cannot say that the Bank of England is enough. These are matters that I hope we can discuss when we consider the Financial Services Bill, but the Bank of England is not enough.

My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer did not seem to like it yesterday—he may have been tired—when I said that no Government can wash their hands of these matters. In the end, good or bad washes up to the steps of the House. These matters are the concern of Government; if they are not, why are we discussing them now?

I still believe that taking people willy-nilly out of the City, often those of tender years, to advise and help is not enough. They will return to the big pool. I say on a subliminal basis that those who are taken from the City and who are likely to return to it are not as likely to be as even-handed as those who may come from the City and not thereafter return to it. That is why I say that it would be a good thing if about five people who have done great service and are of great probity—in spite of what has been said, the City abounds with more people of great probity that it does with villains—should be appointed advisers to the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. It does not matter whether the advice comes from accountants, bankers or brokers. The five should be nearing the end of their business careers so that they have considerable experience of the City. They should be appointed for five to seven years, so that they are thereafter retired from the City. They should be able to call for all the evidence and all the papers, talk to anyone they wish and advise the Secretary of State that all is well. That would be a small price to pay for the Secretary of State to have his own advisory set-up—then there would be self-regulation, which, in the end, would work better.

There is certainly concern about the system, and the small number of cases always attract great publicity. But I genuinely believe that what the City does for this country is good rather than evil. It does not abound in corrupt people. One of the few sound statements of lawyers is that justice should not only be done but be seen to be done. If we get the Bill right, the country will benefit and so will the integrity of this House and the City.

1.10 am

Mr. Bryan Gould (Dagenham): The hon. Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Mr. Beaumont-Dark) was right to remind us that the first of our debates on the important question of regulating the City was in July 1983. I think that he would join me in expressing a debt of gratitude to my hon. Friend the Member for Rhondda (Mr. Rogers) for giving us another opportunity to debate the issue, especially—I was about to say on the eve, but it is more appropriate to say on the morning—of publication of the Financial Services Bill. I have no doubt that the points made in this debate will be echoed in our debates over the coming months.

This debate takes place against the background—even in the foreground—of a rising tide of concern about the extent of fraud in the City. It is right to pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Mr. Sedgemore), who has done so much to promote this issue, to focus political attention on it, to raise the level of political interest in it and, in short, to put it on the front pages. The Prime Minister, the chairman of the stock exchange, the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and many other luminaries are now queueing day by day to assure the British public and the House of Commons that they too are determined to stamp out fraud in the City. That is all to the good and we wait to see what actions will be taken to follow those brave statements.

It may be true that City fraud is the flavour of the month, as one Sunday paper put it last week, but the grounds for concern go back a long way. We should remember that it was in 1981 that Professor Gower was asked to begin his report on City fraud. After all, that report was stimulated by a rash of fraud. The Roskill committee was set up at the end of 1983 precisely because there was growing concern to get prosecutions and convictions in cases of fraud.

While my hon. Friend the member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch has made skilful use of parliamentary privilege, the strength of the case against what the City is up to at present, the strength of the case against the failure to bring people to justice, is such that we do not need the protection of parliamentary privilege. A simple statement of the facts is quite enough to explain why there is that sense of outrage, of anxiety, almost of incredulity at the fact that people who are committing crime on a massive scale have so far escaped without criminal penalty.

I need not weary the House with a catalogue that will be repeated time and again—a catalogue that inevitably starts with Lloyd's, with the frauds committed in famous cases such as the PCW syndicates. Those frauds accounted for tens of millions of pounds—one is tempted to say hundreds of millions of pounds.

The scale of the offences being committed can best be illustrated if we remind ourselves that individual fraudsters in some of those syndicates got away with as much money as was raised worldwide by Live Aid for the starving people of Africa. One or two people at a time in Lloyd's got away with that amount of money.

People are entitled to say that something has gone very badly wrong, not just because people were able to commit offences of that magnitude, undetected, but because they committed them and escaped without even being the subject of criminal charges. That is an astonishing state of affairs.

I can run through the rest of the catalogue quickly. The stock exchange is mercifully free of major frauds, with the exception of the Halliday-Simpson case in 1982. It is making an effort to deal with fraud and concedes that there is a rash of minor fraud that it hopes it is dealing with effectively. The commodities markets have also seen cases of fraud, with people getting away with tens of millions of pounds, escaping the jurisdiction and still not being brought back to face charges. There are also the banks; my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch has referred incessantly to that matter. The Johnson Matthey Bankers case shows that even in the banking sector, fraud is by no means a stranger, and can reach substantial proportions.

Let us be clear that when we talk about frauds and scandals, we are talking about real criminal offences—thefts and frauds which, in any other context, would be immediately recognised as criminal offences of the same severity as muggings, robberies and various other criminal offences that we are more familiar with and used to dealing with.

[Mr. Bryan Gould]

Every pound of the hundreds of millions of pounds that have been misappropriated is money that belonged to somebody else. It is real money. That pound is just as real as the pound that the pickpocket takes from someone's pocket in Oxford street. It is sometimes instinctively felt among City people that somehow City fraud is less serious; it is not real money; somehow it has been conjured up out of thin air. It is real money, and those are real criminal offences.

We have in office a Government who have made great play of their stance on law and order. We know that in the realm of what one might call ordinary crime, the programme of law and order has been notably ineffective. There has been an explosion of crime, but at least in that area, the Government have said that they are concerned about it, are determined to devote more resources to its detection and prosecution, and are unhappy about the current situation. However, what has been largely unremarked by the Government until recently has been the greatest crime explosion — what Max Hastings called pin-stripe fraud.

It is noticeable that there has been no talk of short, sharp shocks and all sorts of other severe penalties, new resources and so on. I make it clear that I have been taking up the issue and writing to Ministers, Law Officers as well as Ministers in the Department of Trade and Industry, over the past two years. While there have been frequent expressions of concern at the fact that prosecutions have not been brought, the emphasis has always been on the great difficulties, problems and obstacles. That is not the same language as we hear about other criminal offences.

Many people will pause for a moment and ask: how is it that those insuperable problems seem to present themselves in the case of massive fraud in the City, yet in the case of social security fraud, which is no less a fraud —I am not making a distinction on that ground—they are much more minor? In those cases, there is no difficulty in bringing prosecutions and finding the resources to bring criminals before the courts.

My mind goes back two or three years to the famous instance in Oxford when hundreds of police rounded up 1,000 social security claimants, held them in detention for hours on end, grilled them and finally produced a handful of prosecutions and convictions of people who were among the most vulnerable in society, who did not have a roof over their heads. If the Government can mount such an operation against those people, we demand more effective action against City criminals.

What has been happening in the City is an affront to public opinion and to public morality. It is also very bad for the City. I think that I carry the hon. Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak with me on that. It is in the City's interests that these matters be cleaned up. It is in the City's interests that we have some prosecutions. Nothing will induce the re-establishment of that sense of integrity faster than the sight of one or two people going off for long prison sentences. It is also bad for the economy because, if we have an economy in which money is sloshing around and it is possible to make off with tens of millions of pounds without penalty, the result is a distortion of economic activity — a diversion of resources and energies. That cannot be good for the economy.

What has gone wrong? What has produced this rising level of fraud and therefore the rising level of anxiety? The mechanisms and instruments available for detection are simply inadequate for preparing cases for prosecution. It is unrealistic to expect 21 policemen to unravel the complicated affairs, some years later, of highly skilful fraudsters. As a result of that inability to deal with such cases, we are rapidly developing a reputation, which is now spreading worldwide—it is certainly being picked up in West Germany—as the fraud centre of the world. There have been recent press reports that the West Germans are astonished that some of their nationals have been the victims of bogus commodity dealers working in London, yet the police in the City cannot be persuaded to take any notice of those cases.

The vice-chairman of the Conservative party enlightened us again today. He has been told—he has some experience of this—that only frauds involving more than £10 million are to be investigated because the resources to consider smaller ones do not exist. If that is true—I would be the last person to suggest that there is any doubt about the veracity and accuracy of what the vice-chairman of the Conservative party says—it is a truly astonishing situation on which the Minister must comment. Perhaps he should persuade some of the Law Officers to set the record straight.

We await the Roskill committee, which might ease matters in some respects. We should be clear, however, that Roskill will help us, if at all, only if the matter has been prepared for prosecution and brought to court. There might be changes which make it easier to get convictions. We are concerned about the ease with which it is possible to detect such crimes and to enable the Director of Public Prosecutions in this case—but perhaps we should be thinking of a different prosecuting authority—to prepare a case that has a chance of success.

The second thing that has gone wrong, as shown all too clearly by Lloyd's and JMB, is that the supervisory authorities have been lax and inadequate. They are confronted with the need to exercise ex post facto supervision, so they also find it extraordinarily difficult, given the methods of supervision available to them, to monitor what is going on and to detect what has happened. All too often, by the time they discover what has gone on, the criminals have flown the roost and escaped jurisdiction. With JMB, it is clear that the Bank of England had to rely on utterly unreliable instruments. The Bank of England is entirely dependent on the audit process. The auditors, who are appointed by the shareholders of the company being audited, have a duty to report to those shareholders. They will resist any attempt to be persuaded to report to the supervisory authority.

A small step was taken in the White Paper announced yesterday, but we are still a long way from a proper system of supervision. For the Bank of England a statutory audit commission with a distinct and separate function would be required, so that there could be no conflict of interest or unwilling conscripts, and the statutory auditors would have a clear duty to blow the whistle to the supervisors when they saw that things were going wrong.

Another factor militates against any effective supervision and adequate detection of fraud; that is that the standards of disclosure among financial institutions are too low. They lag substantially behind what is now the norm in most countries, particularly in the United States. Financial institutions simply do not publish enough information, and what is published is not sufficiently up to date to enable investors to make proper judgments. We know that the accounts for Lloyd's are sometimes five years out of date by the time they are subject to scrutiny.

The rules have hardly ever been applied to companies. Nearly 400,000 companies have not complied with their statutory obligations to submit the basic documentation to Companies house. That must be tightened up. If we are to have effective supervision, we need that information. That will become even more important in the City of the future where the maximum transparency will be at the heart of any effective provision against conflicts of interest. Unless we have that maximum transparency, and unless the City as a whole adjusts and adapts itself to that new requirement, we can kiss goodbye to any effective regulation, and expect a further rash of frauds.

The real problems have arisen, not just because there are a few crooks at the margins. Wherever large sums are handled, there will be criminals on the edges. It is important that there are rules to detect them quickly, and penalties adequate to deter them in future. But that is not the essence of what has gone wrong in the City.

What went wrong at Lloyd's, for example, was not just that one or two people introduced a few criminal practices, got caught and fled, but that the reinsurance deals, the offshore arrangements to avoid taxes and the baby syndicates were embraced by the establishment. The establishment was tainted by those practices and lost the ability to make the distinction between what was acceptable and what was not. The frauds are the most obvious symptoms of what has gone wrong in the City — the difficulty of distinguishing on any objective criterion what outside people would regard as acceptable.

That factor imposes an enormous obligation on the Government, and they must grapple with it. It is not just Lloyd's. Many people in the City still do not fully understand what is required of them now, and what will be required of them in future. Many people still do not accept the distinction between trading in a professional capacity, for which they charge fees and commissions, and trading on their own account. Too often the distinction is blurred, and conflicts of interest arise. Those problems will become worse in future when the old institutional safeguards have been swept away. The opportunities for conflicts of interest to arise will be enormous. It will not be good enough for the City to soldier on on the basis of the current practice, because the current practice is unacceptable.

For example, when British Telecom shares were issued, several aspects of the flotation were unacceptable. By implication, the Government have agreed that they were unacceptable, because they have changed the rules. In the future, the rules will preclude what happened in the case of British Telecom. When firms such as Kleinwort, Benson, which was charging the Government a large fee for advising them and helping them to fix the share price, and many other firms acting in an underwriting capacity realised that the price had been fixed too low and that an immense capital profit could be made overnight, they threw away and conveniently forgot the distinction between the role that they had undertaken to fulfil, for which they had privileged access to shares—there was no limit on the shares in which they could deal—and their ability to deal in shares on their personal accounts. There are many reports—some have been made to me—of City firms which dealt in the shares on their own account, and which gave those shares to their staff, distributed them to bonus funds, or gave them to favoured clients and friends of the firm. That is unacceptable.

One commodity firm, Rudolph Wolfe, took 1·3 million BT shares. I do not know what it did with the bulk of the shares, but it gave 20,000 to each head of department and 5,000 to each dealer. That is the confusion that leads to moral uncertainty, and I believe that it happened on a very large scale.

So far, the Government have refused to examine such cases. One case is with the Director of Public Prosecutions and another case was made public through the efforts of a journalist, but the Government have been extremely unwilling to provide the information on which we could make a proper judgement on how widespread the practice was. If the Government are to be regarded as treating the matter seriously, they must consider such cases so that we can clear the air, and so that we know that it will not happen in the future and that the Government are determined to deal with such practices.

I conclude by saying that the acid test for the Government will arise later today and in the months which follow as we consider the Financial Services Bill. It is one thing for the Government to say that they are worried about City fraud. We now need a determined and serious attempt to put in place the rules, penalties and remedies which will tackle City fraud. The Government have that opportunity, as the Minister well knows, in the Financial Services Bill to be published today.

The Bill must give the clearest possible statutory framework of rules, the clearest possible powers of enforcement, and the clearest possible remedies and penalties. If it does not, we are entitled to conclude that the Government are not serious about City fraud, that they retain their unfortunate attachment to their friends in the City which clouds their judgment. The Minister must say tonight whether the Bill will meet those criteria. If it does not, we shall give it a rough passage.

The Government say that the Bill will not embrace Lloyd's. On that basis, I presume that the Minister believes that he can handle the passage of the Bill, because it does not involve a conflict of interest, given that he is a member of Lloyd's syndicates.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: Nonsense.

Mr. Gould: I shall ask the Minister now, and I hope that he will answer now or when he replies: if the Bill were amended so that it brought Lloyds into the regulatory framework, would he regard his membership of Lloyd's syndicates as a ground for disqualifying him from proceeding with it? If he were to answer yes, as I hope he would, he should quite logically be prepared to say that the decision whether the Bill should embrace Lloyd's should be outside his scope, for the same reason. If he is not prepared to say that, we see, in the person of the Minister, the very conflict that has been bedevilling the City in many of its operations, and which is the cause of so many of its problems.

Mr. Peter Thurnham (Bolton, North-East): Is the hon. Gentleman suggesting that the previous Labour Prime Minister was incapable of making judgments on agriculture because he was also a farmer?

Mr. Gould: No, because, as the hon. Gentleman will appreciate with a moment's reflection, agriculture is a matter of public policy, and Lloyd's is the subject of a private Act, and it is a specific interest for which, if we were to legislate, we should have to use the procedure of a hybrid Bill, which is one of the arguments against doing so. That shows us that dealing with Lloyd's is different. It is not a matter of general public policy but of specific interests. As a member of a Lloyd's syndicate, the Minister is as much disqualified from dealing with Lloyd's as he would be if he were dealing in a company in which he held shares. The Minister is able to defend himself, and deny the statement if he wishes to do so.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): The hon. Gentleman spoke about hybridity. Would that not in itself be a good reason for not including Lloyd's in the Bill? If he had any reasons for wanting another Bill to deal with Lloyd's, procedures are available to deal with those questions. He has given the answer to the problem.

Mr. Gould: It is not my purpose to argue that dealing with Lloyd's would involve problems of hybridity. I simply raised that point to show that Lloyd's is not a matter of public policy but one of specific interest, and I repeat that if the Minister is a member of one Lloyd's syndicate, or more, he is in the same position as that of a director of a company that is the subject of private legislation.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Michael Howard): I shall explain my position fully in my speech, but so that the House does not waste any more time on this argument, I make it clear that I am no longer a member of any syndicate at Lloyd's.

Mr. Gould: I am grateful to the Minister for that reply, and I look forward to an explanation.

This point raises general questions. Is the seriousness of purpose that the Government proclaim and profess to be matched by the provisions of the Financial Services Bill? I fear from what I have heard in advance that the Bill will not do that, and will be deficient in the clarity and directness that will be needed to regulate the City of the future and to exclude fraud as far as that is possible. If the Bill does not do that, the Government will have missed an opportunity and failed an obligation. I hope that the Minister will take that point seriously, and that during the debates on the Bill, we can persuade him to strengthen it so that it will achieve its purpose.

1.38 am

Mr. Tim Smith (Beaconsfield): The hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) was right to draw attention to the fact that it was as long ago as 1981 that my right hon. Friend the Member for Shropshire, North (Mr. Biffen), as Secretary of State for Trade, asked Professor Gower to conduct his review into investor protection, in response to a number of frauds, including the Norton-Warburg scandal. It was also as long ago as 1983 that Lord Roskill was asked to look at the conduct of fraud trials. This gives the lie to the suggestion that this subject has somehow been raised by the hon. Members for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) and for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Mr. Sedgemore), when many right hon. and hon. Members have been concerned about the regulation of the financial services for a number of years.

We are concerned because of the growing scale of the problem. The figures speak for themselves. In 1981 the Metropolitan police and the City of London fraud squad together considered 378 cases of fraud, involving £262 million. By the end of 1984 that figure had risen to 711 cases, involving £776 million. That seems to refute Mr. Jeffrey Archer's suggestion today that they investigate only cases involving more than £10 million. If there were 711 cases involving £776 million, the average appears to be about £1 million. We know that there are a number of cases involving very large sums, but there are also quite a large number of cases involving sums smaller than £1 million. Mr. Archer's suggestion has already been denied by the police. They are obviously in a strong position to comment on these matters.

Ernst and Whinney, the firm of chartered accountants, has recently undertaken research on this issue. It conducted a survey and established that the average company loss through fraud each year — not just in financial service companies, but in business generally — was £6,100. Therefore, it is possible that the total loss each year is about £2·75 billion. Clearly, therefore, there is agreement about the scale of the problem that we face.

The hon. Member for Dagenham referred to the attitude of the public to fraud. It is not just that City people have adopted a slightly different approach to this issue compared with other categories of criminal offence. The point was well put at a recent conference on the subject by Detective Superintendent Perry of the City of London police, who said:

"Unlike serious personal crimes like murder and rape and organised crimes of violence such as armed robbery, fraud cannot be called a high profile crime. Neither can it be compared with crimes which have serious personal impact like domestic burglary which has a profound effect on the victim regardless of the value of any property stolen. Indeed not only is most fraud low profile, it is even considered by many people to be 'clean', provided the victim is an organisation rather than the man in the street. In short by a combination of lack of violence or other personal loss and the fact that the aggrieved is often a large commercial organisation fraud manages to hide behind every other crime that plagues society today."

I suggest that public attitudes generally to fraud are different from public attitudes to other crimes, and this is a matter for concern. It starts at the lowest level, with cheating on expenses. It goes right the way up, from cheating on perhaps a few pence or a few pounds on an expense claim, to the multi-million pound thefts that have been discussed today.

The House has expressed concern about the level of the resources that are made available both to the police and to the Director of Public Prosecutions. There are 200 detectives in London, both in the Metropolitan police and in the City of London police, who are investigating fraud. They are clearly stretched in trying to deal with the number of cases that we know they have been asked to investigate.

The Assistant Director of Public Prosecutions, Mr. Wood, addressed a conference which I attended in the summer on this subject. He related the background and said:

"When I first joined the Director of Public Prosecutions we had one man only dealing with fraud in London and in the Provinces. Prosecuting fraud cases was part of our general work. But as fraud becomes more prevalent, more international, more sophisticated we came to the conclusion that a separate division dealing with fraud in London and the Provinces was essential. Thus some ten years ago we created such a division under the control of an Assistant Director with five professional staff and non-professional support. A few years later we had to increase numbers and make two divisions, one for London and one for the Provinces. Now with the advent of the Fraud Investigation Groups we have three divisions with a total of fifteen professional staff and three accountants. Such is the volume of work that they can barely cope and will have to be augmented."

Those figures — three accountants and 15 professional staff — speak for themselves. It is only recently that accountants have been recruited.

I have here something else that Mr. Wood had to say about the support given by accountants. He said:

"We now have three accountants on our staff. When they first arrived I told them for the first few weeks they wouldn't be too busy and that until their work built up they would have time to do my tax returns. In reality after a few weeks they were busy and they are now having difficulty in keeping up. Such is their value that I cannot see how we ever managed to do without them. My tax return I regret has had to do without the benefit of an accountant's advice."

It is essential that the number of DPP staff concerned with fraud is increased substantially. We must devote resources to that.

There are other ways in which the accountancy profession can help. Voluntary methods might help, but professional, perhaps newly retired, accountants might assist. We must ensure that the resources are available.

The investigation of fraud requires special skills, as does other crime. All those involved in trying to deal with fraud are in difficulties, because fraud is so complex. Even judges have difficulty. That is why the institute to which I belong recently organised a series of seminars for High Court judges, designed to explain some of the devices used. Such seminars could be extended to instruct Department of Trade and Industry officials, fraud investigation groups, and so on.

Lawyers are used to presenting a case orally, without any support, in court. This might emerge in the Roskill report. Courts are out of date in that respect. If court procedure were modernised, and if prosecuting counsel were allowed to use audio-visual equipment to explain the complex structure of a group of companies used to perpetrate a fraud, that would be a great help to both judge and jury. I hope that the Roskill report addresses that issue.

The resources problem is both qualitative and quantitative. It is essential to have the right number of people with the right skills. As I said to the Economic Secretary the other day, it is important that investigators have the necessary powers to obtain evidence. The Police and Criminal Evidence Act, which comes into force on 1 January, might help. The real problem relates to overseas evidence and the difficulty of obtaining it. It is difficult to persuade witnesses from overseas to attend court to give evidence. There is no simple answer. The matter needs careful thought.

Reporting fraud is essential. We must distinguish between employee fraud and management fraud. Directors and management are under no obligation to report a fraud. As a result, a large proportion of employee fraud remains unreported.

My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard) said in a recent speech:

"If top management set standards of personal conduct which discourage irregularities and take quick and decisive action when irregularities are brought to their notice, then fraud will have less chance to take root. But if top management are equivocal on fraud and fail to act when cases of suspected fraud are brought to their notice, dishonest employees will take advantage of the situation."

That is the present position. When employee fraud is brought to management's notice, the normal procedure is to get rid of the employee as quickly as possible and to take no further action. Perhaps we should change the law and place an obligation on directors and managers to report fraud.

What should we do about management fraud? My hon. and learned Friend said that managers themselves could not deal with management fraud but that there was a special obligation on the auditors of companies. I agree that the auditors should report management fraud to the regulatory authorities.

There is the problem of client confidentiality, about which we have heard in the context of banking supervision, and we shall hear about it again in the context of building societies and in the context of the Financial Services Bill. Lord Benson said in a recent report that the auditor should first inform his client. There are two difficulties in that proposition, the first being to question who is the auditor's client. It is not the management of the company. The auditor's client is the shareholders of the company. That is the distinction which, I am afraid, sometimes my profession has difficulty in making. If that is the distinction, the question of confidentiality is not so important because we are talking about reporting to the shareholders, and that boils down to the public interest — reporting to the public.

The second difficulty is that if one tells one's client that one has it in mind tomorrow to arrange a meeting with the regulatory authorities about his suspected fraud, one will go to the meeting and one's client will go to Heathrow. I agree that it would be nothing less than a tip-off, so the auditor must in such circumstances report the fraud without informing his client, but that will have to be a statutory obligation.

We have heard much in the debate about self-regulation, but what the Government will propose in the Financial Services Bill will not be just self-regulation. It will be a mixture of self-regulation reinforced by a statutory framework. In the end we shall have to decide what to do if a self-regulatory organisation refuses to change its rules so that those rules are consistent with the principles set down in the Bill and the conduct of business rules published by the Securities Investment Board.

While we have not yet seen the Bill, I understand that it will say that the only sanction open to the SIB in those circumstances will be to derecognise the SRO. That is all very well, but there will have to a specific power to require an SRO to change its rules to be consistent with the conduct of business rules and the principles in the Bill.

If, as I hope, the House agrees on that, we shall have not self-regulation, but qualified self-regulation; qualified by the fact that there will be a statutory back-up with an ability to interfere. That, in these circumstances, is only to recognise the limitations of self-regulation. Perhaps one cannot expect people to go too far, which brings me back to what I said about auditors. I do not think that we can persuade the accountancy profession to change its rules, and if we cannot do that, we must change the law—that is clearly the alternative — so that there is no doubt about the position.

It is not reasonable to leave this to self-regulation, and I hope that the Minister will consider my two proposals for ensuring that suspected fraud is reported. That is as essential as the full investigation if fraudsters are to be brought to book. We need, in summary, adequate resources, adequate powers for the investigators and an obligation on directors and auditors to report suspected fraud.

1.54 am

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): I wish at the outset to pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Rhondda (Mr. Rogers) for initiating this debate about the City, Johnson Matthey Bankers, Lloyd's, the stock exchange and the whole question of fraud. He brought to the attention of the House some interesting facts that he had obtained — not from any Marxist periodicals but from the House of Commons Library—about the amount of fraud that had gone undetected and the millions of pounds that had been lost as a result. That there is fraud has been established without doubt by my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Mr. Sedgemore) and accepted even by Conservative Members.

The City is a powerful lobby. We were discussing lobbies yesterday — little lobbies, like the Channel tunnel lobby. They are little in comparison. The Channel tunnel is a once-and-for-all project. Build the tunnel and a lot of people make money. Tory Members make a few bob on the side—£2,000. Then they move on to another lobby. But this lobby is the most powerful that gets into the House of Commons. There is no question at all about that.

The hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) is part of that powerful lobby. That is why he can speak so well about the City. He knows it inside out. One just has to look in the Register of Members' Interests. He is parliamentary consultant to the National Association of Security Dealers and Investment Managers. He ought to know a bit about it. He is parliamentary consultant to the County bank. That is one of the little banks — perhaps a little bank like Johnson Matthey. I am not too sure of its size. So he is well versed in it.

One out of eight Tory Members, roughly speaking, are members of Lloyd's. That is discounting all those who are names. The Minister said that he was not a member of a syndicate, but I wonder whether he is a name. Perhaps he will tell us that. My barrister friend tells me that there is a significant difference. Perhaps he will explain it.

The power of the City finds a great presence in the House of Commons, and, for that matter, in the House of Lords as well. So is it any wonder that from time to time a few Labour Members decide that the thing smells like a sewer and that we ought to expose it?

It is at this point that we should pay a compliment to my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch for filling in a lot of gaps. Although many of us were arguing about the state of Johnson Matthey and Lloyd's for many months, my hon. Friend managed to insert into the gaps, as a result of the meticulous methods that he used, some of the names—the pack drill. He taught us all that what we could smell in the sewer of the City was something that was more tangible by explaining in more detail exactly who was up to their neck in the Johnson Matthey fraud. More lately, as he explained in the House recently, he wanted to get the Johnson Matthey affair off his back because he was entering into the arena of Lloyd's. He has done a wonderful job on that as well.

I want to refer to what the Chancellor of the Exchequer said yesterday. When he accused some of my right hon. and hon. Friends in the previous Labour Government of not doing the greatest job of all time in the post secondary banking crisis, inadvertently, I suppose — he probably did not realise it — he was admitting fault himself. He was saying that there was a secondary banking crisis in 1970, 1971, 1972, when the leader of the Liberal party was up to his neck in London and County Securities —

Mr. Thurnham: There was a pact.

Mr. Skinner: Yes, there was a pact all right, with the previous chairman of the 1922 Committee of the Tory party. The chairman of Keyser Ullman temporarily tried to bail out London and County Securities—I mentioned it in the House at the time—in order to try to save the leader of the Liberal party's neck. It did not work because as a result of that banking crisis and the domino effect Keyser Ullman ran into the same trouble. It is no wonder he sometimes has a job to pay his rates. That is another story.

One of the things about that banking crisis was that the banks were given a long lease and a long rein. None of the big fish was caught. We have heard how the PCW people escaped to America and Costa Rica with the money they got from Lloyd's. Gerald Kaplan, the head of London and County Securities, went off to America as well. When I asked questions in the House, my hon. Friends in the Labour Government said that they could not get hold of him because he was in America.

I had not heard of sequestration in those days. That came up during the miners' strike. It is marvellous how the Government can sequestrate all the miners' money in what I thought were rock-solid banks in Switzerland and Luxembourg. I had been led to believe that anyone who gets hold of a million or so and wants to avoid taxation just has to put it in one of those banks and no one would be able to find out anything about it. But when the NUM did the same it was not long before a Conservative official was found to drop over and break into a rock-solid bank. By using their friends in the law courts and the City, the Tories managed to sequestrate the lot. There is certainly a lesson in that for the next Labour Government. About £50 billion has gone overseas as a result of exchange controls being lifted by the Government to help the City. We should have an official sequestrator — a Minister even — acting full time to bring that money back and have it taxed in this country. Then we could build up the National Health Service, pay decent pensions, get people off the dole queues, build houses and all the rest.

Those are the double standards under which the Tories operate. The Chancellor referred yesterday to the secondary banking crisis in an attempt to chide my hon. Friends for not doing enough about it. Why did he do nothing about Johnson Matthey Bankers when the climate was worse? Everyone acknowledges that, however great and corrupt and fraudulent the secondary banking crisis was, it was not so big as the crisis today. When the Chancellor saw Johnson Matthey going down the drain, he should have done something about it, but he and his predecessor promoted a free market economy which allowed the banks to make money hand over fist through high interest rates and made the Barber boom of 1972 look insignificant in comparison. In a climate like that a decent Chancellor would have recognised that the banks were in greater peril than they were in the 1970s because there were problems abroad as well as in England.

We have been surrounded by an international debt crisis for several years and it is growing all the time. I am told that about $975 billion is owed by about 50 out of 150 countries in the world. Imagine running a shop with 150 customers and 50 of them not paying anything off their debts but still shopping. There is an international debt crisis. The International Monetary Fund went bankrupt about three months ago and had to be bailed out temporarily. The United States has a $130 billion deficit. Fancy becoming a debtor and going to the top of the first division in one fell swoop. In a financial climate like that, any Chancellor who knew what he was doing would have decided to keep an eye on the little banks in case there was another banking crisis. If there was a crisis in 1972 when the international climate was so different, just think what could happen now. The Chancellor gave the game away yesterday by linking the 1972 crisis with the problems we face today. He should have recognised that special care was needed to see exactly what was happening in the banking sector, but he did not.

Is it any wonder that Johnson Matthey lent all this money to all these curious people? It lent Sipra about £70 million, and Abdul Shamji, who owed about £20 million, occasionally saw the chairman of the Tory party and was a friend of the Prime Minister and other Tory Members. If he was friendly with all these people in the Tory Government, is it not just conceivable that someone might have known that he was borrowing all this money from the Johnson Matthey bank? That same man, Abdul Shamji, finished up in an enterprise zone in Stroud in Kent, and he did so, according to my information, before anyone else knew that it was an enterprise zone. Is it not just conceivable that he was tipped off by the Tory Government and that some members of that Government knew where his money had come from?

In such a climate, would not a responsible Chancellor of the Exchequer have said, "We had better keep an eye on the Johnson Matthey bank. It is lending to people who do not have the collateral to pay back"? When I and other hon. Members put questions to the Prime Minister in 1984-85, she said that they had to rescue Johnson Matthey because it might have an effect on the others. The private lobbying that appeared in the newspapers—attributable or otherwise—suggested that one of the reasons was that the Midland bank was in trouble.

I suppose that the Chancellor knew that the Midland bank had problems. My hon. Friend the member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch said that the rescue was wrapped up with three different problems. I managed to spot the Midland's difficulties with Crocker in America whose debt ratio suggested real problems.

With an international debt crisis, with Midland bank tottering about, and with 80 American banks last year going bankrupt, is it not just conceivable that someone in the Tory Government should have kept an eye on Johnson Matthey bank? Should not someone have asked Ronald Leigh-Pemberton — appointed by the Prime Minister because, as she put it, "He is one of us"—"By the way, are you watching Johnson Matthey bank, because we think that it is a bit dodgy? We have a crisis nationally and internationally, and we have funny borrowers who are not likely to pay back. Are you keeping an eye on it, Ronald?" [HON. MEMBERS: "He is called Robin."] As a matter of fact, that is a more Tory name. It certainly was not Christopher Robin.

Mr. Rogers: Or Robin Hood.

Mr. Skinner: It was right for my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch to call for the resignation of the Governor of the Bank of England if he was incapable of keeping an eye on what was happening.

The Chancellor said yesterday that there would now be all these supervisors, but questions on that subject have been asked since 23 October 1984. I asked about supervision because I spotted in a journal that only one Bank of England employee was watching countless banks in Britain to see whether they were doing their job. When I asked that question, it was shrugged to one side.

Now the Government have decided to have some sort of supervision. So the Chancellor of the Exchequer has been negligent throughout the whole affair. Those who called for his resignation—my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch, myself and others—were right to do so, because the Chancellor was not keeping his eye on the ball.

What can we expect, anyway? If the Government decide to run a free market economy and to let interest rates go into double figures for about six years non-stop, sometimes at 17 per cent. — banks can make money hand over fist when interest rates are that high — is it any wonder that there has to be a day of reckoning eventually? It cannot be allowed to go on for ever. In that scenario, with the Johnson Matthey bank bubbling away, the Chancellor should have seen the warning signs. That is why we do not believe him when he says that he knew nothing about the crisis.

Consider the bizarre rescue. Imagine what happened on 30 September. Imagine the telephone call when the Chancellor of the Exchequer says to the Prime Minister, "It's uneconomic." She says, "Shut it, then." It is in the middle of the pit strike. The Chancellor says, "But it's a bank, Prime Minister". "Oh", says the Prime Minister, "keep it open if it's a bank. I thought it was a pit". That is roughly what happened.

The Prime Minister has the philosophy that a company must make a profit or die, but that philosophy does not apply to the casino economy, or when the Government's own friends are at risk, or when it is their people's money. If it is a little firm in the Rhondda valley or in Hackney, all the pleading by Labour Members to save 150 jobs falls on deaf ears with this Government, this Prime Minister, this Chancellor of the Exchequer and this chairman of the Tory party. It has to make a profit or go under, like all those miners who were chucked out of work.

The Government have double standards. A different law is applied to banks. They can be bailed out. There is no monetarist policy then, no free for all, no "Stand on your own two feet". At that point the Tory Government say, "Bail them out, and the use taxpayers' money if necessary to do it"—taxpayers' money that should be spent in areas such as Newcastle, where there is mass unemployment.

The debate is important because it shows the Tory party's morality in relation to the industrial economy and to the casino economy, Johnson Matthey, Lloyd's, the stock exchange, or anywhere that the Tory party's people proliferate, with the most powerful lobby in this building.

Imagine the scene, with all the people waddling up Threadneedle street, called by the Governor of the Bank of England to bail out Johnson Matthey Bankers. I wrote to the Prime Minister asking why all the shareholders were not allowed to go to the meeting. Only those who could be contacted at the time were called to the meeting. Why was there no ballot? All the talk in the autumn of 1984 was about having a ballot of miners. There was no ballot for the shareholders. Instead there was what is called an aggregate meeting. There they were, with their little square briefcases on a Sunday night. Just imagine 200 people going up Threadneedle street at midnight on a Sunday. They were not stopped at Dartford tunnel. The police knew that they were on a special journey—to bail out a segment of the Tories' beloved economy. There were different rules for them—one law for the banks and another for the rest.

[Mr. Skinner]

There is another aspect of the case that has not been covered adequately. Why was not the parent company made to look after its errant child? Johnson Matthey plc spawned Johnson Matthey Bankers. The Prime Minister talks about the family; about parents having to look after the children when they go wrong. Yet when Johnson Matthey plc found that its bank was going under, what happened? The Tory Government sent in the social workers to look after the brat. They used taxpayers money to bail it out. Completely different standards were applied to the bank.

Why was Charter Consolidated, a major shareholder in the company, not told, "You have a bank that is bankrupt. We ask you to put your money where your mouth is"? But Charter Consolidated conned the Government and Anglo-American. The bank was saved while 20,000 bankruptcies occurred in Britain that year.

To top it off, according to the information available at the time, when the rest of the City people were asked to put in money to save the Johnson Matthey bank, some of the city financiers said, "We think that Charter Consolidated should bear more of the burden than it has. We are not happy about putting some of our money in. We might be putting more good money after bad." They were tipped off that they would be looked after by the tax authorities.

I sent another letter to the Prime Minister asking why those City financiers and institutions were given the nod and the wink and told that, if they put their money into saving the Johnson Matthey bank, along with the £100 million from the taxpayers, they could write off every penny against taxes in case they became bad debts.

It would be wonderful if the parents of the 4 million people on the dole could set off tax relief to look after the 20-year-olds who have never had a job. Different standards are applied to them.

Yesterday, the Chancellor launched a violent attack on my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch because of his questioning in past months. The right hon. Gentleman tried to imply that we had come across this information in July after he had made his statement. It is on the record that several Opposition Members had been raising the matter since the bank collapsed. On 11 November 1984, I asked the Attorney-General, who said that he was concerned about the level of crime in the City, to send in the fraud squad. He refused. The Chancellor is wrong to suggest that we have not argued about this case for long enough.

The fraud squad did not find the crooks in London and County Securities or in Keyser Ullman, although the crooks were staring them in the face. It did not find them in all the other secondary banks. Almost no one was tackled when Crown Agents went under. The fraud squad was sent in eight months after I had asked that question in November. I am not naive enough to suppose that the fraud squad is capable of catching someone who has been given eight months' start. The Government did not give the miners eight months' start when they were engaged in their battle to save their jobs.

Now the Government have the cheek to talk about self-regulation for the City. It means keeping it in the family for banks, for Lloyd's and for the stock exchange. Yet, during the past six years, the Government have said to the trade unions, "No self-regulation for you. We shall tell you not only how to organise yourself but you must conduct ballots when we say so. You must ballot to elect all your executives." Why do not the Government start on Lloyd's? Why not have a few ballots in Lloyd's and in the stock exchange?

Mr. Tim Smith: They have ballots.

Mr. Skinner: I know that they have ballots. They fancy ballots as well.

Mr. Smith rose——

Mr. Rogers: Why not give way to the banking consultant?

Mr. Skinner: The banking consultant — the hon. Member for Beaconsfield—knows.

There is no self-regulation for local government. It would be wonderful if we returned to the self-regulatory system of local government which would enable local authorities to levy a rate to provide services for those in the inner cities and elsewhere. There is a difference between the inner cities and the City of London, where self-regulation is the order of the day.

There is no self-regulation for teachers. Teachers would argue that they could carry out their own appraisal, but the Government say, "You cannot have self-regulation. We will regulate for you. We will decide which grades you should be in."

When it comes to auditors investigating the affairs of Johnson Matthey and others, the result is a clean bill of health. Lambeth and Liverpool councils and several other authorities did not levy a rate for a few weeks and the Government sent in the auditors post haste to try to drive councillors out of office.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer has brought in new measures. We are to have bank supervisors. Why does he not allow the supervisors to confer with the auditors to ensure that everything is intact? Why does he not have an inspectorate? There is an inspectorate in the United States which controls about 14,000 banks. Why cannot we have an inspectorate instead of allowing self-regulation to continue?

The Government have a policy for the casino economy and one for those who work in industry and local government. Market forces and monetarism operate for the banks as long as they are making money. The moment that they run into trouble, the Government are there to bail them out. It is the job of Labour Members to expose these double standards when we see them. There has not been enough of that.

We have been under attack for the past six years. We have tried to defend our friends in the trade unions and local government while others have been making money hand over fist—[Interruption.] Tory Members like the hon. Member for Beaconsfield, who keeps chirping from a sedentary position, have been making money out of the system. They have been lining their pockets while the Government have been attacking councils, cutting grants and attacking trade unions, the teachers and working people generally. At the same time, millions have been made by others.

It is no good saying that it is only those outside the House who have made money. We know that one in eight Tory Members are members of Lloyd's. At the latest count, 400 consultancies are divided by about 230 Tory Members. It is difficult to keep up with the Register of Members' Interests, for they are coming on it that fast.

Against a background of neglect, I agree with those who have called for the sacking of the Governor of the Bank of England. Heads should roll when there is fraud on such a scale and when the taxpayer is having to find the money to bail out the City. Of course, there should be a pubic inquiry into the cesspool at Lloyd's and into the Johnson Matthey bank failure and its rescue by the British people. That must be said over and over again. If the Tory Government will not do that, the Chancellor of the Exchequer should pack up and go.

2.23 am

Mr. Richard Ottaway (Nottingham, North): I join others in congratulating the hon. Member for Rhondda (Mr. Rogers) on giving us a chance to respond to an important debate which has been going on for some months. My right hon. and hon. Friends have not had a chance to put in our two-penny worth.

As we have witnessed the rather dramatic learning curve of the Opposition on fraud in the City, there have been a number of opportunities for Opposition Members to say what they feel. I raised the matter in a debate in February, and we then had the debate on the White Paper on financial services, during which Opposition Members were strangely silent. Since those debates, there have been a number of developments. We have had the conference in Geneva of the United Nations committee for trade development on international and maritime fraud, the revelations in the "Panorama" programme of a few weeks ago and the publication of the Lloyd's disciplinary proceedings, which I believe is the first sign that the Lloyd's Act 1982 is working properly.

Above all, we have had the revelations from the hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Mr. Sedgemore). I think that the hon. Gentleman has done three things, apart from demonstrating the fine art of the early-day motion, which he used to promote his cause. First, he made accusations of fraud in the City. I have no idea whether those accusations are true. If he has concrete evidence, I hope that he will not hesitate to pass it on to the fraud squad——

Mr. Brian Sedgemore (Hackney, South and Shoreditch): The latest bundle in the possession of the fraud squad comes direct from Johnson Matthey Bankers. I have it in my hand; it reached me only today. It was given to the fraud squad only because I asked the company secretary to authorise its release.

Mr. Ottaway: I am delighted to hear that. I am not criticising the hon. Gentleman. I only said that I hoped he would pass on any evidence. The hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould), if my ears heard him right, made the remarkable comment that Kleinwort Benson was a party to fraud in the British Telecom share issue. I hope that he will pass that information on to the fraud squad.

Mr. Gould: I think that it has been accepted by the Treasury Bench and Ministers at the Department of Trade and Industry that Kleinwort Benson, which was dealing with the matter and charging the Government a substantial sum for giving them advice, was itself dealing in the shares. That is an incontrovertible fact, and that is accepted on all sides.

Mr. Ottaway: If the hon. Gentleman makes such accusations, I hope that he will pass evidence to the appropriate quarters.

Mr. Gould: The hon. Gentleman is clearly astonished, as, indeed, am I, that such conduct has been passed by the Government almost without comment. The Government simply say that they can see nothing wrong with this. All that they have done is to advise merchant bankers in similar positions not to behave in that way. I believe, as clearly the hon. Gentleman believes, that that was a clear case of, at best, an undesirable conflict of interest, and, at worst, something that approached fraud. If he is with me in that, I hope that he will join me in putting pressure on the Treasury Bench to ensure that people committing such an offence are brought to book.

Mr. Ottaway: I thank the hon. Gentleman for explaining that. I accept that he is not making allegations of fraud. I am as concerned as he is about this matter, which I was not aware of previously.

I make no apologies for the fact that I work in the City. I daily move around the place, and I must tell the House that 99·9 per cent. of those whom we meet in the City, who travel on the commuter trains each morning and evening, have absolutely no idea of how to carry out fraud even if they wanted to do so. They are performing a useful function, which is to earn invisible exports for this country. What we are talking about are an irresponsible few who are not necessarily British. Many of the criticisms of Opposition Members are causing more harm to the City than that criticism merits, especially bearing in mind the sterling earning capacity of the City.

The second thing that the hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch has apparently done is to galvanise the Government into action. As someone who has been campaigning for action on this front, I welcome the hon. Gentleman to the club of those trying to achieve more movement.

The third thing that the hon. Gentleman has done is to highlight a rather important defect in the law—and that is the grey area of what is a civil and what is a criminal matter. During the debate on the Queen's Speech, when he managed to slip in that subject during the foreign affairs debate, the hon. Gentleman gave an example of someone pinching 80p from a barrow in Hackney, who would then be chased by two policemen and prosecuted. The difficulty is that if that person, rather than stealing the 80p, said to the barrow owner, "Will you lend me 80p?", knowing that there was no intention to return it, the question arises whether that is a criminal offence or whether the barrow owner should sue that person for the return of the 80p. That is one of the main problems with what is happening in the City. It is the confusion over what is a civil case and what is a criminal case.

[Mr. Ottaway]

The hon. Gentleman may know about the Chartwell affair, when Mr. Bruckman sold shares that he did not own. The fraud squad investigated, and it was confused about whether it was a criminal or civil case. While the confusion was reigning, Mr. Bruckman disappeared.

On this topic, the Opposition are short on remedies. The Government have instigated the fraud investigation group, initiated the inquiry and review of fraud trials by Lord Justice Roskill and instigated the Green Paper on extradition. Above all, as many hon. Members have mentioned, we have had the debate on the White Paper on financial services.

I do not know whether this will come out in the Financial Services Bill, but the White Paper says that the key to enforcement in the City is having self-regulation underpinned by criminal sanctions. The Attorney-General admits that fraud is growing in the City, and the director of the International Maritime Bureau says that it is running at $10 billion a year. I find that figure exaggerated, as it is staggering. We must ask ourselves whether self-regulation is sufficient, whether those doing the underpinning have sufficient support and resources, and whether the criminal sanctions are effective.

Lloyd's is the best example of self-regulation. It is understandable that some hon. Members are concerned. Mr. Cameron Webb did not feature in the disciplinary proceedings by the simple trick of resigning from Lloyd's, so he did not come under scrutiny. He disappeared to Spain, and as soon as we signed an extradition treaty with Spain, he slipped off to California. The Director of Public Prosecutions says that we do not have enough evidence to bring him back from California. I say to him that we should go out and get the evidence. It is available. We also have Peter Dixon, who was fined £1 million. It is a fat lot of use fining a man £1 million if he is living in Marbella at the time. We must get him back from Marbella.

Self-regulation can work only if there is no conflict between the regulators and the market. The other day Mr. Posgate, who probably knows his way around Lloyd's better than most people, said that business was being transferred to preferred syndicates and that members of the council of Lloyd's were members of the preferred syndicates. I have no idea whether that is true, but I hope that it is being investigated by Lloyd's.

When syndicates crash, we come back to the point that I raised earlier—is it a criminal or a civil matter? We read in the papers this morning of offers being made to some of the innocent victims of the crash at Lloyd's. That seems to show that some people say that it is a civil matter, because if it was not they could be suing for their money. Yet others say that it is a criminal matter. That distinction must be examined.

Let us consider self-regulation on the stock exchange. We all know that insider dealing is illegal, yet about 65 per cent. of all price movements before a major announcement occur as a result of insider dealing. The figure from the stock exchange is that four people have been prosecuted. In the unit trust world, we look at the cases of late booking. When people make transactions, instead of committing themselves to where the transaction is being placed, they put in a suspense account. I believed that M and G, of all people, was above suspicion. It looks after my investments. When it was discovered that someone in M and G had operated a suspense account, it had no records. That is disgraceful. The stock exchange confirmed that it had no rules to deal with late booking.

Despite those difficulties, self-regulation has to work. If the City of London cannot work on self-regulation, we might as well pack up and go home. We cannot have policemen sitting around Lloyd's and the stock exchange. The Government must get to grips with giving the self-regulators more power and effectiveness. As my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) said, auditors must be given more power to report suspicious circumstances. We must ensure that the criminal sanctions underpinning self-regulation bite, and are seen to bite. There must be a massive boost in the staff of the DPP, and the fraud squad must be expanded.

I do not know whether any hon. Member present has tried lodging a complaint with the fraud squad. I tried about four years ago, and was told to visit a man in a room in Holborn called the caller sergeant. The chap came out with his note pad and pencil, which he sharpened, and took down a little statement and went away again. About three weeks later I received a letter. I had given the circumstances of the fraud and the name and address of the person I suggested had committed it. The letter said that the fraud squad could not prosecute because someone would have to go to Yugoslavia to take a statement and it did not have the money to do that.

The City of London is the financial centre of the world. It must have the respect of investors, and we must give the fraud squad the tools to police it. We must ask ourselves whether the law can cope with what is going on. At the moment, the answer is no. We can make improvements with jurisdiction and with extradition. There is a glaring loophole in the law of jurisdiction. Any two people can conspire to commit a crime overseas, but it is not an offence. If the crime is carried out in, for example, Turkey, with which we have no extradition treaty, it is possible to publish details in the papers and not be prosecuted, because no offence has been committed. When I asked Lord Justice Roskill whether he was looking into that in his inquiry, he said that he was not. It is easy to understand why people say that Britain is becoming a haven for overseas criminals. People can operate without fear of prosecution.

The Home Office has produced a Green Paper on extradition. I am disturbed by some of the trailers about what will happen to the law on extradition. I understand that the prima facie rule will be abolished. That is disturbing, and I hope that we shall have a chance to discuss it. It is vital that the Home Office proposals on extradition are brought forward and that we consider with whom we have extradition treaties.

We should have multilateral treaties. We should sign the European convention on extradition. Britain and Malta are the only countries in Europe which have not signed that convention. We run into most trouble with the number of Government Departments with which hon. Members must deal when approaching this subject. In matters of jurisdiction, we are referred to the Home Office. Financial services are the province of the Department of Trade and Industry. Fraud trials take us back to the Law Officers. The rules of extradition are matters for the Home Office, but extradition relations are matters for the Foreign Office. If we want to talk about the DPP, we must go to the Law Officers again, but, oddest of all, if there is fraud on a ship

—if there is marine fraud — we are referred to the Department of Transport. If ever there was a classic example of a case for a Ministry of Justice, this is it.

There is no central drive in Government policy on this topic. The problem is international and requires an international solution. That has been recognised by the United Nations committee on trade and development, which is the only organisation that has got to grips with the internationalism of the problem. It is alone in proposing a convention on jurisdiction and extradition. When I referred that venture to the Department of Transport, which for some reason is dealing with the matter, it said that the proposals contained no practical solutions.

The Government are acting, but there is no co-ordination and no direction. Only this afternoon the International Maritime Bureau told me about a fraud involving some $2·3 million. The perpetrator is believed to have carried out a similar crime seven times in the past. We are not chasing burglars and leaving more men on the beat. We are up against sophisticated criminals. Until we are as sophisticated as they are, they will run rings round us until the cows come home.

2.39 am

Mr. Brian Sedgemore (Hackney, South and Shoreditch): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Rhondda (Mr. Rogers) on choosing this subject and opening the debate so lucidly.

The huge increase in City fraud has brought the Government near to panic. They say that they are anxious to deal with fraud, but one of their main anxieties is that fraud is about to become electorally and politically embarrassing for them. Only today I was talking to a fraud squad officer who said that the Government had promised them 25 accountants. Where are they? The fact that they have not been provided is a reason why so few people who commit fraud get caught. Despite the rhetoric and the fact that there have been years of fraud at Lloyd's and Johnson Matthey bank, not one person has been arrested, charged, or is facing trial.

Mahmud Sipra is in Karachi laughing his socks off. Michael Hepker is amazed that he is still the chairnan of a public company in Leeds. Abdul Shamji genuinely believes that he can still buy his knighthood from the Government. Peter Cameron Webb is spending the loot in Miami. John Walrock can be seen in a sauna bath at the Mandarin hotel in Hong Kong. Peter Dixon is sunning himself on a sun-kissed beach in the southern hemisphere. The greatest fraud supremo of all from JMB, Mr Ian Fraser, believes that the Governor of the Bank of England, Mr. Robin Leigh-Pemberton, will give him a job on the banking supervision board.

It is absurd that those major criminals are scattered round the world, and there is no chance that any of them, except perhaps Mr. Fraser, will be charged. The Minister and the Law Officers should tell us why. They created an enormous red herring over Lloyd's by saying that they could not catch those people because they could not get the internal transcript of the Lloyd's proceedings. The Lloyd's solicitor, Mr. William Beckett, agrees that that is a red herring. I saw him on Friday. If those people are to be caught on the basis of evidence given to Lloyd's, the police must go to the same people and get the same statements. They cannot use the statements that were given to Lloyd's. The police have not done that, and until they do so those people will go free.

The second excuse is that we cannot extradite those people. Why cannot we extradite John Walrock from Hong Kong? Only a few months ago when he came to give evidence to Lloyd's, why was there no warrant for his arrest? Was he told that there was some form of immunity to prevent him from being arrested? It is an enormous puzzle why not one warrant has been issued for their arrest and why no one has been charged. Those papers have been with the Director of Public Prosecutions since 1982. But for the fact that I started to kick up a stink about Lloyd's five weeks ago, we would have heard nothing more about it. Those papers would have been left with the DPP for a further year and still no warrant would be issued, no charge would be made, and no one would face a criminal trial.

When I first began to hear about the details of JMB, I said to myself, "Come on, Sedgemore, you are going potty. It really cannot be like that. It is an enormous fantasy or some terrifying nightmare." I have made no claims of making the running on fraud. If other people want to claim that, it is up to them. I started—Ministers cannot take this away from me—painstakingly to stitch together pieces of evidence over a long period and to get a picture of what was happening. We did not get that picture from the fraud squad, from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, from any member of the Government or from the newspapers. We got it because I asked a few people to help me with inquiries to get a broad picture of what was happening.

But there seems to be almost no limit to what some of the people who have been involved in those frauds will do. The most startling thing happened about three weeks ago. Mr. Abdul Shamji, who believes that there is no one he cannot buy, tried to buy me. It was extraordinary. He contacted someone whom he knew was in contact with me — an informant — and arranged to meet him at the Pavilion bar in Grosvenor House in Park lane. First, he tried to buy that person by saying that he should try to obtain confidential documents from me, and then he put forward a proposal which amounted to an attempt to buy me.

Who is Mr. Abdul Shamji? He has a perfectly proper relationship with the chairman of the Conservative party. There is no fraud involved; it is a normal relationship. There is a bit of minor entertainment, a couple of tickets at the Garrick, and tea at Park lane. He gives money to the Conservative party from his Gomba companies, via McAlpines, and he was a vice-president of the Small Business Bureau, which is located at Conservative party central office. But what happened when my hon. Friend the Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) said to the chairman of the Conservative party, "Mr. Shamji is a blatantly dishonest person and you should watch him"? The chairman of the Conservative party lost his temper and has refused to speak to my hon. Friend since. That illustrates the problems mentioned by my hon. Friends the Members for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) and for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner). There is too close a relationship between the Conservative party and the people involved in the City. It is not that Ministers are fraudulent or that they are in any way involved in fraud. There is an unhealthy relationship, and they do not appear to recognise its inherent dangers.

[Mr. Brian Sedgemore]

I wish to talk about Lloyd's tonight, because, of the two scandals, it is by far the biggest. It is the issue that we shall be discussing in the House during the next few months. Lloyd's will be issuing a pack later today, and it will arrive with some Government propaganda, following the publication of the Financial Services Bill. The purport of that propaganda or publicity pack is to say that there has been no fraud at Lloyd's since the 1982 Act was passed. That is another Lloyd's and Conservative party mirage. It is not a claim by me; it is a simple statement of fact that after the passing of the Lloyd's Act fraud continued in the Peter Cameron Webb syndicate. After the passing of the Lloyd's Act, fraud continued in the Alexander Howden syndicate. After the passing of the Lloyd's Act, fraud continued at Brooks and Dooley. After the passing of the Lloyd's Act, a series of fundamental questions hangs over the operations of the former chairman of Lloyd's, Sir Peter Green, and his relationship with Cresvale Securities and his further relationship with Janeen Services.

It is not true to say that there has been no fraud since the passing of the Lloyd's Act. Indeed, I do not know why some people wish to stand so heavily on the Act, since people like Mr. Kenneth Grob and Mr. John Walrock, who are two well-known criminals out of the jurisdiction, were the people who came to the House and told that Committee, which included some of my hon. Friends, that they were honest, decent, god-fearing people and that we could put our trust in them. We could not put our trust in them, and we cannot put our trust in the Lloyd's Act.

I talk to many people in Lloyd's now. They not only write to me in large numbers but come to see me, or I go to see them. Almost all of them are saying that they cannot expect Parliament or Lloyd's to satisfy them by what they do to clean up the Act unless they can be sure that there will be a clean out at the top of Lloyd's. They say that there are serious question marks hanging over the top people at Lloyd's and, in particular, Sir Peter Green, the past chairman of Lloyd's. They are all asking why there has not been an inquiry about Lloyd's—an open, proper, decent scrutiny of the activities of Sir Peter Green at Lloyd's. Why is there so much mystery about his activities?

The questions are asked about a number of sectors. First, they are about a number of syndicates that Sir Peter Green ran. I have read shoals of papers on this subject, and they contain serious questions about the operation of his Imperial and Cayman Islands Offshore Reinsurance company that have never been answered, although they should have been answered by now. I know that in November 1982 Sir Peter Green was questioned by the council of Lloyd's at Leeds castle, in Kent. He told the council that his farm was a beneficiary of the company. He tried to sell his interests, but he could not, and he put them into a trust. He has had to admit that his farm is still a potential beneficiary of the trust. Why have we not heard more about that?

Why has there been no investigation into the questions asked about whether the names are being deprived of money in relation to Cresvale Securities and its related companies, which have been mentioned in an early-day motion of mine? Why has there not been an inquiry into the relationship between Sir Peter Green and Janeen Services, one of his companies? The company looks as though it may be one of the methods by which names are being deprived of money.

What did Sir Peter Green do to help to cover up for Peter Cameron Webb? It is as clear as a pikestaff to anyone who understands simple morality that he did so. If the chairman of Lloyd's can do that so that Peter Cameron Webb was not subjected to scrutiny how can any hon. Member be asked to put his trust in Lloyd's? We know for a fact that Peter Cameron Webb was allowed to resign from Lloyd's with a month's notice, when six months is the required period for notice. That restriction of time prevented the freezing of his assets. Why did Peter Green allow that to happen? Why did he turn up in Hong Kong this year, just before John Walrock came over here and threatened to blow the gaff by giving his evidence on Lloyd's in public? Why did he suddenly change his mind at the last moment?

Sir Peter Green was asked to look into Peter Cameron Webb's Unimar slush fund. Everybody at Lloyd's refers to it as a slush fund. It is not one of the biggest slush funds at about £500,000, but it is a lot of money to go into a Monte Carlo slush fund. How could the chairman of Lloyd's, having inquired into it privately and off the record, gone back to the council without a written report and simply say that he was satisfied that nothing was wrong with the Unimar slush fund? That is nonsense.

How did Tuckey QC conduct an inquiry into Sir Peter Green's operations and come back with a report that was an even bigger nonsense, based on a wholly false premise? We know that a report is to be published that will show that Unimar was a slush fund and that big names and figures are involved. I could give them to the House now, but I shall not bother because it is not part of my speech.

How does the chairman manage to get away with these things? Unless and until Lloyd's can tell the House and the country that it is prepared to hold a rigorous inquiry into the activities of its past chairman, there will be grave cause for concern. It is not just Lloyd's that is involved in the cover-up of Sir Peter Green. I ask any hon. Member to rise now to interrupt me and explain why Sir Peter Green was summoned in March 1983 to see Sir Gordon Richardson, the then Governor of the Bank of England, in the presence of Mr. Henry Benson, his chief tax adviser, to discuss Sir Peter Green's tax affairs.

The Governor of the Bank of England has no standing in law in relation to the tax affairs of anybody in this country. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has no standing in law in relation to the tax affairs of anybody in this country. It is a rigid rule that every private individual's tax affairs, whether they are hon. Members, members of the public or members of the Monarchy, are not discussed by any official. During the last two weeks we have been told by a Bank of England public relations official that Sir Peter Green went to see Sir Gordon Richardson and said, "I've got a tax problem" and that Sir Gordon said, "I'll tell you what to do, Sir Peter. You go and talk to an accountant about it." Sir Peter Green is a multi-millionaire. Which hon. Member will tell the House that Sir Peter Green does not have a gaggle of tax accountants and that he needs to go to the Governor of the Bank of England to be told that if he has a tax problem he should get hold of a tax accountant? It is preposterous. What kind of idiots does the Bank of England think we are? We shall not tolerate that kind of cover-up—in this House, or on the part of Lloyd's, or on the part of the Bank of England.

How did it come about subsequently that Sir Peter Green, who wanted a second term of office as chairman of Lloyd's, was told by the current Governor of the Bank of England, that he could not have it? Apparently, he went along and said that he had a few tax problems and that they would take him a little time to sort out. Are people trying to tell hon. Members that what Sir Peter Green said to Robin Leigh-Pemberton was, "I owe the tax people rather more money than I have paid. I have got a few problems, but they are not really serious" and that Robin Leigh-Pemberton said, "Oh, well, in that case you had better not carry on at Lloyd's. You had better get out because there is nothing wrong." No; Sir Peter Green has serious tax problems and the House, as well as the Inland Revenue, should be told what they are. That should be part of the inquiry. Until we can get to the bottom of it, nobody will take any notice of any protestation by Lloyd's. I am certainly not going to take any notice of William Beckett, the solicitor, telling me that they have cleaned up the place.

I saw William Beckett last Friday. I did not go along to see him. I went along just to look around the building. I was given a very pleasant guided tour, and he invited me to have a chat with him. I was surprised when he said to me that there was nothing in my early-day motion that Lloyd's did not know about. I thought, "Well, that's a bit odd, because these early-day motions are serious." The Chancellor of the Exchequer talks about McCarthyite smears, but his solicitor said, "I know about it all." If Lloyd's know about all of my early-day motions, may I remind the House that one of them relates to the fact that when Mr. Leslie Dew worked for Merrett he was leading substantial banking business for Alexander Howden. A number of the commissions were being paid direct into a Swiss bank account. Mr. Leslie Dew is a former vice-chairman of Lloyd's. How is it that the chairman and the vice-chairman of Lloyd's never seem to get investigated while the others do? If Mr. William Beckett and his predecessors — because Mr. William Beckett has just come from the Department of Trade and Industry — knew about that, why did they not hold an inquiry? If they want some leads, I shall give them a few.

The Alexander Howden banking business, which is related to Lloyds International and possibly to one other customer, was authorised by Mr. Kenneth Grob and Mr. Commerie, who are well known figures. The administration was carried out by Mr. Graham Sloan, the director of banking. Mr. Graham Sloan knows the Swiss bank account number into which the monies were paid because he paid them into the Swiss bank account.

The administration was also carried out by Mr. John Varney. All that Lloyd's has to do is to question these people and Mr. Leslie Dew to get to the bottom of the scandal. That seems fairly easy and straightforward. Why has it not been done?

I did not talk directly about that case to Mr. Beckett, but he asked me, "How far back do you want to go?" I told him, "As far back as there are people still alive." I am a barrister and I know that if someone commits a murder, a robbery or any other crime and someone finds out about it eight years later the person is not told, "You committed the crime eight years ago, so we'll forget it." People are charged for such crimes and go to prison, so why does not that happen in the Lloyd's case?

It is said that the information in my early-day motions is known. Several of the motions relate to the activities of Sir Peter Green and they give a lot of leads. If Mr. William Beckett and Lloyd's know all about this activity, why have they not at least—without charging Sir Peter Green as being guilty—carried out an investigation to answer all the questions that all the people at Lloyd's, not me, are asking? We must have some explanation from somebody. I can see some panic in the Box behind the Speaker's chair. The people there seek an explanation. The Minister laughs and shakes his head, but I shall be interested in his answer. I know that, because I can read him like a book. He is doing his best. I have no criticisms of his activity in any sphere, but I know that he will not give me a satisfactory answer.

Sometimes I wonder just how far the power of Lloyd's goes. I am about to send to the Lord Chancellor a document drawn up by a reputable solicitor. I have seen the solicitor and talked to his managing clerk and to some other people. When the British establishment starts to worry about cases, it illustrates how odd things can get. The document concerns the conduct of the Senior Master at the Royal Courts of Justice. He is not a judge, so I can talk about him. He deals with proceedings before they reach court. The case, which is over was called Tubero v. Toomey and involved 15,000 other Lloyd's names who were sued in a representative capacity. It was a recent action which was struck out. It concerns the loss of gems in Los Angeles.

I make no comment on the merits of the case. I have no interest in the plaintiffs and no interest in the defendants, but I am concerned with what happened. On 4 November 1984 the case was listed to come before Master Turner but the Senior Master, J. R. Bickford Smith, for reasons that nobody can understand, grabbed it for himself and insisted that he should deal with it. There is evidence that he had seen the papers, although he was not to deal with the case.

In December of that year——

Mr. Cash: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Perhaps you can give some guidance about whether article 9 of the Bill of Rights applies in this case. Will you reflect on the matter?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: (Mr. Harold Walker): I am not here to interpret the Bill of Rights.

Mr. Sedgemore: The case went before Master J. R. Bickford Smith. Counsel said to him, "Do you really feel you can deal with this case because one of the defendants is called J. Bickford-Smith. J. R. Bickford Smith does not have a hyphen in his name, but J. Bickford-Smith does. Master Bickford Smith lied to counsel. Yes, he lied. He said:

"You will not find another master in this corridor, nor a single judge in this building, who is not a Lloyd's underwriter."

That statement was manifestly untrue, because all the masters are not Lloyd's underwriters.

There might have been an inference that those Bickford Smiths were related. I have had a genealogist check the position and I can report that the grandfather of both of them was George Smith and that J. R. Bickford Smith is the cousin of J. Bickford-Smith. What is the Senior Master doing when one of the defendants in a case is his cousin? What is he doing when one of the other masters just down the corridor, Master Topley, is also a Lloyd's underwiter and a defendant in a case and is his best friend, and when the wife of Master Topley witnessed the marriage of Bickford Smith?

Further, what is happening in this case when of the solicitors, Elbourne Mitchell, Elbourne is a member of Lloyd's council, is a consultant in the case and is also a defendant in the case and Mr. Mitchell, the senior partner who is dealing with the case, is also a defendant in the case? It is all beginning to look very mucky.

[Mr. Sedgemore]

I will take the grin off the Minister's face when I tell him that there was an absurd, pathetic letter from the Lord Chancellor's office which will have to be answered when it is claimed to an American attorney that there is no relationship between the Bickford Smiths. The Law Society is still looking into the activities of the solicitors in this case. Master J. R. Bickford Smith, the Senior Master — who happens to be a member of the Athlumney Freemasons Lodge, and there appear to be other freemasons in this case; we have a curious combination of freemasonry and the power of Lloyd's— actually makes orders which are outside the rule book for which he is personally responsible.

When the Lord Chancellor looks into this case, he will find a vipers' nest. It makes one wonder how far these sorts of relationship can go when we are talking about the vice-chairman of Lloyd's and no inquiry; about the chairman of Lloyd's and no inquiry; about the Senior Master at the Royal Courts of Justice and things going wrong; about the Law Society saying that it cannot believe what it is hearing; and about the Lord Chancellor's department writing silly letters to American attorneys. Where will it end?

There is grave public concern over this matter. I have received 800 letters. I shall not get round to answering them all for the next six months. About 100 of them concern serious cases and about 700 say, in effect, "You must carry on with what you are doing." I have a letter with me—it came this morning; that is the only reason why I have it in my possession now—which is typical. It says:

"Dear Mr. Sedgemore"—— and it is interesting because it links Johnson Matthey with Lloyd's——

> "As one whose company lost money through Sipra's film ventures and has personally lost a very large sum through fraudulent underwriting at Lloyd's, I can only ask that you keep up the pressure against the ever-increasing criminal activities in the City of London. Self-regulation purely means that the most blatant excesses are curbed, and self-enrichment continues unabated by those who are on the inside track."

I have had many letters of that type. QCs have been writing to me saying that they intend to sue Lloyd's, and there will be a great deal of dirt and flak about. They are writing to me as though I can do something to help them, so that they do not have to sue Lloyd's and there does not have to be any flak. I cannot do anything to help them. Lloyd's must clean itself up or the Government will have to do the cleaning up for it.

I have a letter here which mentions Sturge and Company. I have a letter from Peter Rawlings which is so hysterical that it could have been written by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He complains bitterly that I have mentioned them in an early-day motion and says that there is nothing to inquire into. I am going through a file on Sturge and Company, and when the new year comes and I have had a chance to sort it all out I shall make public what I know. Then Mr. Rawlings can write me another letter, although I hope that he will write it in less hysterical terms.

There is a serious problem, and the kind of self-regulatory devices that the Government are thinking up for the City of London are not sufficient. I hope that I shall be able to speak on Second Reading of the Financial Services Bill and even get on the Committee. It will be the only Committee that I have ever volunteered to go on. We can then go into these matters in great detail. It is not fair to say that we have not yet come forward with proposals. We shall come forward with a clutch of proposals which should help to alleviate the position.

3.10 am

Mr. Peter Thurnham (Bolton, North-East): I congratulate the hon. Member for Rhondda (Mr. Rogers) on initiating this debate, but I find the attitude of Labour Members difficult to understand. The Labour party decries profits, but if investors do not make profits Labour Members are the first to shout fraud.

Mr. Rogers: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Profits have been mentioned twice now, first by the hon. Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Mr. Beaumont-Dark) and now by the hon. Member for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Thurnham). If they had bothered to listen to my speech, and if they read Hansard tomorrow, they will know that nowhere did I mention the word "profit". I mentioned fraud on many occasions. My hon. Friends have now provided manifest evidence that there is a lot of fraud going on. Never at any time have I mentioned the honest——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is not raising a point of order for me.

Mr. Thurnham: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman has forgotten that he is a member of the party that taxed investor's earnings at 98 per cent. It is fraudulent for a Labour Member to initiate such a debate when one looks back at the Labour party's record. My hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Mr. Beaumont-Dark) talked about not liking a grapeshot approach. It is the grease gun approach, the smear gun approach, that I do not like. If the allegations of the hon. Member for Hackney, South and Frauditch are true, he should take them to the police in the first instance, as the police have said they wish he would. If they are not true, is it not a gross abuse of this House for him to publicise them in the way that he has done?

I thought that the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) would lift the tone of the debate somewhat, but I was disappointed at the way in which he attacked my hon. and learned Friend the Under-Secretary of State. I hope that he will not persist in that line of argument. That is no doubt why his leader struck such a poor deal with the Common Market if he was benefiting from his land holdings.

I did not hear all the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith), but I should like to take up the point about the importance of auditors having powers to report on fraud. That is one of the most interesting aspects of the White Paper which my right hon. Friend the Chancellor gave us yesterday. I hope that we shall hear more about the powers of auditors when my hon. and learned Friend produces his Bill shortly.

We have lost the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner), but it was his union which was so busy trying to bankrupt the country at the time when he was saying the Government should have been worrying about our banks.

I want to look at the job that the City does, because it is the financial centre not only of Britain but of the world. It is the greatest financial centre, and we must ensure that it remains so. I look forward to the White Paper later today setting a legislative framework which will ensure a successful and great future for London as the financial centre of Britain and the world.

I trust that my hon. and learned Friend has considered the White Paper carefully in relation to the new Bill, as I believe that the key to self-regulation is for auditors to have power to go to the relevant body if necessary. If the power exists it becomes unnecessary because the client will wish to discuss the matter with the regulatory agency if he knows that the auditor has power to do so in any case. That was a key proposal in the White Paper on banking supervision, and I shall be interested to know the extent to which my hon. and learned Friend believes that it would be valuable in the new Bill.

I remind the hon. Member for Dagenham that we do not just look back to 1981. We can go back to 1720 and the South Sea bubble. More recent incidents include London and County Securities. It is extraordinary how long the Labour Government took to act in the secondary banking crisis. Indeed, we had to wait until 1979 for legislation on that. Yet Labour Members now criticise the present Government, who have acted very promptly.

The Opposition talked about fraud in the City, but no one mentioned fraud elsewhere, although the Library can provide notes on that, too. In 1984 there were 77 reported incidents of fraud in local authorities. As so many of them failed to answer the questionnaires sent to them, it is thought that a large number of frauds also went undiscovered. Fraud is not just a matter for the City. It is a matter for all activities, both commercial and municipal, and we must be on our guard on that account.

I shall not detain the House any longer, as I know that my hon. and leaned Friend the Minister wishes to begin his reply.

3.16 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Michael Howard): I welcome the opportunity to contribute to this debate on a subject of great importance to people far beyond the City.

Honest dealing is fundamental to the working of our economic system, but our concern goes even deeper. Our whole system of morality is threatened if it is thought that fraud of any kind is tolerated. If it is tolerated in one place, it will quickly spread and become the norm elsewhere. That is why the Government have taken a whole series of steps to prevent fraud and to punish it when it occurs. They are serious steps, not just allegations about particular losses.

The foundation for many of the measures that I shall describe were laid over a period of several years and are not simply responses to recent headlines. The hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) acknowledged that. He referred to the setting up of the Roskill committee in 1983 and the Gower committee in 1981. These steps have been at the forefront of Government attention for a considerable time.

Maintaining confidence in our financial institutions is a major task of my Department and of others primarily concerned — the Treasury, the Law Officers and the Home Office — and we recognise the seriousness of fraud. It not only causes loss to individuals, sometimes on a disastrous scale, but it can lead to business collapse and unemployment. The reputation of London, Edinburgh and other financial centres is a precious national asset which we must constantly strive to maintain. Fraud damages us all, so combating it is a national priority. I believe, too, that we all have a duty not to inflict unnecessary damage on those interests by exaggerating the scale of the problem. Serious though it is, it must be kept in proportion.

Despite what has happened at Lloyd's, for example, no Lloyd's policy holder has not been paid when he or she has a valid claim. The depositors in JMB have not lost their money. It is just as dangerous to exaggerate the scale of the problem as to minimise it. Those who exaggerate the problem are doing us all a great disservice.

I should like to review the Government's action programme on fraud. First and foremost, fraud involves crime, and I want to deal first with the criminal law aspects. Action to combat fraud is essentially a matter for the criminal law. The government have been active in seeking to overhaul our systems, laws and procedures, the better to tackle the growing amount of fraud and its increasing sophistication.

The difficulties in tackling commercial fraud should not be underestimated. Those who perpetrate fraud are usually careful to cover their tracks, and unravelling complicated transactions is a lengthy and painstaking process. Any criminal prosecution must be founded on evidence that is both available and admissible in criminal proceedings in this country. Interested parties are often reluctant to co-operate with a police investigation, for fear of prejudicing themselves in civil proceedings. Difficulties often exist in obtaining overseas evidence. If a witness is located within the jurisdiction of a foreign state, no power exists where by investigators in this country can compel the production of his evidence here.

A striking example of this kind of problem is provided in some of the cases involving Lloyd's. As my hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General informed the House, the investigations concerning the affairs of the PCW syndicate and Alexander Howden were first referred to the Director in 1982. He added:

"Two separate but related investigations are being conducted under the auspices of a fraud investigation group formed for that purpose. It comprises police officers, members of the Director's professional staff, accountants and very experienced specialist members of the Bar. Despite the considerable financial and manpower resources devoted to the case, serious delay has been imposed upon the progress of these investigations by the necessity of securing, in a form admissible in any criminal proceedings in England, evidence which hitherto has only been available from witnesses located within the jurisdiction of a foreign state." — [Official Report, 25 November 1985; Vol. 87, c. 362.]

The Solicitor-General went on to explain the difficulties and the way in which he hopes to overcome them. There one finds the distinction between cases such as those before us tonight and cases that were the subject of a comparison which the hon. Member for Dagenham must have known was too facile to be seriously helpful in the context of this debate. He spoke about frauds perpetrated on the DHSS and about action that was taken to deal with them. Is he suggesting that there is a problem in relation to frauds perpetrated on the DHSS because one cannot get the evidence that is located in a foreign country? Is he suggesting that the difficulties of getting the evidence necessary to satisfy a criminal court on the burden of proof are remotely comparable in cases involving fraud on the

[Mr. Michael Howard]

DHSS and the cases with which we are now concerned? If so, he is demeaning the tone of what I hope over the weeks and months ahead will continue to be a very serious debate on this topic.

Mr. Gould: Had the Minister listened carefully to what I said—I am sure that he did—he would know that I was suggesting that we expected to see the same zeal, prompt action and use of resources in respect of the Oxford social security investigation put to the service of detecting major criminals who have got away with thousands of times more money than did any of the pathetic people in Oxford who were rounded up by the police.

Mr. Howard: I share the hon. Gentleman's desire to bring to book those who have got away with these large sums of money, and so do the Government. My hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General told the House frankly of the difficulties encountered in bringing these prosecutions. The kind of problem that he identified is precisely that which has been studied by the Roskill committee. That is what it was set up to consider. Its terms of reference were:

"To consider in what ways the conduct of criminal proceedings in England and Wales arising from fraud can be improved and to consider what changes in existing law and procedure would be desirable to secure the just, expeditious and economical disposal of such proceedings".

Mr. Rogers: We could well accept that the Government are applying themselves to a change in the law so that frauds can be prevented or made more easily detectable, but if a criminal act is taking place today, when there are obviously insufficient resources to pursue the criminals assiduously, why do the Government not take specific action to make more money and resources immediately available? I understand that there are only 21 people associated with the DPP investigating fraud, whereas there are 175 people associated with investigating social security frauds.

Mr. Howard: There is no secret about resources. My hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General has made it plain to the House that the question of resources is under active consideration. An application has been made and the matter is under consideration with a view to increasing the resources available to the fraud investigation groups. The difficulties, essentially, do not arise out of a lack of resources; they arise out of the procedural difficulties which the Roskill committee was set up to consider.

We look forward to the recommendations of the Roskill committee. We hope that its report will be published early in the new year and that it will play a critical role in enabling the criminal law to be a more effective vehicle for prosecuting fraud. Meanwhile, the Government are undertaking major changes in the system of prosecuting fraud. We have heard mention of the fraud investigation group system, which is designed to co-ordinate the legal and investigative aspects of an inquiry. It comprises police officers, members of the professional staff of the DPP, accountants and specialist members of the Bar. It has its own staff accountants. There is a training programme to ensure that the lawyers have the necessary understanding of accountancy, and a panel of specialist accountants is being compiled. The Department of Trade and Industry puts at the disposal of the fraud investigation group investigatory powers under the Companies Act. There we have machinery set up, representing a new way of pooling all the skills that are needed to combat sophisticated crime, and beginning to show its effectiveness. The central role which the criminal process will play in relation to fraud will always remain.

I turn to another area in which we have made less progress than I should have wished, and where again we propose to increase our powers to improve the effectiveness of the action we take. My hon. Friends the Members for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Mr. Beaumont-Dark) and for Nottingham, North (Mr. Ottaway) referred to the number of prosecutions for the offence of insider trading. We created a criminal offence in 1980, and a lamentably small number of successful prosecutions have been brought since that offence was put on the statute book. It is difficult to prove as a criminal charge. It is necessary to prove beyond all reasonable doubt that the defendant knew that he was in possession of price-sensitive information — not probably knew, or might have known, but definitely knew — and other jurisdictions have similar disappointing experiences.

I invite the attention of my hon. Friends who raised that point, and of all others who are seriously interested in the problem, to the powers that we propose to take to deal with the matter. They are contained in the Financial Services Bill and go considerably further than any powers that have ever been brought to bear on the problem. I put that forward to hon. Members as an indication of the seriousness with which we take the task of tackling abuse, malpractice and fraud.

I could cite a number of other measures that the Government have taken: the prosecutions that are carried out by my Department for fraudulent trading and failure to keep accounts, company investigations, the compulsory winding up of companies and the disqualification of unfit directors, where powers have been considerably extended and enhanced under the Insolvency Act 1985.

My hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) was kind enough to refer to my recent speech on the role of accountants, especially auditors, in the fight against fraud. The Government's concern about this originated with my predecessor — my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Fletcher)—and, as a result of his concern, the Institute of Chartered Accountants set up a working party a year ago, chaired by Ian Hay Davison, to examine the whole subject of fraud and what the accountant should be doing to prevent it in today's conditions. The working party's report was a most constructive response, and I pay tribute to those who produced it.

Since then, there has been a further report from a committee chaired by Lord Benson, which has also been helpful. The Government believe that those reports do not go far enough and that it is necessary for auditors to recognise a duty to report evidence of fraud, when they come across it, to the relevant authorities. We think that it is necessary in certain instances for that evidence to be reported without first informing the directors of the company concerned.

In a few hours, the Financial Services Bill will be published. It establishes a number of additional protections for investors, some of which are sufficiently well known for me not to be breaking any confidence by revealing them at this stage. All investment businesses will have to be authorised. There will be at least one designated regulation agency, with a wide range of powers to enable the investment authorities to ensure effective regulation. There will be compensation schemes to protect investors. There will be powers for the Secretary of State and any designated agency to apply to the court for injunctions to counter breaches of the legislation and to obtain restitution orders designed to recover for investors money that has been obtained in contravention of the legislation or the rules. There will be wide powers of investigation for the Secretary of State and any designated agency. All these measures will go a long way towards creating a climate that will be hostile to those who set out to perpetrate fraud. The debate has concentrated on the detection and the prosecution of fraud—the prevention of fraud is, none the less, important. It is in that context that we see the importance of the Financial Services Bill.

I turn to the subject of Lloyd's and begin by making my position clear, as I undertook to do. I ceased all underwriting at Lloyd's on 2 September, the day on which I was appointed to the Government, as required by the rules for Ministers in my position. I accordingly resigned on that day from all syndicates in which I had previously participated. I have done exactly what the hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Mr. Sedgemore) suggested to the Prime Minister that I should do, except that I did it three months before he wrote to the Prime Minister about it. It is true that I remain a member of Lloyd's, but I have no further business there save for the running off of my pre-existing contracts.

Mr. Gould: The House will be grateful to the Minister for that explanation. As he has now made it clear that he was obliged to give up his membership, I think that he gives the lie to those of his hon. Friends who attempted to argue a little earlier that his position on this issue was no different from that of the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, who might own some agricultural land. Will he concede that what he has told the House is at variance with what his hon. Friends attempted to argue?

Mr. Howard: The arguments of my hon. Friends is on the record and those who examine it will form their own assessment of its validity.

I shall deal with the substantive issues which have been raised on Lloyd's. I do not propose to respond to the various matters which were aired by the hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch. He assures the House that he has drawn to the attention of the police all the information that is in his possession. The police are clearly the appropriate people to be in possession of the information to which the hon. Gentleman has referred. What he thinks he will achieve by using the privilege of the House to repeat that information, if it is in the hands of the police, is a matter that only the hon. Gentleman can answer.

Mr. Sedgemore: I am puzzled by what the Minister is saying. Lloyd's has a disciplinary machinery which it has not used in certain instances. Why is the Minister talking about the police? We are talking about Lloyd's making its own inquiries.

Mr. Howard: The hon. Gentleman assured the House earlier that he had put all the information in the hands of the police. He has said that he has done so, and I do not doubt that he has. However, I wonder why, having done that, and having ensured, so he tells us, that the information is in the hands of the police, he thinks it necessary and appropriate to use the privilege of the House to make various allegations.

Substantial progress has been made since the passage of the Lloyd's Act 1982 and the putting into place of the regulatory system under that measure, to establish an effective regulatory system at Lloyd's. It is too early to judge whether that system is sufficiently effective and one in which the Government can have sufficient confidence.

It may be appropriate to conclude by saying that the Government will not hesitate to take any action that is necessary to ensure that there is an effective regulatory system at Lloyd's. The Financial Services Bill, which is designed for entirely different purposes and to deal with a different area of concern—to set up a regulatory system to deal with investment business—is not, as we see it, the appropriate vehicle for that sort of action. If it is necessary to amend the Lloyd's Act 1982 to ensure that a proper regulatory system is set up, we shall not shrink from doing it, just as we have not shrunk from discharging our duty——

In accordance with MR. SPEAKER'S Ruling— [Official Report, 31 January 1983; Vol. 36, c. 19]—the debate was concluded.

Low-paid Workers (Incentives)

3.39 am

Mr. Andrew MacKay (Berkshire, East): Despite the lateness of the hour, it is important that the House be given an opportunity at the end of the year to debate the options which my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer might have in his 1986 Budget. I believe that that debate will continue throughout the country and the House for several weeks until my right hon. Friend rises in his place in March and tells an expectant nation how large the tax cuts will be. Because of the considerable economic recovery, which has now been sustained over a number of years, almost all neutral independent economic observers believe that the Chancellor will have room for substantial cuts in taxation in his next Budget.

I wish tonight to discuss some of the options available to the Chancellor. He has the option of cutting the basic rate of tax, the option of increasing thresholds, he could cut national insurance contributions for employers or employees, he could restrict any cuts in those contributions to the lower paid in the bottom three bands, or he could choose to have a lower rate of tax for those earning below average incomes.

I immediately dismiss the last option, because that would cause structural difficulties for the Inland Revenue, and therefore is not a practical option even though it is superficially attractive.

I and many of my hon. Friends believe that certain important factors must be considered when deciding on which option. We strongly believe that the the lower paid should obtain the maximum benefit from any cut in income tax or reduction in national insurance contributions. There are several reasons for that belief: first, it is a matter of equity, secondly, because it is in the interests of the economy; and, thirdly, because it will increase employment opportunities and encourage many of those who currently choose not to work to find employment.

Currently, the basic rate of tax is 30 per cent. The great majority of us, if we are not on the bottom two bands, pay a national insurance contribution of 9 per cent. I suggest that that, in practical terms, means that we are paying 39 per cent. tax at basic rate. I do not believe that people notice on their pay slips how their deductions are divided between taxation and national insurance contributions.

The Chancellor, in his imaginative Budget this year, set the precedent for a varying level of taxation by reducing to 7 per cent. the national insurance contribution paid by band 2 earners—those earning between £60 and £95 a week—and by reducing to 5 per cent. the contributions paid by band 1 earners — those earning under £60 a week. Therefore, their real tax is 37 per cent. and 35 per cent. respectively.

My hon. Friends and I believe that a sensible option would be, first, further to reduce the national insurance contributions that we are paying, and secondly, to increase the level of thresholds and not change the basic rate of tax. Let us assume for the sake of argument—and it is not an unreasonable assumption—that the Chancellor has £2·5 billion to play with, and that is a conservative estimate. We could allow a 6 per cent. rise in thresholds, which would take 500,000 workers out of having to pay tax, and, more important—because we should not by and large be in the business of taking people out of tax brackets altogether—it would help considerably many low-paid workers, who would then pay only a small amount of tax.

The other half of the £2·5 billion could be used for reducing national insurance contributions. We could cut contributions by 2 per cent. in band 1, 4 per cent. in band 2, and 6 per cent. in band 3. There would be real tax rates of 32 per cent., 34 per cent. and 36 per cent. together with the standard rate of 39 per cent., when including national insurance contributions.

The Chancellor, in his forceful and well-received speech at the Conservative party conference in October, hit a chord to which many people could respond when he referred to the single nurse earning £140 per week. He rightly said that deductions of tax and national insurance contributions amount to £41 per week, and her take-home pay is only £99 a week. If we reduced the basic rate of tax by 2 per cent., as many people suggest, that nurse would be only £2 a week better off. On the other hand, if we followed our proposals of reducing her national insurance contribution and raising thresholds, she would be £5 a week better off—in other words, over twice as much better off under our proposals.

There are dangers of fiddling with the basic rate of taxes, of helping the better off in the community, while the benefits to those whom we are most anxious to support, the lower paid, would be minimal. That is why we feel strongly that whatever assistance is available should go towards the lower paid as the most deserving in the community, who will improve employment prospects and the economy by having that extra boost.

3.46 am

Mr. Tim Yeo (Suffolk, South): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Berkshire, East (Mr. MacKay) on securing the debate and on the extremely eloquent way in which he put all the points that I was intending to make. I do not think that I would be betraying any confidence if I said that I have enjoyed working closely with him on the subject during the past few days and weeks, and with several other hon. Friends whom I am delighted to see in the Chamber at this early hour of the morning.

The concern of political parties about the problem of low pay is clearly illustrated by the number of hon. Members in the Chamber. There are no fewer than five Conservative Back Benchers present, but only one Labour Member and no Members on the Liberal and Social Democratic party Benches. That typifies the cynical way in which the latter two parties are willing apparently to express emotional concern about the problems of the low paid, but when they have the chance to take part in potentially a three-hour debate, they cannot produce a single representative, at a time when there is not even a by-election.

Ms. Clare Short (Birmingham, Ladywood): I make it clear that we in the Labour party have agreed that it is foolish for large numbers of us to stay up all night when there is no vote, and I shall speak for the Labour party. We are aware that a private argument is going on the Tory party. Staying up all night to make speeches on which there is no vote does not mean that there is a serious commitment to the low paid. The hon. Gentleman's points are cheap and have no significance.

Mr. Yeo: I find that a most extraordinary attitude towards the process of parliamentary debate. Any argument is far from private. We are having a constructive public discussion about some of the options open to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor. The fact that the alliance cannot produce one representative suggests a lack of real interest in this subject.

I endorse everything that my hon. Friend said. My experience during the past few months has convinced me of the political wisdom of following the route that he described. I have been struck during my constituency duties by the fact that people on average or even above average earnings, who would benefit substantially from a cut in the basic rate of tax, say as clearly as anyone that they believe that resources should be devoted to the low paid in the 1986 Budget.

Many people find that it is not worth their while taking up employment. I admit that it is often low paid, as many unemployed people's first opportunity of work is likely to be low paid. We are anxious that the next Budget helps them. My hon. Friend gave the example of the nurse earning £140 a week. Someone earning £100 a week provides an even more dramatic illustration. For such a person, a 2 per cent. cut in the basic rate of tax would be worth 60p, whereas our proposals would be worth £4·27 a week. Such a decision would be politically wise, and there is ample economic justification for it.

We are not advocating a specific level of tax relief. We do not know what the Chancellor's judgment will be. He does not know himself, as variable factors must be assessed nearer Budget day. Employment can be stimulated by means other than tax cuts—we must also consider employers' national insurance contributions. If they could be further reduced, the cost of employment would also be reduced. Other steps were initiated in the autumn statement. There is to be additional expenditure on housing, roads and hospital building, all of which is good for employment.

I am delighted that my hon. Friend the Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major) is the Minister who is to reply. His experience as a Whip means that he is quite familiar with my views on these issues. I should like to take this opportunity to congratulate him on achieving his new position. We are fortunate to have him here, because he has been deeply involved in the social security White Paper. If he had had the choice, I dare say he would not have chosen this morning to reply to a debate. He spoke of national insurance contributions only last week.

The changes introduced in last year's Budget were of historic proportions. The Budget introduced reduced rates in bands 1 and 2 for employees and in bands 1, 2 and 3 for employers. It has already done much to improve incentives for the low paid, and in 1986 we want to build on that start. If we follow the route that my hon. Friend the Member for Berkshire, East signposted, we shall target the available relief towards more than 6 million full-time adult workers, that is, those who earn up to £140 a week. It is a way of introducing a reduced rate of tax. I hope that during the coming weeks my hon. Friend the Member for Huntingdon and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will urge their colleagues in the Treasury to adopt that course.

Finally, I strongly welcome the social security White Paper proposals on family credit. My only anxiety is that the possible shift of child benefit from being paid directly to the mother may mean that some benefits will not reach her. As family credit is based on net rather than gross income, it represents a major step forward and opens the way for large-scale tax cuts at the lowest end, because those tax cuts will be partially self financing. The Government have a chance to move into a genuinely virtuous cycle. This is an important debate, and I commend my hon. Friend's ideas to the House.

3.55 am

Mr. Steve Norris (Oxford, East): If it was difficult for my hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, South (Mr. Yeo) to follow my hon. Friend the Member for Berkshire, East (Mr. MacKay), whom I congratulate on initiating this important debate, it is even more difficult for me to follow my hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, South. As my hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, South frankly pointed out, many hon. Members have worked on this subject for some time, and it is fairly obvious that our views generally accord and run along similar lines. I am encouraged that the foundation of my hon. Friend's logic on why it is important to direct any available spare finance in the next Budget follows exactly the same lines as mine. There are two strands of argument. One is about social equity, and the other is about the practical consequences of the measures available to the Chancellor.

I congratulate my hon. Friend on the excellent article called "Tax cuts that would make jobs" which was published in The Times of 16 December. All hon. Members will recognise that it was an important, and a welcome, contribution to the debate. My gloss on my hon. Friend's arguments is as follows. It may be uncomfortable for many Conservative Members to accept that a written answer on 29 March makes it clear in a stark and tabular form that the direct tax burden on a family of four who are on two thirds of average earnings has increased since 1978-79 by 10 per cent., while for the same family on 10 times average earnings the burden of taxation has fallen by 22 per cent. It is equally true that the highest marginal rates of tax — the sort of rates that used to have Conservative business men jumping up and down in the aisles — are more than 90 per cent., and are, sadly, being paid by the low paid. No Conservative Member could welcome that. I recognise that it is the product of a complex relation between tax and benefits, and that even those who find that the burden of tax on them is proportionately greater than it is on those on higher incomes are, nevertheless, in many ways significantly better off then in 1978-79. However, an unforeseen by-product of some of our more positive financial and fiscal changes was the present position, and the low paid now rightly demand our attention.

I endorse in the strongest possible terms the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, South about the extent to which, in Conservative circles, people who earn many times average earnings and for whom the concept of average earnings has no relevance are saying that they do not need reductions if the alternative is that the money can be better expended in alleviating the plight of the unemployed, creating jobs, and getting industry and the economy moving more quickly. It is to their credit that they say that.

This strand of representation made to me and to many hon. Members runs counter to the traditional, Labour-inspired image of Conservative business men as unmitigatedly venal and avaricious. The reality surprised many of us, but the message is clear and unequivocal: in terms of social equity, the point is accepted even by those who would have most to gain from the alternative—one among those put forward by my hon. Friend the Member for Berkshire, East—of a direct cut in tax rates.

[Mr. Steve Norris]

As powerful as the arguments about social equality, to which I hope I have added in some small way, are the arguments about the practical effectiveness of direct tax reduction as against threshold and national insurance adjustments. The hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) will forgive me if I indulge in some private grief this morning and discuss the fortunes of the Conservative party with some of my hon. Friends. It may be believed that reductions in income tax rates have a dramatic quality, in terms of their perception by the electorate, which make them especially valuable and desirable.

I question that conclusion. It has been my consistent experience that when the Government knock 1 per cent., 2 per cent., or even 7 to 8 per cent. off income tax, those who are paid on PAYE will find that almost no difference has been made to them. Therefore, even on the grounds of its supposed marketing effectiveness, I do not believe that the 2p argument—I am using 2p, because I agree that we should suggest a figure of £2·5 billion as being available to the Chancellor, because it is a figure that has been used before and because it is as convenient as any other for the purposes of this argument—bites at the level at which it is suggested it should.

In addition, what I know with even greater certainty and clarity, because it is a conclusion that I can draw for myself, is that while I am sure that every hon. Member welcomes 2p in the pound off tax and would not look a gift horse in the mouth, it will not get me to work much earlier than I do, nor will it make me stay there all that much longer. In addition to my duties in the House, I spend every other waking and breathing moment trying to earn a decent living. In so doing, the rate of tax that I pay is in common with that of a number of my hon. Friends—we seem to share much personal experience in the debate, never mind our confluence of thought.

I simply do not buy the argument that 2p off income tax will give the average business man the greater incentive with which he not only becomes richer, so the theory runs, but goes out, works harder, innovates, invests and produces more jobs at the end of the day. Unless I am mistaken, the thrust of the argument about incentives to the better off, to those with intitiative and entrepreneurial skill is that as one reduces tax and makes them perceive a greater reward for their labour, they are inspired to greater effort to work harder and, in so doing, to produce more jobs. I do not believe that that argument works in relation to the amount of money that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer is likely to have, on even the most optimistic forecasts of what is available for this year. I do not believe that 2p in the pound is effective as a mechanism either in terms of its marketing impact or of its impact on incentives.

Secondly—here I express a different view from some Labour Members as to its impact—I take the view that it is reasonable for any person on unemployment benefit, faced with the prospect of low-paid employment, to say that it is simply not worth his while taking a low-paid job at less — for example as a married man with two children—than £120 a week when that amount will be available on benefit. One of the most unhelpful and unrealistic comments that is occasionally heard from these Benches is that such people are drones on the system, and that they are morally reprehensible because they are seeking to live on benefit and not to get jobs.

If I were offered the choice between bringing into my household £120 in benefit for not working and any significant smaller amount if I took a low-paid job, I would be likely to take the former course, and I suspect that that is a rational and reasonable choice to make. In a positive sense, not a condescending or critical sense, I believe that the relationship between unemployment benefit and low paid jobs is crucial.

It follows that when my hon. Friends adduce the example, much quoted in the newspapers, of the nurse on £140 a week, I would infinitely prefer to see that nurse, if a single person, £5 a week better off as a result of adjustments to the national insurance rate and thresholds rather than be £1·90 better off if she gets a 2p tax reduction.

One always feels reticent about employing such a phrase, because it is hackneyed, but anybody who has employed people in low-paid jobs will recognise that a constructive contribution can be made by employers who are prepared to take on people in low-paid jobs. There are jobs that it is not worth an employer's while to offer if he has to pay high wages for them, but if he can offer a real, realistic wage for them that can allow him to be profitable it will at least enable him to offer some person, perhaps on a part-time basis, employment at a low wage. Such jobs exist, and the money that an employer is prepared to pay out is as real as any other amount of wages that he is prepared to pay.

Therefore, it is of crucial importance to recognise that the trigger mechanism of national insurance which operates not necessarily at the top band but at the £35·50 and the £55 marker on present rates is a significant factor in determining what kind of low-paid employment will be offered. National insurance is different in this respect from the thresholds. The irony is that this is because it is in the interests of both employers and employees that wages should be kept below the trigger figures. Above those figures one reaches the ridiculous position that one earns an extra 50p but loses £2. That cannot be sensible.

The longer-term goal is the complete reform of national insurance charges. If one were to delve into the matter, I suspect that one would find that there is no significant justification for the principle of national insurance charges. The principle that there is any direct relationship between what one pays and and what one gets out of the system has been blown to smithereens time after time by successive Chancellors of the Exchequer, of either political colour. The crucial argument about triggers is whether their impact will encourage or discourage employment. Anybody who has offered salaries or wages of around that figure knows that they are a discouragement.

Last year my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said frequently and, I thought, to some considerable effect, particularly at Budget time, that her concern was to address precisely the anomaly that my hon. Friends and I have addressed this evening: that there is a significant number of people who, quite rightly, do not seek employment and who, for other reasons, may not be offered employment by employers because of the mismatch between the social security arrangement, such as it is, the taxation arrangements and the availability of low-paid employment. That was a crucial part of my right hon. Friend's explanation of the Budget strategy last year. I hope that the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security, my hon. Friend the Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major), will convey to my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer the view that what was good for the country 12 months ago in relation to this argument is good now.

To that may I add a final rider. To imagine that either the mood of the nation, or the logic of the argument, or the rules of arithmetic have changed in the last 12 months would be a profound misjudgment, the consequences of which would be extraordinarily far-reaching for this Government.

4.13 am

Mr. Bowen Wells (Hertford and Stortford): I believe that in this debate we are addressing one of the most crucial and difficult matters that could be discussed at this time in the morning. I join in congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Berkshire, East (Mr. MacKay) on raising this subject for debate. His heretical views have been echoed by my hon. Friends the Members for Suffolk, South (Mr. Yeo) and for Oxford, East (Mr. Norris). I join them also in welcoming the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security, my hon. Friend the Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major), to his post. It is the first time that I have spoken in a debate when he has been sitting on the Treasury Bench. I congratulate him upon his appointment. We are glad that such a sensitive, sensible person is holding that position at this particular time.

The really important issue that has to be addressed is one of the absurdities of our national life today. My hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East said that it would be logical and sensible for a married man with two children to remain on benefit rather than to work. That is because we have not tackled the inter-relationship between our tax system and our benefits system. The Conservative party, in the run-up to the general election in 1970 and during the lifetime of that Government, have had as one of its objectives the establishment of a system that took account of both the tax system and the social security system. We have lamentably failed to follow that argument through, but we must continue to aim for that solution. It is crucial to getting employment going, particularly for young people, and to providing the human energy necessary to expand the nation's economy. That is why this discussion is so important.

The review by the Department of Health and Social Security was heralded as the "new Beveridge", but it does not take account of the fact that child benefit is paid universally regardless of need and it does not tackle the stupidity of paying supplementary benefit to people leaving school at 16 years of age. If we do not tackle those issues, we cannot begin to tackle the whole crucial problem.

If we fail to combine the social security and tax systems and compound that by trying, through a miasma of seeking popular support by reducing the tax rate from 30 per cent. to 28 or 25 per cent., we are seriously mistaken.

We must remove from tax large numbers of people in the lower income tax brackets. But we have no mechanism by which we can do that. If we raise income tax bands, we shall benefit the whole of the tax-paying community. That is desirable, but it is not crucial to those on above average earnings. The higher the earnings, the more senseless that becomes. We have no mechanism by which we can pinpoint taxpayers in the lower bands. That is because we have not related the social security system to the income tax system.

We must certainly use the thresholds and the fact that the employees' national insurance contribution has been increased by the Government, resulting in the absurdity of increases in tax for the lower paid. I support my hon. Friend the Member for Berkshire, East in saying that we must adopt a mixture of increased thresholds and decreased national insurance contributions for employees.

I hope that we have an imaginative Budget. The Chancellor of the Exchequer wants to reform the tax system . I hope that his Green Paper shows how far he is prepared to adopt radical solutions. I hope that we can establish a mechanism that will allow us to take the low paid out of tax to make it worth their while to go to work and to use their brains and energy to expand the country's wealth so that we can afford social security benefits for those truly in need.

While my wife and I enjoy drawing child benefit and spending it without having to pay tax, we do not need it, yet there are men and women looking after children on their own who need double the child benefit amount to provide a decent standard for themselves and their children. It is absurd that we should still be giving child benefit free of tax to households such as mine — the same must apply to the majority of hon. Members — without giving adequate benefit to those who are truly in need.

We should make it our objective — an honourable objective that would attract the support of the vast majority of people — to produce an equitable tax and social security system that gave an amount of which we could be proud to those in need. We would, in the process, make it more profitable for people to go to work and provide for their families.

4.21 am

Mr. Lewis Stevens (Nuneaton): I join others in congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Berkshire, East (Mr. MacKay) on choosing this important topic for debate. In addition, I congratulate the Minister and his Department on the social security review that has been conducted and the White Paper that has recently been produced.

That White Paper looked at the possibility of putting all types of benefit on the same basis. It also uses the net income for income support and family credit systems, rather than the gross wage, which has in the past caused distortions. That may conflict somewhat with the view that some of us have in relation to tax benefits for the low paid, in that they may lose benefit under the new system compared with the present gross wage.

That, however, is for the future—because the new system does not take effect until 1988—and it is now, or at least in the next Budget, that we seek benefits for the low paid. We urge the Chancellor to increase the thresholds and reduce national insurance contributions, particularly for the three low bands. That would achieve benefit for people on low pay, and we must concentrate on that section.

Reference was made to the nurse on £140 a week gaining by £5 through tax threshold changes, as against gaining £2 through a 2p standard rate reduction. It is more beneficial for those on £60 to £70 a week. The proportion that they gain is most important to them, remembering the total amount on which they must live.

[Mr. Lewis Stevens]

People often become confused in that connection. Because people are in receipt of a low wage, it is thought that they automatically get family income supplement, but that is not the case. They may not qualify for that benefit. The position is that people who earn more and pay higher rates of tax all benefit by roughly the same, in cash terms, on the tax side, but not on the national insurance side. Because of that, we should be directing benefit to the low paid. We want people to be encouraged to work, especially the young, and it has been pointed out that, for various reasons, many youngsters have tended to price themselves out of work. The situation is changing for the better, but if that is true they will form quite a large part of the low paid. They will not receive benefits, and so young people need more encouragement.

Pensioners form another group that may be helped by altering thresholds. When they receive a state pension plus a small private pension, they may find themselves having to pay niggling little bits of tax. It is important to remove as many of those people as possible from the tax bracket.

According to the autumn statement, if my right hon. Friend the Chancellor goes along with an indexation of the thresholds in all cases, that will cost about £1·25 billion. The figure of £2·5 billion has been mentioned, which would be double. However, I would go further. It would not matter if we did not increase all the thresholds and increased only those of the personal allowances; in other words, the bottom threshold for the single person and the married person's allowance.

Why should the married person's allowance go up automatically? There may be a case, although perhaps not in this Budget, for looking more closely at the benefits of the married man's allowance and considering whether it should not be an allowance for those who work. Perhaps non-working dependent wives could have some special tax concession. At the moment, some people have a double advantage. I am not suggesting that it should go back to the Exchequer, but it should be distributed across the thresholds. Again, that would have the benefit of pushing the threshold as high as possible. It is still very low.

A single person starts to pay tax on earnings of about £40 a week. Below that figure such a person is already paying national insurance contributions. When earnings reach half the average, at about £90 a week, there is a lot of taxable income in that chunk. By pushing up the tax threshold we improve the situation of that group.

A large number of low earners are in jobs where they are likely to remain low paid. People can move through the different strata, and many of the Government training initiatives have given great encouragement to people to retrain to move out of those lower brackets, but it is still a relatively low wage for such a large proportion. For a single person on half average earnings the figure is about 25 per cent. That is a substantial amount of tax to pay, with national insurance included. The more we can move our tax position away from that £40 level, the more will people be encouraged into lower paid jobs.

The self-employed will also be encouraged. It is easy to think of the self-employed as well off. The enterprise allowance lasts only 12 months. It is not an indefinite subsidy and they are not necessarily earning a lot of money. In those early years they would benefit from such an increased threshold. We sometimes forget how important the self-employed are. That might encourage people to have a go. They might think that it is worth while to work for themselves if there is a lower tax penalty.

Many years ago, when the west midlands was a very prosperous area, it was not uncommon for people to say that overtime was not worth doing because the taxman took all the money. I am sure that the same could be said about some jobs today. It is discouraging, and anything that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor can do in the Budget to improve the lot of the low paid—to give them better opportunities and some extra money to achieve a real improvement in their standard of living—will be well worth while. Moreover, because the money will go to the lowest paid it will almost inevitably be transmitted directly into goods and services, thus increasing the demand for products, with consequent effects on employment. I believe that that is what we ought to do and I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Berkshire, East on raising the subject today.

4.30 am

Ms. Clare Short (Birmingham, Ladywood): Despite the lateness of the hour, I welcome this opportunity to debate incentives for the low paid. I am sorry to break the mood of mutual self-congratulation among the Conservatives, but I am surprised at the narrow attitude that they have taken, isolating the taxation aspect only and not considering the cumulative effect of Government policies on the low paid which has been to drive many more workers into poverty since 1979.

Even on the narrow tax point, the House should appreciate that, despite the 1985 Budget being heralded as a Budget for jobs, there has been only a marginal impact on the large increase in tax burdens faced by low-paid workers since 1979 and a negligible effect on the poverty trap. Despite increasing the tax threshold beyond the rate of inflation for the second consecutive year, the overall tax burden for those on low and average earnings remains significantly higher than it was before the Government took office in 1979.

Because increases in tax thresholds are worth much more to higher rate taxpayers, the 1985 Budget continued the trend of earlier Conservative Budgets in concentrating the benefit of tax concessions on those with already high incomes. The average cut in income tax since 1979 has been £246 per week for a person earning more than £50,000 per year, but for low wage earners it has been little more than £1 per week, which is immediately wiped out by the increases in indirect taxation in the 1985 Budget alone. Therefore, we have a very long way to go before we even get back to where we were in 1979 in terms of the effect of taxation on the low paid. The situation is actually very much worse than that, and concentrating on the narrow point of taxation will not cater for the needs of the low paid in Britain today.

As I said in my intervention, Labour Members welcome the chance to discuss low pay and I discussed with some of my comrades whether it was worth their while to stay up late to put our view. Ever since I was a civil servant and had to run around waking Ministers to reply to debates on the Consolidated Fund, I have taken the view that this is one of our sillier ways of organising our business and, as Labour Members all agree, in our view on the subject of low pay I believe that it is better for other Labour Members to go home to bed so as to work more efficiently for their constituents or do their Christmas shopping rather than sitting here debating at great length and repeating one another. I should therefore make it absolutely clear to Conservative Members that lack of attendance on the part of Labour Members implies no lack of commitment to the low paid.

Mr. Norris: I hope that the hon. Lady is not suggesting that those Conservative Members who are present are in some way in dereliction of their duty to their constituents.

Ms. Short: Indeed not. I would not wish to suggest that for a minute. I am aware that a healthy argument is going on within the Conservative party, and I respect those within that party who are willing to give up their sleep to press the case for the low paid upon their uncaring Government. I do not for a minute suggest that those Conservative Members who are present are neglecting their duties in any way.

The Opposition want to put on record the fact that we are aware that the increase in poverty wages in Britain since 1979 is no accident. It has been a deliberate part of the Government's philosophy to increase the disparity in incomes between the rich and the poor, and they have been enormously successful in achieving that aim.

One of their methods has been to increase massively the rate of unemployment, which has made workers in secure trade unions weak, as a result of which they have accepted lower pay. From 1979 to the present time, unemployment has increased from 1·2 million to 4 million, and that has caused enormous hurt to individuals and incredible economic waste.

During this period, the rich have got richer and the poor have got poorer. The figures are startling. The proportion of adult men working in manual jobs for low pay—defined as two thirds of average income, which is the internationally recognised definition of low pay—has more than doubled since 1979 from one in 10 to one in five. For full-time women in manual jobs, the proportion on low pay has increased from 66 per cent. to more than 75 per cent. In total, the proportion of all adult workers, including part-timers, earning poverty pay has increased from 36 per cent. to 41 per cent.

The pay of young workers has fallen by almost a third, while youth unemployment has doubled. The poorest tenth of male workers have seen their real pay fall by 5 per cent. while unemployment has trebled to well over 3 million. Low-paid workers are worse off now in real terms than they were in 1886.

As for the high paid, the best paid tenth have received real pay increases of 13 per cent. In 1984, the pay of the top 100 company directors rose by 25 per cent. following an increase of 61 per cent. between 1981 and 1983. The chairman of ICI was given a 68 per cent. pay rise in March 1985, taking his salary from £171,000 to £287,000 a year—and increase of £2,200 a week.

According to the Financial Times on 20 July 1985,

"the pay of chief executives in industry has recently gone up very fast and in a good many cases bears little relation to performance".

The top directors of former nationalised industries which the Government have privatised have given themselves average pay rises of more than 85 per cent. in two years, In British Telecom, top pay has gone up from £68,000 to £160,000; and in Amersham International, from £30,000 to £130,000. On top of this pay windfall the Government have given the high paid generous income tax cuts amounting on average to £246 a year compared with a mere £1·06 a week for the low paid.

That is a pattern of an enormous increase in income and cuts in tax for the very highly paid, but the very reverse for the low paid. This redistribution is quite deliberate, and the Government have taken a series of measures to bring it about.

Mr. Lewis Stevens: Is not the hon. Lady aware that during the time of the last Labour Government the real pay of many industrial workers dropped very rapidly, particularly in the car industry in the west midlands, where relative pay dropped rapidly during the early 1970s.

Ms. Short: I am aware that there were some difficulties under the last Labour Government in the west midlands, but the people there who used to work in the car industry do not work at all now. All the figures that I have quoted of relative movements in pay since 1979 stand absolutely. It is no good the hon. Member referring back to the previous Labour Government. Under the two successive Tory Governments since 1979 there has been a massive redistribution in favour of the rich and away from the poor. Inequality in Britain for those in work, let alone the unemployed, has increased massively. It has been deliberate and is part of the Government's philosophy and ideology. They have gone to enormous trouble to try to drive down the wages of the lowest paid.

The Government have abolished the fair wages resolution which existed in Britain since Victorian times to ensure that contractors bidding for Government contracts would not bid each other down by offering lower wages. It has had bipartisan support until recently, when the Government got rid of it.

The Government introduced the young workers' scheme. It is now to be abolished because it has been so unsuccessful. The Government have been paying a huge subsidy of £15 a week to anyone who would employ a young worker at less than £50 a week. The scheme has been heavily criticised by the Public Accounts Committee because it is so wasteful and because 80 per cent. of the jobs so subsidised would have existed anyway. Its whole purpose has been to drive down young people's wages.

The youth training scheme has been used in exactly the same way. In some of our arguments across the Chamber about the youth training scheme, Conservative Members have deliberately misunderstood our criticism. We all share the aim of improving the training system, but we do not share the aim of using schemes for the young unemployed to drive down the wages of young workers.

If the old youth opportunities programme allowance had been uprated in line with inflation, it would now be about £40 a week. The youth training scheme currently pays £27·50. The community programme for the long-term unemployed has been used in exactly the same way.

Mr. Norris: One matter that the hon. Lady raised which has always concerned me greatly is the idea that young workers—those serving their apprenticeship or just out of it—can realistically expect pay which is very closely related, as my hon. Friend the Member for Nuneaton (Mr. Stevens) will confirm, in engineering at least, to the pay of a fully skilled man with 10 or 15 years' experience.

[Mr. Norris]

I hope that the hon. Lady will recognise the genuine difficulty that an employer who is faced with the prospect of either paying 90 per cent. of the skilled rate to a lad who has only just finished his apprenticeship, or paying 100 per cent. of the skilled rate to someone who has 10 or 15 years' experience is almost certain to say that it is not worth his while to go through the apprenticeship process, because he is much better off, in terms of sheer productivity, in taking the fully skilled person.

Is it not in the interests of young people in the long term that we should recognise that experience after qualification and after apprenticeship or training scheme counts for a good deal, and that there has to be a realistic differentiation between the wage rates paid at qualification and after considerable industrial experience?

Ms. Short: I agree absolutely with the hon. Gentleman that there has to be a difference between the wage rate paid to the trainee and that paid to the fully qualified and experienced worker, but I do not agree that we have that problem. It is another of the myths that have been propagated so assiduously by the Government. All the studies of levels of youth unemployment and its relationship to wage levels show that movements in wages levels are not the explanation of the great rise in youth unemployment. The rise in youth unemployment parallels absolutely but rises faster than the general rise in unemployment. Indeed, when unemployment is falling, youth unemployment falls more rapidly.

There is no way in which the movement of wage levels for young people in Britain can explain the ups and downs from the 1950s onwards of youth unemployment in Britain. That myth has been put about and the Government went to a lot of trouble to commission research to try to prove their case — they were unsuccessful — and to undermine the famous Makeham study, which is the authoritative study in this area. I agree with the broad principle but not with the implication that the movement in youth wage levels explains high levels of youth unemployment.

Just as the Government have used the youth training scheme to work on the degradation of young people so that they take work, accept low allowances and receive a general rate for a job—they are levering young people down — the community programme has been used to work on the desperation of the long-term unemployed to try to lever down acceptable rates for the adult unemployed. Recently, yet another scheme was announced. It parallels the young workers' scheme and is to be called the job start scheme. It will be piloted in January in six areas. The new scheme will pay £20 a week to an adult worker who has been out of work for 12 months or more if he accepts a wage of less then £80 a week. One million workers work for less than £80 a week. It is a myth that reducing wages will generate jobs.

The Government's proposals on wage councils will exempt young people from their protection and weaken the protection afforded to adults. Recently, the regional low pay units conducted a competition to discover which unit had the lowest paid worker on its books. The west midlands won the competition with an Asian female machinist working in a factory for 15p an hour. That is how bad conditions are getting in Britain generally and in the west midlands in particular.

Another measure that has been adopted to bring about more low pay is the cut in the wages inspectorate. This is an incentive to employers not to pay the minimum legally required rates. The number of people who are not paid the legal rates has increased. Privatisation is part of the process. It saves money if it is used to get workers to do the same job for much lower wages. That is the pattern throughout Britain.

It has been suggested that there is a problem in providing incentives to work and that benefits are so high that large numbers of people are not willing to work. That does not stand up to scrutiny. For example, when the Department of Health and Social Security, the Treasury and the Department of Employment were giving evidence to the Select Committee on the Treasury and Civil Service in 1982, they all agreed that the vast majority of people were better off in work than out of work. Large numbers of people work for wages lower than the amounts that they would receive in benefits because of the sense of commitment to the dignity of work.

Another excuse is the argument that cutting wages will create jobs. The Government have made an enormous effort to prove that thesis but have been unsuccessful. In a consultative paper on wages council abolition or reform —"reform" should be read as meaning "weakening"— the Government referred to a Treasury paper on the relationship between employment and wages and suggested that it provided proof that a cut in wages would increase employment. That whole document is entirely disreputable. In "Pay and Jobs", Treasury Economic Progress Report, No. 174, January 1985, the Treasury suggested "as a rule of thumb that if money wages were to grow less rapidly so that real wages were one per cent. less than otherwise, the gain in jobs might ultimately be between ½ per cent. and 1 per cent., that is between 110,000 and 220,000 jobs".

The Select Committee on Employment was sceptical of those estimates, and said:

"The results of the econometric exercises underlying the argument used in the evidence submitted are not of themselves sufficiently convincing without strongly supporting evidence."

Treasury officials admitted that

"the simulation results depend critically on a system of adjustments which is entirely arbitrary and has no empirical basis. Without this system of adjustments the model would have produced a smaller rise in company sector expenditure on stock building and employment, and on dividend payments, and hence a smaller rise in employment."

I realise that it is late in the night to quote such a serious document, but that document, which is so flawed, is the theoretical basis for the Government's case that cuts in wages will create more jobs. That case does not stand up to scrutiny.

Nevertheless, the Government continue to pursue that policy. Conservative Members have referred to the 1985 Budget with approval. The new lower national insurance rates are thought to be encouraging employment but, instead, they have brought in a series of new poverty traps for low-paid workers. When they move up slightly from one wage level to another, they move into a higher band of national insurance. The system provides new poverty traps and I am sure that it was designed to do so. It is designed to hold workers down in lower bands of pay, and it will do that successfully. The move from family income supplement to family credit, which is proposed in the White Paper on social security, will undoubtedly encourage more low pay by paying the benefit to the worker through the employer instead of direct through the DHSS.

Mr. Yeo: When the Labour Government were in office they had an employers' rate of national insurance contributions running at over 13 per cent., including the surcharge, compared with the 5 per cent. to which the Government have reduced the rate for the lowest paid. Was the Labour Government's policy likely to encourage employers to pay higher or lower wages?

Ms. Short: I can tell the hon. Gentleman that when the Labour Government left office in 1979 unemployment stood at 1·2 million. That is when the Conservative party fought an election under the slogan "Labour isn't working". If we calculate unemployment on the same basis now, 4 million are unemployed. His argument does not stand up to scrutiny.

I was saying that the new family credit that will replace FIS is likely to be an incentive to even more low pay. It will be paid by employers to workers, and as employers become familiar with the scheme they will realise that if they bring workers into a low-paid category their wages will be subsidised through the state. Experience will tell us whether that happens, but it seems enormously likely that it will.

The Government have set out deliberately—it is part of their ideology—to increase inequality in Britain. They argue that this will create incentives and increase efficiency. It is a strange argument and it has been said frequently that it rests on the assumption that to get the rich to work harder they have to be paid more, and to get the poor to work harder they have to be paid less.

The position is serious for many working people. It should be understood that 35 per cent. of Britain's poor are working poor. The percentage has increased under the Government. The small issue to which Conservative Members have drawn attention is only a small part of the problem and will not solve the problem of low pay. We need to consider a series of measures to deal with it. We need to develop a strategy that seeks seriously to bring us back to full employment. We need to move towards a national minimum wage. We must increase child benefit rather than cut it. That was the call of Conservative Members.

The road that we are on is leading us to a low-paid, divided and inefficient sweat-shop economy. The one small improvement that Conservative Members called for will not succeed in reversing that trend.

4.59 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. John Major): Before I take up some of the contentious matters raised by the hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short), I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Berkshire, East (Mr. MacKay) on raising an important subject and on the manner in which he did so. Perhaps his only failure was to come fourth in the ballot rather than first. I wish him slightly better luck next year, so that we may conduct the debate at a slightly earlier hour of the morning.

My hon. Friend, and my hon. Friends the Members for Suffolk, South (Mr. Yeo), for Oxford, East (Mr. Norris), for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells) and for Nuneaton (Mr. Stevens), together with the hon. Member for Ladywood, touched on a number of issues with clarity and conviction.

The hon. Lady at the beginning of her remarks referred to what she called a mood of mutual self-congratulation among my hon. Friends. I must tell her, with the best of good will, that it was not mutual self-congratulation, but unanimity that she perceived among my hon. Friends. I can understand why she, as a member of the Labour party, does not recognise unanimity. However, for the Conservative party it is a fairly familiar sensation. She may have noticed that this evening, both in their concern about the issue and in some of the solutions that they proposed.

The Government share the concern that my hon. Friends expressed about the importance of incentives for the low paid. Our concern is reflected not just in words but across a wide range of Government policies, all of which indicate clearly that we respect what the hon. Lady called the dignity of work, and wish, so far as we can, to price people into it.

My hon. Friends spoke of tax and national insurance changes. They know that a considerable amount has been done in those respects in recent years. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor has diminished the burden of income tax both by cutting the basic and higher rates and by substantially raising personal allowances. Indeed, the last Budget—which was referred to on a number of occasions—included the fourth successive real increase in tax thresholds. As a result, personal allowances are now above 20 per cent. higher in purchasing power than they were in 1978-79. I suggest that that is welcome easement that has been of particular help to the low paid, and which has taken 1·25 million of the lower paid entirely out of tax—with, I hope, the support of every hon. Member, from whatever party.

I rather regret that the hon. Lady neglected to mention those matters in her lamentable catalogue, which lasted for more than 20 minutes, of the Government's alleged sins. Much of what she said was highly contentious. She certainly included some quite extraordinary assertions. If I understood her correctly, she said that low-paid workers were worse off today than in 1886. I can only say that if she really believes that, she has entered a fantasy world from which no words of mine will rescue her.

Ms. Clare Short: I wish to correct the Minister. I began my speech by referring to the 1985 Budget and the changes that it made, and said that it still failed to bring low-paid workers back to as good a position as they were in 1979, and that they are still more highly taxed than they were in 1979. Those were the remarks with which I began my speech.

Mr. Major: I shall regard that as something rather less than a wholehearted endorsement of the Government's taking 1·25 million people out of tax. I have nothing to add on that point.

I hope that the hon. Lady will understand that many of her contentious remarks at this late hour are matters which I do not wish to pursue as, quite frankly, they do not enter the real world of politics which any party in government must face. I understand the hon. Lady's difficulties in dealing with many of the matters that she must face to keep her position within her party. Frankly, she should not make the sort of assertions that she made this evening without producing more practical evidence. When and if she can produce evidence to back her assertion that workers in 1886 were better off than workers today, I shall take more seriously some of her other remarks.

[Mr. Major]

My hon. Friends will know that this autumn the Government introduced a new graduated structure of national insurance contributions which, again, are designed especially to help the low paid. They have been a matter of some comment during our debate this evening. Those tax and national insurance incentives, which have particularly concerned my hon. Friends, raise the opportunity for employers to take more people into employment and for people in employment to keep a larger share of the salary that they earn.

My hon. Friends will know also of the enterprise allowance scheme, giving new incentives for the unemployed to set up in business for themselves, and of the job start initiative, which will commence on a pilot basis next month, with the intention of giving a new incentive to the long-term unemployed to get back into employment. They will also know that earlier this week my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services introduced the White Paper on social security reform, which incorporates the new family credit scheme, designed both to improve work incentives and to make the connection between work and the family's overall oncome in work more visible than hitherto. All those measures, in their separate ways, are part of a clear thrust of policy to improve incentives and ensure that we diminish, and if possible entirely remove, barriers to employment.

National insurance contributions, which have been the subject of some discussion, are of great importance. I share the view of my hon. Friends that the new contribution structure is one of the most imaginative initiatives taken in recent years. It was announced in last year's Budget. It should assist dramatically in pricing people back into jobs. I am pleased at the warm welcome that has been given to the measures — and I acknowledge that the hon. Member for Ladywood welcomed them as well — as I share the view of my hon. Friends that they represent a substantial, cost-effective and well-targeted boost for the low paid.

My hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, South called them historic measures, and I am inclined to agree. They will improve employment prospects, increase net take-home pay and sharpen incentives. I suspect that they will be particularly helpful for the young looking for their first full-time job. In total, those measures for low-paid employees are worth about £1,150 million in a full year.

In addition, we have made a considerable reduction in the contribution rate for self-employed people, which is worth a further £100 million a year. My hon. Friend the Member for Nuneaton referred to that. I hope that he will be pleased that we have also allowed tax relief on half the class 4 profit-related contributions payable by the self-employed. It is pertinent to remind the House that self-employment often lifts people out of unemployment. The national insurance measures that I have listed represent a considerable incentive to people to start up in business on their own account.

The effect of the proposed changes in employers' contributions is to reduce by up to £3 per week the cost of employing over 8·5 million low-paid workers. For the lowest paid the reduction in employers' national insurance contributions is almost 5·5 per cent., which is a considerable incentive to the creation of employment. Estimates made, not by the Government, but by private industry, are that between 140,000 and 400,000 jobs may be created as a result of that initiative. I hope that that proves to be the case, although I emphasise that that is not a Government estimate. In any event, there is little doubt that those measures will make a substantial difference to the employment prospects of many people.

The effect of the parallel changes to employees' contributions is to give increases to net income ranging from £1·10 a week to £2·18 a week to nearly 3·5 million workers earning less than £90 a week. As hon. Members will know, only last week we debated the Social Security (Contributions, Re-rating) Order, which further increased the bands of earnings over which the reduced rate national insurance contributions will be paid. Therefore, only six months after the new reduced rates were announced, the draft order will extend further up the earnings scale the advantages that they offer to both employers and employees. That is further evidence—if it is needed—of our wish to produce a more responsive and better targeted national insurance system and provide positive incentives for people to take up low-paid work and for employers to offer jobs to those who at present, unfortunately, do not have them.

Another beneficial effect of the graduated rates of contribution is that it reduces the much criticised "cliff edge" effect of the lower earnings limit. There is now a much more gradual increase in contribution liability as someone progresses up the earnings scale. I hope that that principle will earn the support of my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East, who touched on that point in his remarks.

It is worth considering who will gain from our measures. Just under 1 million families with children gain at least £1 a week, and some gain more than £2 a week. Nearly 1·25 million single people aged between 16 and 25 gain between £1·10 and £2·18 a week. About 30 per cent. of gains go to families with children, and just under half go to low-paid single people, who are predominantly under 25. One third of gains go to working wives. Those figures show how wide ranging and beneficial the measures are. They should be further enhanced when the new contribution limits and earnings brackets come into effect next April.

It is clear that there is fairly wide agreement that take-home pay is what matters to many employees. My hon. Friend the Member for Berkshire, East is aware that the Government have taken, and are taking, important steps to minimise deductions, especially from the pay of those on lower earnings. Despite that clear direction in our policy, I know that my hon. Friends will not be surprised if I decline to speculate on what steps my right hon. Friend the Chancellor might take in the Budget. Such matters are for him, and contributions are matters for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State.

I suspect that my hon. Friends are too wise to expect a detailed response to their advocacy of Budgetary and tax matters. I believe that they were anxious to put their views on the record. The fact that they have done so at such an unappealing hour of the morning illustrates, perhaps more clearly than their words, the depth of their concern. I assure them that I shall draw what they have said to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor, but I must mention the cautionary words of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister. It might well be wise not to assume tax reductions of any sort until they are delivered.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford mentioned tax and social security integration. He has passed me a note explaining why he had to leave the House and go home.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): He is tired.

Mr. Major: The hon. Gentleman might well be right, but that is not the explanation that my hon. Friend gave in his most courteous note.

Mr. Corbyn: Tell all.

Mr. Major: Discretion is occasionally by far the better part of valour. Perhaps that is true on this occasion.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford will know that we have announced steps that will lead to closer co-ordination between the tax and social security systems. The move to an April benefit uprating is clearly important in that context. At a practical level, we are ensuring compatibility between the computer systems being developed for tax and benefit offices.

The plan announced in the social security White Paper to pay the new family credit with wages represents a small but important step towards closer co-operation between the two systems. If we are ever to have closer integration, payment through the pay packet is an essential first step. Consideration of what further steps to take will have to await the Green Paper on personal taxation, which will appear in the next few months.

I have so far talked of only one side of the incentives equation. We are not trying to improve the incentive of the low paid only through improvements in tax and contributions, desirable though they may be. We are taking important new initiatives to provide help in other ways. Perhaps the most important example is the new social security structure, including the family credit scheme for low-paid working families with children, which we announced in the White Paper earlier this week.

I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, South for his warm welcome of the scheme. We believe that family credit will be a significantly more generous and better targeted benefit than the family income supplement which it will replace. We estimate that it will reach about 415,000 families—rather more than twice as many as those which receive FIS.

The levels of benefit will also be significantly more generous than the levels of benefit for FIS. A couple with two young children, and gross earnings of £110 a week, receive £4·50 a week FIS, plus free school meals or milk. Under the family credit proposals they would receive £17·40 a week — a substantial improvement. That illustrates that working families with children emerge from the reform package announced earlier this week as clear gainers, even when the changes in housing costs are taken into account.

I shall make that clearer with two brief examples. First, a couple with two young children who rent their home and earn £110 a week, would gain £10·45 a week net from the changes, even when their housing costs are taken into account. Secondly, a couple on the same gross earnings who own their home and have two older children would end up £8·15 a week better off overall. It is beyond dispute that those are substantial gains.

The social security reforms will be seen in due course to do a great deal to improve work incentives, especially by minimising the unemployment and poverty traps, and maximising the advantages of work, even work at relatively low pay. I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Nuneaton for his kind words about the White Paper.

One attractive aspect of the reform proposals is that they significantly ease the unemployment trap by creating a better balance between the help available to familis in and out of work. One element of the reform of housing benefit, for example, is designed to ensure that the same level of help goes to recipients at a given income level, whether in or out of work. As hon. Members will be aware, at present unemployed people on supplementary benefit generally have their rent and rates paid in full. However, the assessment of housing benefit payable to employed people with precisely the same level of income is based on only 60 per cent. of their rent and rates. That is clearly a curious and unfair anomaly, which will be corrected under the new proposals, under which assistance will be given with up to 100 per cent. of rent and 80 per cent. of rates, whether in or out of work.

The major element, however, is ending FIS and replacing it with family credit. The merits are clearly illustrated by the examples that I gave about the net disposable income of families under the two schemes. My hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East spoke with feeling about high marginal tax rates. He will be pleased to know that the White Paper reforms also end the worst aspect of the poverty trap—that absurd circumstance where reduced benefits, together with higher tax and national insurance contributions, can leave a family worse off overall when it increases its gross earnings.

This major improvement in work incentives will be achieved by assessing entitlement to both family credit and housing benefit on income after tax and national insurance contributions have been taken into account. Similarly, by replacing benefits in kind with cash we will not only enable working families on low earnings to provide for their families in the same way as their more highly paid colleagues, but we will end the particularly acute poverty trap problems which now arise when earnings reach the point at which entitlement to passported benefits ceases.

I recognise that by eliminating marginal tax rates of 100 per cent. or more, which are absurd and have been widely criticised, not least this evening, and which the reforms will achieve, and by providing help to a wider range of families, more families will face marginal tax rates below 100 per cent. but still, alas, at relatively high levels. As I think most commentators and every hon. Member will recognise, that is probably unavoidable if we are to target more of our available resources on those most in need.

I should add a brief cautionary word about some of the estimates that we have seen in the press about the numbers likely to be affected. The number of families with children on marginal tax rates of 100 per cent. or more would decrease from about 70,000 to nil, while the number with rates of 90 per cent. or more would fall from about 130,000 to about 40,000. The number with a rate of 70 per cent. or more would not surprisingly, increase from about 240,000 to about 490,000.

The White Paper proposals will also significantly improve the climate in which decisions on whether to work, and how hard to work, are taken. In place of the present complex range of benefits, the reforms will establish a simpler structure in which the advantages of work will be self-evident. Few families would have any advantage in remaining unemployed. Once in work, it would always pay a family to increase its effort and its earnings.

[Mr. Major]

Paying the family credit with wages will not only take a significant step towards the closer harmonisation of tax and social security but will make more visible the relationship between work and the total income, including the credit, which can be derived from work. It will end the absurd position where a family on relatively low earnings is paying substantial sums to the state in tax and contributions with one hand, while receiving family income supplement from the state with the other. We estimate that about 60 per cent. of family credit recipients will have their tax and contribution payments offset in whole or in part; the rest would have them offset and receive a net payment on top.

The prize of this reform is considerable: a simpler structure in which present disincentives are removed and in which enterprise and effort will be fostered and encouraged. Whatever differences we may have on some other aspects of policy, that must be the way forward. I hope that my remarks show that the Government are deeply aware of the need to improve incentives for the low paid. More important, I hope that I have shown that the Government have taken, are taking and will take across-the-board action to achieve that end. I hope that in that action we shall have the broadest possible support from the Opposition, where they can obtain it, and from my hon. Friends without exception.

Ports of Entry

5.16 am

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): I was about to say that a debate on the treatment of visitors at ports of entry and the rights of Members in this matter is timely, but I can think of nothing that is timely at 5.16 am, except perhaps for breakfast in bed. But the public anxiety that has been increasingly expressed about the way in which the ports of entry system operates, the operation of immigration controls, and what I believe to be a scandalous letter sent by the Minister of State, Home Office, to my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman), who is the shadow Home Secretary, must be answered. It is an indictment of this place that it has taken an Adjournment debate for the matter to be raised and for the Minister to have the opportunity to answer directly in the House the charges that he levelled against hon. Members in that letter.

It is worth recording that the background to this is a continuing process, since at least the 1950s, of increasingly tight immigration controls, increasingly overt racist reasons for those controls being introduced, and increasingly racist pressure in the media to introduce those controls. I am thinking of the atmosphere surrounding the Immigration Act 1962, and the disgrace surrounding the Immigration Act 1968, when the unlamented former right hon. Member for South Down made his notorious speech. Perhaps the most racist of Immigration Acts was the one passed in 1971, which introduced the concept of patriality or non-patriality.

The system of entry clearance for people arriving in Britain, mainly from the subcontinent, was introduced in 1969. It is clear from a briefing paper that was presented to Ministers in 1983, and was leaked and subsequently published in the April 1985 bulletin of the Joint Council for Welfare of Immigrants, that the horrendous queues for interviews in Dacca, Delhi and Islamabad is a deliberate act of immigration policy. It states:

> "The system of queues operates to regulate the flow of immigrants . . . the number of entry clearance officers . . . is the primary regulator of the number of husbands, wives, and children, and male fiances admitted from the sub-continent in any one year . . . Provided the queues do not become too long this form of administrative regulation can continue, but an acknowledged policy of deliberate delay without legislation giving power to impose quotas would run risks in the domestic courts and under the European Convention on Human Rights."

That was the secret advice to the Government in 1983, and it has proved to be correct.

It would be helpful if, in his reply to the debate, the Minister gave a clear answer as to what he intends to do about the Commission for Racial Equality report into immigration control. When it came out in February this year, he rushed into print to say:

> "The detailed recommendations in the CRE Report will receive careful study, but it is fundamentally flawed in that throughout it fails to face up to the fact that there is more pressure to emigrate from some countries than from others. To deny this flies in the face of common sense. It is inevitable that more people from some countries will try to enter Britain when not entitled to do so than from others and more will be refused admission. The fact that nationals of Ghana, Morocco and Turkey are more likely to be refused than people from Canada and New Zealand reflects the reality of pressure to emigrate, not a biased system of control. In getting this wrong the Report misrepresents the way the control has to operate."

He went on to claim that many of the report's conclusions were unrealistic, and that little attention had been paid to the potential cost in it.

The Minister is clearly speaking for the Government in that quote, and shows clearly that he believes that the problems of immigration should work for the administrative convenience of the Home Office and of politicians such as himself rather than face up to the awful problems that divided families suffer in Bangladesh and many other countries. That should be at the heart of the debate. Within this context, there must be discussion about the number of passengers refused leave to enter the United Kingdom. In 1984, 18,096 were refused, an increase of 23 per cent. over 1983. The Home Office states in the Immigration and Nationality Department report in July this year that that was

"0·14 per cent. of the total subject to control."

However, if European Community nationals, returning residents, work permit holders and those coming for settlement with entry clearance are excluded, the figure of those excluded nearly doubles, to 0·27 per cent., which is three in every 1,000. For passengers from the sub-continent, the figure is significantly higher — 3,891 refused leave to enter in 1984 out of 278,340 arriving for purely temporary purposes, or 14 in every 1,000.

For citizens of Bangladesh coming in at terminal 3, 684 were refused entry in July, August and September this year compared with 72 in the equivalent months in 1984. However, it is difficult to know the accuracy of these figures without knowing the total number admitted through terminal 3 in the equivalent period. The reason for the sharp increase in the number of visitors from Bangladesh appears to be linked to the changes in immigration rules, to which the Government's attitude is disgraceful. They do not appear to have accepted the spirit of the European Court judgment, despite it having been handed down in a clear way after a fair hearing given to the British Government.

The role of Members of Parliament in immigration matters is important, particularly for those who represent constituencies in which a large number of people have their origins in the sub-continent, west Africa or the Caribbean, areas such as those that I represent, or my hon. Friend the Member for Battersea (Mr. Dubs) and many others of us who represent inner city areas. We represent communities that have origins far from here, and inevitably many people wish to visit. The heartache and despair that the system of controls at ports of entry causes them should not be underestimated, although it is seldom reported in the newspapers.

In 1984 the proportion of passengers from the New Commonwealth and Pakistan who were refused entry was higher than ever. There has always been a significant difference between the proportion of passengers who are nationals of third world countries who are refused entry and the proportion of those from the rich, predominately white countries who are refused entry. For example, in 1984 a passenger from Ghana had a one in 22 chance of being refused, but only one in 8,980 passengers from Canada were refused entry. Between 1979 and 1983, 71 passengers in every thousand who were travelling with New Commonwealth or Pakistan passports were refused entry. In 1984 there was a 32 per cent. increase: 94 in every thousand passengers were refused entry. The figures for the first quarter of 1985 suggest that the increasing trend of refusals has continued.

The role of hon. Members is quite important. An hon. Member has the right to intervene if somebody has been refused admission. He can place a stop upon removal. After discussion with the private office or with the immigration officials he can secure temporary admission so that a particular person may enter the country. In many cases people want to come to this country only for brief holidays as tourists or to attend weddings. Those are perfectly reasonable, right and proper things to do. I have lost count of the number of times that very respectable, middle aged people have telephoned me in absolute desperation because a long expected brother or sister was being held at the airport, for no apparent reason, and in some cases being treated with no courtesy whatsoever.

In that sense, the role of hon. Members is particularly important. However, hon. Members also have a role to play in supporting asylum and refuge seekers. The reaction of the Government earlier this year — a reaction that continues — to Tamil asylum seekers has caused and is still causing considerable concern. I refer the Minister of State, Home Office to Mr. Poul Hartling's lengthy statement and report that was made earlier this year on behalf of the United Nations High Commission for Refugees. It compares the attitude of Europe towards refugees with the attitude of very much poorer third world countries.

One of the underlying issues in this debate is the famous letter that was sent to my right hon. Friend the Member for Gorton on 28 October 1985. It is a six-point letter and in it the Minister of State sets out what he considers to be the problem about the involvement of individual Members of Parliament in immigration cases. First, he wonders whether it is right for hon. Members to ask for a stop to be placed upon the removal of passengers without any inquiries being made into the merits of the case. That is a remarkable statement for any Minister to make. If somebody is to be removed from this country — sometimes with less than six hours notice having been given to the Member of Parliament — there is insufficient time in which to make detailed inquiries. One has to form a judgment on the spur of the moment. There is no other way to do it, otherwise that person may, quite wrongly, be removed. What is wrong about it is that only Members of Parliament are able to intervene in such cases. There ought to be an appeals procedure in this country to deal with that problem—if, indeed, it is a problem.

The Minister's second objection to the involvement of hon. Members in immigration cases is that they may put a stop on a case and then not turn up to make representations. I do not think that this is a particularly common practice. I am certain that there have been occasions when Members of Parliament have placed stops on people to prevent them from being removed from this country but have then been unable to make representations because they have not received the necessary details. I am certain that in most of those cases the individual Member of Parliament informs the Home Office that he no longer wishes to pursue the case. What is particularly scandalous about this letter is that it deliberately raises the ogre of the involvement of Members of Parliament in immigration cases.

The Minister's third objection relates to the allegation that Members of Parliament take up the cases of constituents other than their own. The fourth allegation is that they are involved in the "poaching" of particular cases from other Members of Parliament. There are two answers to those allegations. First, Members of this House are Members of Parliament as a whole. They are dealing with the Executive as a whole. Therefore, they have the right to take up those cases and intervene. Secondly, and of equal importance, it is known that a number of hon. Members refuse to take up immigration cases because they are not prepared to support people who have problems with the immigration authorities.

[Mr. Jeremy Corbyn]

Some hon. Members refuse to take up immigration cases and some are not prepared to support people who have problems with the immigration authorities. What are constituents supposed to do if their Member of Parliament holds extreme views about the ethnic minorities?

The fifth allegation by the Minister is that hon. Members communicate with people abroad telling them that if they are refused entry they should contact an hon. Member who will take up their case. Since the decision by immigration officers and the Home Office in many cases is so arbitrary, why on earth should not people try to contact an hon. Member? If they do not, they will be sent wrongly and unfairly out of the country. It is essential that we retain that right.

The sixth allegation is that hon. Members have been inviting people to bypass the immigration system. The Minister makes that allegation because he knows what the gutter press will pick up, but he knows that the allegation is incorrect. He knows the work which hon. Members do and he must also know the pressure on hon. Members to deal with immigration matters. I do not know how many staff he has to deal with all his responsibilities, but I am sure that he has many more, in proportion to the number of cases than any hon. Member. I have one full-time assistant and one part-time assistant. Independent advice is given to me by lawyers and the local law centre. Without their support, many cases would not be dealt with. It is disgraceful that when dealing with the Tamil asylum-seekers earlier this year the Minister insisted on the 24-hour representation rule. If he plans the same for people from Bangladesh or anywhere else, he should tell us now, in public, rather than wait for the Christmas recess.

We want an explanation of the Minister's incredible request that the details of cases in which some hon. Members have been involved should be released by him to the public. I have thought about the matter, as have many other hon. Members. It is incredible that the Minister should say that private correspondence concerning intimate details about constituents and other people's family lives should be released for public consumption. That is wrong, and I am totally opposed to it. Such a step would break the confidence between an hon. Member and the people who go to see him.

The visa requirement for people from Sri Lanka is important. Communal problems in Sri Lanka go back many years. They culminated in serious violence in 1983 and enormous fear among the Tamil community between 1983 and early this year. For some extraordinary reason the Government started saying early this year that the situation in Sri Lanka had improved and that some Tamil asylum-seekers wishing to come here were economic, not political, refugees. The Government then said that representations about Tamil arrivals had to be made in 24 hours and imposed visa restrictions on anyone arriving from Sri Lanka. That happened during a bank holiday weekend. The issue was finally debated in the House a couple of months later.

We require to know two things of the Minister. First, will he lift the visa requirement on people leaving Sri Lanka? It is unprecedented to require visas for travel from a Commonwealth country to the United Kingdom. Secondly, are there any plans to introduce visa requirements for people travelling from Bangladesh to this country? We need an answer to that quickly because many people are extremely worried.

Presumably the Minister's concern stems from the fact that the number of representations made by hon. Members about citizens from Bangladesh arriving at terminal 3 was 360 during July, August and September of this year compared with 16 in 1984. That increase is indicative of the way in which many people in Bangladesh—people who have every right to come here under our existing immigration laws to join families—are worried about the present position. The Minister is simply seeking to augment the disgraceful queue in Dacca of people trying to get an interview with the high commission staff, and hence the visa requirements that he is imposing.

I must comment on the way in which the press report immigration matters, and especially their handling of the so-called "immigrant loophole" concerning Bangladesh. The Times on 27 November last, under the headline "MPs move to close immigrant loophole", stated:

> "A legal loophole is allowing Bangladeshi husbands settled in Britain to be joined permanently by two or more wives and all their children from abroad, a Commons inquiry has revealed. Up to 25 per cent. of married women now applying in Bangladesh to be united with their husbands in Britain are, in fact, the men's second wives. MPs were told during a recent fact-finding tour of the Indian subcontinent. The Commons Select Committee which is carrying out an investigation into immigration procedures is almost certain to recommend that the loophole be closed immediately, and the Home Office is likely to agree. Conservative MPs who visited Bangladesh were horrified by what they discovered, and believe, if left unchecked, it will result in a substantial increase in immigration. They alerted Home Office ministers immediately they returned home."

A few days later, The Times reported on 3 December a story under the headline "MPs scale down claims on immigrant wives." The story, written by a different reporter, read:

> "'We have now received the most recent figures, and between January and August 1985, 15 per cent. of applications fell into the "other wives" category, and this would include marriages where the first marriage has ceased through divorce or death,' the chairman of the committee said".

The more appalling newspapers in Britain played up a huge story about alleged vast numbers of second wives arriving from Bangladesh as a means of encouraging the Minister to introduce visa requirements for people arriving here from that country. The way in which newspapers report immigration matters is a serious aspect of this whole issue.

If the newspapers and others want to be fair, they should make it clear that the number of refusals of applicants wishing to come here within the existing law is much higher from the Indian subcontinent than from any other part of the world. Hon. Members' rights in this matter are vital. If those rights were curtailed, what resources would those turned back at the airport—often by arbitrary decisions and frequently in conditions of insufficient translation facilities for people whose first language is not English—have?

It is essential for the Minister to withdraw the disgraceful letter that he sent to my right hon. Friend the Member for Gorton and to make it clear that he has no proposals to interfere with the rights of hon. Members to take up immigration cases. Visa requirements applying to people wishing to come here from Sri Lanka must be withdrawn and he must assure us that he has no plans to impose visa requirements on people arriving from Bangladesh or elsewhere.

Newspapers often report immigration matters in an extremely racist way. They give the impression that we should have tight controls, with the atmosphere being difficult for people arriving here from west Africa, the Caribbean and the Indian subcontinent.

The same does not apply to arrivals from Australia, New Zealand, the United States or anywhere else. If visitors from those countries were treated in the way that Bangladeshi arrivals in Britain are treated, there would be an almighty uproar and it would stop immediately. But because those people come from the subcontinent, often poor people coming from poor countries, it is apparently fair game for them to be treated in that way. I hope that the Minister will be able to give us some comfort on the matter, although I fear that that is a faint hope.

Those of us who represent inner-city multi-cultural communities are proud to do so and we feel that the way in which those communities live in fear of the immigration rules and the problems that they suffer because of the way in which those rules operate are disgraceful. It is discriminatory in our society and it is a blot on any form of civilisation. I hope that in his reply the Minister will at least say that the situation will not get worse, although I fear that it might well.

5.40 am

Mr. Alfred Dubs (Battersea): I am pleased that my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) has managed to secure this debate, because it gives us a chance to raise some of the issues which have been bothering hon. Members for some time. I only regret that at this hour of the morning we do not have the benefit of the presence of as many hon. Members as at a more sensible and civilised hour.

Britain benefits enormously from visitors, and most of us feel that they should be made welcome. In 1984 Britain had nearly 6 million visitors, and of those some 17,300 were refused entry. That represents one in every 446. But we all know that the proportion of refusals is much higher for visitors from the New Commonwealth and Pakistan.

Between 1979 and 1983 there was a refusal rate of 71 in every 1,000. Last year, 1984, that went up by about 32 per cent. So the refusal rate from those countries reached 94 in every 1,000. I visited Heathrow airport to look at these matters a few months ago and every person who was stopped there that morning for further questioning, possibly to be refused—I did not stay long enough to discover that—was non-white.

The report of the Commission for Racial Equality referred to by my hon. Friend a few moments ago gave a lot of evidence as to the nature of the discretion exercised by immigration officers and contained a number of alarming suggestions and evidence that discrimination was taking place at the point of entry to Britain. That is something that many people have known for a long time, but the commission made it pretty clear in its report. I repeat the question asked by my hon. Friend: does the Minister intend to take any action on the many recommendations in that report, or will it be allowed to collect dust on the shelves?

It has long been accepted that hon. Members may seek to prevent the departure of a visitor while representations are made to the Minister. In 1979, of all those who were refused entry 23 per cent. were granted temporary admission, not always by Members of Parliament. We do not know what proportion of temporary admissions were secured by Members of Parliament. Some are granted by officials. But by 1984 the figure had increased to 49 per cent. Again, we do not know how many of those were granted as a result of representations by Members of Parliament.

I managed some time ago to have a discussion with some immigration officers and we were talking about the practice of Members of Parliament making representations on behalf of visitors refused admission. The immigration officer said something which I found rather disturbing, particularly in the context of the letter which the Minister then wrote to my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman). The immigration officer said, "Ah well, we refuse. We know that MPs will make reps. The visitor gets a few weeks while the Minister decides. The Minister then supports our refusal to allow entry, so our position is upheld. The MP has made an impact, the visitor has got here and everybody's satisfied." There is a strong implication that more people are refused because immigration officers know that Members of Parliament are likely to make representations and, as the immigration officer put it, honour is satisfied all round.

Honour is not satisfied all round, because the situation becomes absurd. Of course Members of Parliament will be involved because we believe that some of the refusals are wrong and we want to give our constituents and their families the chance to make visits. If immigration officers act as was suggested to me, there are bound to be even more refusals and Members of Parliament are bound to be involved even more. If immigration officers were more objective in their assessments at Heathrow airport and elsewhere, as the CRE report suggests they should be, Members of Parliament might not be involved so often.

I should like to take this opportunity to express thanks to the staff of the Minister's office, who are not responsible for the policy but have been unfailingly helpful and diligent whenever I have phoned them. I exonerate them entirely from blame for the policies that they are asked to administer and for which, as civil servants, they have no responsibility. Many of my colleagues have had the same experience and we should like to put that tribute to the staff on record.

The Minister of State caused great alarm and consternation when he wrote the letter about the 23 Members of Parliament—the "Waddington 23" as they have come to be known. I wish to ask some questions about that. First, where did he get the list from? The Home Office has said several times that it cannot file individual immigration cases by the name of the Member who raises them. The Minister looks puzzled, but I believe that that is right. How, then, did the Minister obtain that list? Did he simply say, "Dig out some instances so that I can have a go at them," or did the list come from somewhere and, if so, over what period was it compiled?

As the Minister knows, the immigration service union made representations to him, or certainly went public, objecting to the system whereby Members of Parliament made representations and saying that it should be ended. That report from the union executive came out just before the Minister raised the whole matter of Members allegedly abusing the system.

[Mr. Alfred Dubs]

Earlier today the hon. and learned Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence) received a written answer from the Home Secretary in reply to a question relating to this issue. The question was:

"what response has been received from those hon. Members referred to in his statement of Tuesday 29 October about representations made by right hon. and hon. Members in immigration cases; and if he will make a statement."

I shall not read out the whole answer as it is rather long, but I will refer to some of the points in it because I find it quite disturbing.

The reply mentions that there were 23 Members and then states:

"Individual replies have been received from 12 hon. Members out of the 23."

That related to the possibility of their names being made public.

Many of us discussed some time ago our attitude to publication. We had no objection to publication provided that one condition was met—that there should be a full debate in the House to give all Members whose names would be made public the opportunity to put their side of the case. If we simply agree to the Minister publishing our names, he can make all his criticisms and many of the hon. Members concerned will never have an equal opportunity to reply to the allegations. They are fairly serious allegations and any fair-minded observer will see that it is reasonable to agree to publication only on condition that we can have our say. That is perfectly clear, fair and reasonable.

The Home Secretary then talks about holding discussions about the way in which Members of Parliament can make representations in such cases, but he does not say with whom. Is he talking about all 23 hon. Members or about some of them, or is he suggesting a full debate in the House on a Government motion?

The point that alarms me most of all is that the answer states:

"The aim of these discussions should be to agree upon a Code of Practice which can be applied to the general run of immigration cases and which achieves a sensible balance between the rights and privileges of hon. Members to make representations on behalf of their constituents" and so on. That is an extraordinary suggestion—that there should be a code of practice governing the way in which Members of this House act on behalf of their constituents. If the Minister does not have a copy of the answer, I have a spare copy which I shall be happy to give him.

Are we to be told how to act as Members of Parliament on behalf of our constituents? Are we to be told how we shall do our jobs? Will there be codes of practice on how we raise matters relating to housing, social security and so on, or will this code of practice be confined simply to making representations in this area on behalf of our constituents and their families? I hope that there will be an early withdrawal of that suggestion. It is quite objectionable and comes near to being a breach of privilege. As it stands, and following discussions with persons unknown, we shall have foisted upon us a code of practice on how we should do our jobs.

Mr. Corbyn: So far as I am aware, in no other area of a Member of Parliament's work, either at national or local level, is there a code of practice on how that Member of Parliament should represent constituents. Does my hon. Friend agree that, if such a code of practice were introduced, it would be a serious infringment of the right of Members of Parliament to take up the problems of any constituents in future?

Mr. Dubs: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend. Had this matter been raised at Question Time, when the House is normally full, there would have been widespread consternation. The Home Secretary is saved from that anger only by the fact that we are discussing the issue at a ridiculous hour of the morning when the House is virtually empty. If the Government wish to limit the rights of Members of Parliament, they are embarking on a serious course, and I advise them not to do so.

The answer also talks about achieving

"a sensible balance between the rights and privileges of hon. Members to make representations on behalf of their constituents and the need to maintain an efficient and effective immigration control in accordance with the Immigration Act 1971 and the immigration rules which have been endorsed by Parliament".

That again seems to be a new concept. We are talking about achieving a balance between our rights as Members of Parliament and the wishes of the Executive in dealing with a particular piece of legislation. It is right that such a balance should be achieved as a result of debate in the House, but it is quite wrong for the Home Secretary to suggest that he will foist this type of balance upon us. This is an attempt to deny hon. Members the traditional rights which for many years they have used on behalf of their constituents. I hope that the Government will abandon that silly idea.

Some wider underlying issues were referred to by my hon. Friend. Why is it that the Minister of State and the Home Secretary do not wish us to proceed as we have done before? We have said on countless occasions that we object to many aspects of the rules under the Immigration Act 1971. We have also said that we object to the way in which discretion is exercised at points of entry to the United Kingdom, as regards those who require entry certificates or visas, where discretion is exercised at High Commissions and other posts abroad.

There was considerable consternation when the Minister imposed visa requirements on people coming from Sri Lanka, mainly as refugees, earlier this year. That was provoked because about 1,200 people arrived in May, and visa requirements were established.

Even more alarming is the clear hint from Ministers that they are considering the imposition of visa requirements on people from other countries, of which Bangladesh is the most obvious. I know that nothing positive has been said, but many of us fear—the question has been raised in the House in the past few days—that a visa requirement will be imposed on people possibly from Bangladesh and other countries and that the decision will be made after the House rises on Friday. If the Minister were to embark on that course, it would have horrific implications for the posts abroad and for people wishing to come here. The Minister knows that people coming here for settlement have to wait two years for their first interview in Dacca and about one year for a first interview in Delhi. It would require an enormous increase in staff at those posts to deal with the large number of visitors from those countries.

Many of us would welcome an increase in staff to reduce the great waiting time that is keeping families divided, but the thought that thousands of normal visitors would have to be processed in that way is not one that anyone can be happy about. It is liable to cause great upset and to prevent many visitors from coming to the United Kingdom. I hope that the Minister will have none of it and that he will not seek to extend the visa requirements to any other Commonwealth country.

As I said earlier, if the Minister wants us to allow our names to be used in relation to the serious allegations that he made about abuse of our position, I hope that he will arrange with the Leader of the House for a full and frank debate. Then our names can be publicised. But all those who have been concerned will go on acting for our constituents in the best way possible. We shall not be deterred by threats or intimidation from the Treasury Bench as to how we should do our job.

We are far more concerned about the rights of our constituents than we are about the niceties of whether the Minister finds the way in which we make our representations somewhat inconvenient for him. I do not want to go into the details of all the so-called abuses, but he is going the wrong path. I hope he will stop this silly nonsense and allow us to continue to make representations on behalf of our constituents in the way that we have always done.

5.58 am

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. David Waddington): Despite the hour, I am grateful to the hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) for raising this matter, because it gives me the opportunity to clear the air a little.

The vast majority of people arriving at our ports of entry pass through immigration control with the minimum of fuss and bother. On average, it takes about a minute to examine a passenger who needs formal leave to enter endorsed in his passport. The vast majority of people are granted leave, as was made clear by the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Dubs). I repeat the key figures: in 1984, only 0·14 per cent. of all passengers in the United Kingdom were refused entry. That means that 99·86 per cent. were admitted.

The refusal rates in the case of some nationals were higher than for others, for the obvious reasons that I set out in my reply to the report produced by the Commission for Racial Equality. I do not resile at all from my criticisms of that report, because I think that it is absurd to deny that there is far more pressure to emigrate from some countries than others. It would be amazing if one found the same refusal rates in the case of all nationals and people living in countries where there were very much lower standards of living than in the West. It would be surprising if one found that there was not a greater desire in those countries to beat immigration control than in more prosperous countries than ours.

In 1984 the refusal rate for Ghanaians was 4·3 per cent., which was far higher than any refusal rate for the Indian sub-continent. For Indian nationals, it was 0·9 per cent., for Bangladeshis, 1·7 per cent. and for Pakistanis, 1·3 per cent. That means that, taking the Indian sub-continent as a whole, 99 per cent. of passengers were admitted and 1 per cent. were refused.

Mr. Corbyn: Is the hon. and learned Gentleman talking about all the arrivals from those countries, or about people seeking to settle here to join their families, and so on?

Mr. Waddington: I am talking about all arrivals from those countries.

I am often asked to review refusals as a result of the intervention of hon. Members. When I am asked to review refusals, I write to the Members of Parliament concerned, setting out, if I am upholding the refusal, the reasons for the refusal. I do not think that any impartial observer would say that such letters do not clearly set out why the immigration officer has refused entry and provide evidence that refusals are made lightly and without suspicious circumstances coming to the notice of the immigration officer.

Of those refused entry, a high percentage are granted temporary admission — more than twice as many as during the years of the Labour Government. In 1977—I take that year because the figures are cited in the report by our immigration and nationality department — 2,868 passengers were granted temporary admission; in 1984, the figure was 8,527. There was an increase in the number of people granted temporary admission, from 22 per cent. to 47 per cent.

This year we have had problems at Heathrow. At certain times, people arriving at terminal 3 have had to wait far longer than we would have liked before reaching the control. People who have had to go through more than the normal routine check have had to wait much longer than we would have wished for that further examination. There have been a number of reasons for that. There has been, year on year, a considerable increase in traffic—an increase of 10 per cent. this year on 1984. There has been a continuing tendency for the vast majority of flights to arrive between 6 o'clock and 10 o'clock in the morning, which makes life difficult for our staff. From July this year, there was an unprecedented increase in the number of Bangladeshis arriving who clearly were not qualified to enter under the rules. That resulted in 1,003 refusals in July, August, September and October, compared with 109 during the same months in 1984.

No one will say that that increase is due to new criteria being applied by the immigration officers, and no one will say that it is due to nefarious instructions given by myself. There must have been a dramatic change in the character of the traffic. The immigration officers were applying exactly the same rules and the same criteria and finding themselves obliged during those months to refuse entry to 1,003 passengers compared with 109 the previous year.

The increase in refusals, and Members making representations on behalf of those refused entry, has meant that immigration officers have had to be removed from the initial control to do other work which follows the initial refusal of an application by a passenger to enter. I ask hon. Members to bear that in mind. I am not saying that it is the most important factor of all, but we would be foolish if we did not recognise that an increased number of Members' representations as a result of refusals has an effect on the burden of work, and means that immigration officers who could be standing at the desks speeding up the process of clearing passengers through the control are doing other work.

[Mr. Waddington]

We hope that things will be better this coming year. There is reason to think that the opening of terminal 4 next spring and the new staff provided for the new terminal will bring about an improvement.

I am greatly concerned about the irresponsible statements which are made from time to time about our immigration officers. I am grateful to the hon. Member for Battersea for what he said about the staff in my private office, but I wish that sometimes Labour Members would hand out similar bouquets to immigration officers, who have an extremely difficult job to carry out and who, in my experience, undertake it with great skill and courtesy.

I am not talking only about the allegation of the hon. Member for Islington, North that people are treated with no courtesy whatsoever, although I think that the officers are entitled to resent that sort of comment. I am thinking especially of a disgusting cartoon which appeared in The Guardian the other day, in which an immigration officer was depicted as a Hitler-like bully, complete with toothbrush moustache, about to dish out physical punishment to an Asian couple waiting to be admitted. That cartoon accompanied a letter giving an entirely distorted account of what had happened when two elderly people had arrived at Heathrow. If I were an immigration officer, I would find such attacks on the service, made by what is supposed to be a responsible newspaper, grossly offensive. I know from my own experience that these attacks are unfair.

An entirely false picture has been painted by those who apparently resent immigration control. The speech of the hon. Member for Islington, North suggested that he and those who think like him come close to resenting any immigration control. When I was at Gatwick the other day, one of the things which struck me was how many young girls we have in the service. They do not have toothbrush moustaches like the man depicted in The Guardian cartoon. They are the sort of young people that we are fortunate to have in the public service. The one that I saw the other night would be well known to hon. Members as she was in my private office until recently. Her parents came from Pakistan.

When complaints are made, they are investigated thoroughly, but we do not receive that many. When hon. Members and others take the trouble to go to Heathrow to see what happens, they almost invariably return pleased with what they have seen and ready to admit that standards are high. I hope that we shall lend no support to those who shower abuse on the service, and will tell our constituents that the immigration officers are doing their best to apply rules approved by Parliament, which have not changed towards visitors since a Labour Government were in power.

I also hope that there will be a readier recognition by thinking people that, as an island, we would be very foolish if we did not have firm control at our ports of entry. We can concentrate the control at our ports of entry because we are an island. The alternative of pervasive after-entry control, perhaps with identity cards, is far less attractive.

The comments of the hon. Member for Islington, North about heartache and despair caused by the system of control at the ports of entry should be considered against that background. I repeat that we are fortunate to be an island people and therefore able to concentrate our control at the ports of entry and not have pervasive after-entry control.

My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary has already answered a quesion about representations by Members of Parliament. He said that we should proceed with discussions to work out a better system. I do not believe that it would be sensible to dwell too long on what has been happening up to now and to debate whether particular practices have been very bad, not so bad or all right. Almost eveyone would agree that the system has not been working as it should. Indeed, in an unguarded moment, the hon. Member for Battersea described as absurd the way in which it worked in one regard. Surely the point is to discuss the arrangements for the future.

A number of helpful suggestions have been made, and I hope that the hon. Gentleman will also make some. There is no reason why we should not bring about an improvement that will achieve the right balance between the rights and privileges of hon. Members to make representations and the need to maintain an effective and efficient immigration control in accordance with the Act and the rules.

Mr. Dubs: The Minister said that I had said that the system was absurd, and that I did so in an unguarded moment. It was not that way. He quoted me a little out of context. I said that an immigration officer had once told me that, knowing that Members of Parliament will make representations, immigration officers make refusals, the Members of Parliament make the representations, the visitor is allowed to come into the country and the Minister then upholds the immigration officer's refusal. It is that aspect of the system that I described as absurd.

Mr. Waddington: I am sorry if I misunderstood the hon. Gentleman. However, it is now clear that he thinks that there is a connection between the number of representations made by hon. Members and the number of cases in which immigration officers grant temporary admission. I do not make that connection, but as he is making it we should look at the whole matter to judge whether the system is working properly.

I was asked two questions by the hon. Member for Islington, North that go wide of the debate, but I would not dream of ducking them. He asked about the possibility of visas being imposed on people from Bangladesh. The Government have no immediate plans for changes in the operation of immigration control, but they keep those arrangements, including visa requirements, under continuous examination and would not hesitate to take appropriate action if necessry. In saying that, I say no more than what Governments have said over the years —we should keep the operation of visa control under continuous review so as to meet changing circumstances.

The hon. Gentleman asked when we would lift the visa requirements on Sri Lankans. I am keeping the visa requirement under review, but I have no plans to withdraw it at present.

The hon. Member for Battersea asked me where I had obtained the list of 23 cases. I was aware of some cases where I thought that things had gone seriously wrong and I asked my officials to look through other correspondence and show me other illustrations of what had been occurring.

I hope that I have given some assistance to the House tonight. I am grateful to the hon. Member for Islington, North for enabling me to clear the air on these matters. I hope now that we can soon proceed to useful consultation so that we can make some sense of the system of representations, by Members of Parliament which I freely acknowledge is an admirable institution.

Mr. Corbyn: I asked my hon. Friend the Member for Battersea (Mr. Dubs) whether he thought that a code of practice would be an infringement of the traditional relationship between Members of Parliament and any public department. Does the Minister accept that discussions of the nature that he is proposing would inevitably lead to the idea of a code of practice, which would inevitably lead to a quantified relationship between Members of Parliament and public Departments, which has never happened in this country and which I hope never will?

Mr. Waddington: Let us see where our discussions lead us. I do not want to be drawn into that at this time because it is sensible for us all to sit down and think about it. I hope that when we come back after Christmas, everyone who has a useful contribution to make will do so, so that we can improve the system to the advantage of all hon. Members.

Drunken Driving

6.16 am

Mr. Keith Best (Ynys Môn): I am pleased that we are having this debate, albeit at this time of the morning. It is therefore incumbent upon me immediately to say to my hon. Friend the Minister of State and to my hon. Friend the Member for Banbury (Mr. Baldry), who sits behind her so loyally, that I apologise for giving them such an early start. I hope that they will feel at the end of the debate that it has been fruitful and, indeed, necessary.

There is a ritual about raising the subject of drinking and driving just before Christmas. I make no apology for having sought to do so again, although we had a debate about the same time last year on the same subject. With Mr. Speaker's indulgence, I intend to continue to seek to raise the matter before Christmas every year, just as the Government feel that it is necessary to launch a campaign every year. It is sad and it should not be necessary to have a campaign every year or for an hon. Member to have to seek to raise the matter to give it greater prominence, but it is necessary because the weak, foolish, unwise and unwary and the ignorant still drink and drive.

One clear message that should go from the Chamber is, "If you drive, don't drink, and if you drink, don't drive." There can be no fetter on that simple message.

The number of drink drive offences over the past decade has gone up dramatically. In 1975 there were 65,000 cases, but by 1980 the number had risen to 78,000. By 1983 the figure was 98,000 and by 1984 it had gone over the 100,000 mark, to 101,000. Nearly half of all injuries to and deaths of drivers, passengers and pedestrians are attributable in part to alcohol, and drink is involved in 45 per cent. of fatal road accidents to young people. Nearly 100,000 people are convicted for drink drive offences each year in England and Wales alone, and the numbers are rising rapidly.

Many people think that there is a legal limit. There is no such thing. It is true that there are offences under section 6(1) of the Road Traffic Act 1972, amended by the Transport Act 1981—offences of driving or attempting to drive or being in charge of a motor vehicle with a blood alcohol concentration above the prescribed limit. Currently that limit is 35 mg of alcohol in 100 ml of breath, 80 mg of alcohol in 100 ml of blood or 107 mg of alcohol in 100 ml of urine. That should not be regarded as the entire law on the matter. That point will be well known to my hon. Friend the Member for Banbury.

There is still the old offence of driving or attempting to drive while unfit to drive through drink or drugs, or to be in charge while unfit. Any amount of alcohol impairs driving ability, and ability definitely deteriorates with more than 50 mg of alcohol. Unfit to drive in law means that the ability to drive is impaired for the time being. It does not mean incapable of driving. People concentrate far too often on the idea of a legal limit below which they are safe and not subject to any prosecution. That is wrong. It should be clear that people with alcohol concentrations far less than the prescribed limit can be prosecuted and convicted of being unfit to drive.

The impairment depends on the concentration of alcohol in the body, not on the amount taken. A person with high natural alcohol concentration is vulnerable. An 11-stone male is put over the 50 mg limit by one and a half pints of ordinary beer or three single whiskies. Driving ability will be impaired. Even at the so-called legal limit under section 6, a person is five times as likely to have an accident than if he had not had a drink. A person could be arrested, charged and convicted under section 5, which is concerned with unfitness to drive, when well below the limit set out in section 6.

[Mr. Keith Best]

It is no good trying to do calculations. Indeed, it is extremely dangerous, because there are so many variables. The 1965 report of the British Medical Association's special committee said:

"It takes between 15 and 90 minutes for the peak concentration in blood to be reached following a drink of alcohol, and in most cases little more than 30 minutes . . . In fact, the rate of elimination of alcohol both between different individuals and in the same individuals at different times varies to some extent and an exercise of this kind cannot, in our opinion, be justified."

The mean elimination rate appears to be between 11 and 21 mg per hour, but numerous recent studies have confirmed the extreme variability of the blood clearance rate. Significant numbers of clearance rates exceed or trail the average by factors of two or four and, in extreme cases, eight.

The law is much tougher after the Transport Act 1981. There is an automatic refusal to issue a driving licence to high-risk offenders or problem drinkers — that means drivers who are convicted twice in 10 years of drink driving offences when, in both cases, the blood alcohol level has been more than two and a half times the prescribed limit or a specimen has been refused, or a combination of the two.

It must be concluded that the public can feel safe only if such people are never allowed to drive again. That might be a hard judgment, especially if driving is necessary for employment or if employment depends on the ability to drive, but we must protect the innocent people who lose their lives or suffer terrible injuries as a result of others taking the risk of drinking and driving.

My hon. Friend has now launched a new campaign. We can but hope that it will be more successful than the disastrous "stay low" campaign last Christmas. Statistics to which I shall refer show it to have been disastrous. I believe that in retrospect, and I say "in retrospect" because my hon. Friend the Minister could say that I welcomed the campaign in the debate on 21 December 1984, as, indeed, I did. She will recall, however, that I also entered some caveats then. "Stay low" was a dangerous slogan which was taken out of context. As I said in that debate, it was wrong to consider the slogan without considering the whole press release of the Department of Transport. I read it in full then and I shall do so again. It stated:

"Don't drink any alcohol at all if you are going to drive. That's the only way to be sure you won't be affected by drink and liable to be convicted of a drink-drive offence.

And it's the best safeguard you can give yourself that you won't be involved in an accident.

Although the 'breathalyser law' puts a limit of 35 microgrammes of alcohol per 100 millilitres on drivers' breath, you can still be prosecuted below that limit if a policeman thinks your driving ability is impaired by alcohol.

So the only way to be certain is not to drink. That's what the Department of Transport means by its advice to drivers this Christmas to stay low—very low."

If that press release had been reiterated, the campaign would not have been misunderstood. My hon. Friend the Minister, who is an experienced politician, knows only too well that politics is about slogans, and that many comments made by hon. Members are often taken out of context. Indeed, our political history is riddled with slogans and statements taken out of context, which achieve a mythology of reality all of their own. I am thinking of cutting prices at a stroke and getting on bicycles. Many of them are entirely inaccurate as a representation of what was said, and are taken entirely out of context.

My hon. Friend and the Department must realise that with such a campaign people will pick out one aspect as theslogan and refer to it. That is why the slogan "stay low" was dangerous. It conveyed the impression that people could drink and drive, notwithstanding the full press release which said clearly that people should not drink and drive.

Why were there no consultations with the alcohol agencies before this present campaign was launched? Many organisations, particularly Alcohol Concern, feel that they can contribute to the formulation of these campaigns. Why was it felt inappropriate for those agencies to be consulted?

I hope that my hon. Friend will again say unequivocally that there is no legal limit below which a person can be regarded as safe to drive. Under section 5, the test of impairment of driving ability is not linked to any limit. The "stay low" campaign created a misunderstanding of the law because of the slogan rather than the full explanation. I hope that my hon. Friend will say that the only message that must be fully comprehended is that if one drives, one must not drink. That must be stated unequivocally.

The "stay low" campaign cost £1·5 million. How much will this year's campaign cost? The cost to the nation of drink-drive accidents is estimated to be £100 million a year, so £1·5 million is a small contribution to make to a campaign to try to overcome that tremendous cost. Will my hon. Friend explain to whom the campaign is directed? She said when the campaign was launched that it was especially directed towards the young, but perhaps she would use this opportunity to amplify that statement.

I greatly appreciate the excellent initiative that is taken by some organisations to try to increase public awareness of the dangers of drinking and driving. I am especially mindful of the new campaign by the Royal Society for the Prevention of Accidents, aimed at the licensed trade, employers, employees, young people, voluntary groups and operators of coaches, minibuses and taxis. I commend to the House and to the general public the excellent booklets that have been produced to increase public awareness, and especially to the various groups, to each of which is directed a separate booklet produced by the Royal Society for the Prevention of Accidents, which is a comprehensive and useful guide.

I am also especially impressed with the society's pamphlet, which is easily read and very short. It is entitled, "How to beat the Breath Test." It is one of the interesting leaflets which invites someone to read more, just as the leaflet that was produced by Conservative central office, which stated that "Conservatives admit to cuts", invited people to read more. That is shrewd advertising material, because it invites people to look more into the contents.

The booklet from the Royal Society for the Prevention of Accidents states:

"Why shouldn't I drive after I've been drinking"?

The reply is:

"Alcohol affects your own judgment of whether you are fit to drive or not—you may genuinely believe yourself to be driving better than you are. Alcohol is a depressant, not a stimulant. It lessens the co-ordination, lengthens reaction time, blurs vision and affects ability to judge speed and distance: all vital skills when it comes to driving. The ability to judge distance between moving objects is lessened when you are only one quarter of the way to the legal limit."

Another question asked is:

"How quickly does it wear off?"

The answer given is this:

"Rates of absorption vary so much, the only sure way is to allow one hour per half pint of beer (or equivalent)—this can take several hours. Someone who has had a heavy drinking session the night before may still be over the limit going to work at 7 am the next morning!"

All of us in the House know the sort of feeling of going to work at that time. Indeed, we have gone to work half an hour earlier than that this morning.

The pamphlet continues:

"There are no tricks for sobering up more quickly—coffee and fresh air may help you feel better, but they don't reduce the alcohol level."

Another section asks,

"But I won't be stopped if I drive carefully, will I?"

To that, the answer is:

"The police can ask you to take a breath test if they suspect you of committing a moving traffic offence, or if you're involved in an accident, but they can also stop you if they suspect you of having alcohol in your blood. If you're stopped for any reason, like a broken rear light, and they think you've been drinking, they can ask you to take a breath test then as well. You might even be prosecuted if you're not over the limit if you're clearly unfit to drive. The 'legal limit' just means prosecution is automatic."

I welcome the hon. Members for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Snape) and for Cumbernauld and Kilsyth (Mr. Hogg). It is especially commendable that hon. Members should come to the House at this time of the morning, and it manifests their belief in the importance of this debate, especially before Christmas. I appreciate that the new campaign that has been launched by my hon. Friend is much tougher and that the get-tough policy of the police will be supported, as I understand it, strongly by my hon. Friend and her Department.

I also appreciate the steps that my hon. Friend's Department has taken over another matter that I have raised during the year—the sale of alcohol through petrol stations. The steps that my hon. Friend has taken in the past year have been welcome. The fact that her Department is collecting statistics to establish the number of petrol station licences in existence is a positive step. This has been reinforced by the fact that the Home Office will, from next year, record such licences as a separate entry on the official statistics. I thank my Friend for what she is doing.

Stopping people from drinking and driving is not just a question of informing the public; there has to be an element of deterrence as well. I feel that still the message has not got across to people that if they drink and drive and are prosecuted and convicted for having an alcohol level beyond what is prescribed, they will lose their licence automatically. However persuasive, even as persuasive as my hon. Friend the Member for Banbury, an advocate can do nothing in those circumstances to save a person's licence. It does not matter whether his job depends on being able to drive—the licence will be lost for 12 months as a minimum. I hope and pray that that message gets across, because it is all part of the concept of deterrence.

I believe, and I suspect and hope that all agree, that the only real deterrence is the certainty of being caught, and at the moment the likelihood of being caught in the United Kingdom is low. The Home Office has stated that only one in 250 drinking drivers has a risk of being caught. That is an appalling statistic, and it must be changed. I accept that I should not be addressing my remarks principally to my hon. Friend the Minister, but I hope that she will convey them to the appropriate quarters, because that needs to be looked at carefully.

I know that my hon. Friend has heard this question before, not least from Mr. Don Steele, of Action on Alcohol Abuse, but I ask her to look again at this suggestion. Bearing in mind that those with provisional driving licences or those who have received their driving licences within the past two years are those most frequently involved in accidents, should there not be an even stronger requirement imposed on those drivers that come within those categories. Perhaps she will say something about that.

I have already referred in parenthesis to the fact that on 21 December last year I initiated a debate similar to this one about drinking and driving. I shall remind the House of what I said on that occasion. Every year 1,200 people die as a result of road traffic accidents in which drink is a contributory factor. During that debate, I asked whether something could be done to include a statement to that effect in the highway code so that at least we could be satisfied that at one point in a driver's lifetime the message would be brought home clearly in a manner in which he had to learn it before passing the driving test. I appreciate that that is not the answer, but to bring it home to somebody who is learning to drive and having to learn what drink and drive involves, as a matter of its being included in the highway code, would be a useful addition to that document.

I know that my hon. Friend the Minister keeps several copies of the code at home, because she told me so in last year's debate. She said:

"My Department is reviewing the highway code, as it does from time to time and I shall see what entry in that might be useful in persuading people to do the sensible thing."

Perhaps she could give me an answer this year to the statement that she made so helpfully in replying to the debate that I initiated last year.

My hon. Friend the Minister of State said something else that I should like her to look at again. At the beginning of her reply to me last year she said:

"In due course my Department is planning to give even wider information than has already been given out in the facts leaflet on drinking and driving from the road research laboratory because it needs to be much more widely available and influential."

When she replies, I hope that my hon. Friend will say what has been done about that.

I referred also in that debate to a fruit drink called "Alcaway." It purports to speed up the absorption of alcohol by the body—in simple terms, an antidote. But it cannot be said strongly enough that there is no such thing as an antidote. I pointed out that on 19 November 1984 my hon. Friend, in answer to an inquiry from me, had said:

"'The rate at which alcohol is absorbed into the blood stream is affected by a variety of factors. While some products can slow down this process, I am not aware of any evidence which suggests that the elimination of alcohol from the body can be significantly speeded up. My general policy is to warn drivers of the risk involved in driving after drinking under any circumstances.'"—[Official Report, 21 December 1984; Vol. 70, c. 713, 716 and 717.]

[Mr. Keith Best]

It is grossly irresponsible, morally indefensible and commercial exploitation of the most obscene kind, resulting in death, injury and misery, to market any such substance. Those who do so should remember that the Christmas present that they will give to families is the death of a father, the mutilation of a mother and the bereavement of loved ones. It was therefore very distressing to me to learn, when listening a few days ago to that excellent radio programme "You and Yours", of a new substance called "Stay Low". It is the usual kind of unpleasant tasting, high calorific fruit drink that contains a large amount of glucose syrup.

I learnt yesterday that 500 dozen bottles have been produced by a company in Nottingham. I spoke to a representative of that company on the telephone. I was given the name of the principal company, Stay Low Ltd., which has the manufacturing rights of this substance. I was given the name of a Mr. Hurley. Stay Low Ltd. is registered in Jersey. However, when I telephoned him I was told that he was busy. Furthermore, I was told that he would telephone me, but I received no call from him. The registered office is, I believe, a solicitors' office. It is merely an address for the registration of that company.

The trail of that company is interesting. Yesterday I tried to track down what this product purports to achieve. I understand that the first reference to it appeared in The Morning Advertiser on 18 December. The claim on behalf of this substance was that "anyone who drinks 10 whiskies can pass the breathalyser test after drinking two 85p bottles of 'Stay Low.,"

That claim cannot be attributed to anybody and it may be inaccurate, but it appeared in The Morning Advertiser.

The office is registered in Jersey and is just a holding office, but I was able to contact a company called Crane Barnden that had been engaged by Stay Low Ltd. to produce promotional material. It is a firm of printers. I do not want any opprobrium that might attach to this product in general to attach to this company. It was very helpful to me over the telephone and explained what had been done.

Crane Barnden had received instructions to produce promotional material, but it had been unable to secure detailed information about certain aspects of the product. The firm was told that it was not entitled to disclose the name of the client. It received its original instructions from an individual rather than from a company. The result was that the firm felt obliged to do no more than produce the initial amount of promotional material. That was interesting because the firm clearly believed that insufficient information was available for it to carry on doing any more work for that client.

The firm produced only information. The bottling and mixing was done by a Nottingham company which confirmed to me over the telephone the constituent elements of the drink. It is lime-flavoured with large amounts of glucose and fructose syrups. The initial run was 500 dozen bottles which were marketed by a company called Innserve, a wholesaler to public houses in the south Devon area. The bottlers have no instructions to bottle any more.

I hope that the Minister will use her Department's resources to look into the product if it is anything like Alcaway. It is extremely dangerous for such a product to be marketed if it purports even indirectly to enable people to drink and drive. That is a cruel deception.

I make it clear now, as I did a year ago in respect of the other product which fortunately we stopped in its tracks, first, that no tests substantiate any claims for the new product. Secondly, increasing the rate at which alcohol is broken down by the body can cause poor judgment. Thirdly, fructose can cause painful side effects.

I do not propose to go into the details of those side effects, but I have a sheet of papers containing medical opinions from learned journals which describe the inadequacy of fructose in speeding up the dissipation of alcohol in the blood, the side effects and the danger of the intake of fructose in such large quantities. Such a product might require a licence under the Medicines Act if it were designed to interfere with the normal operation of a physiological function.

I understand that the label on the product states "Don't drink and drive." That is a small concession to it being marketed just before Christmas with the name "Stay Low". Why is it being marketed now? It has all the hallmarks of a cynical, unprincipled exploitation of people's fond but foolish desire to find a magic potion which will enable them to drink and drive. There is no such potion, nor can there be. I urge my hon. Friend the Minister to investigate the product fully.

If this debate has publicised the criminal negligence of drinking and driving; if it has brought home to people that the only safe way to drive is not to drink, or if one is drinking not to drive, however short the distance; if it has the effect of saving lives this Christmas, children will still have fathers and mothers and parents will still have children at the end of the festive season and we can say to the people whom we have the privilege to represent —as I say to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to my hon. Friend the Minister and my colleagues—have a very happy Christmas, and a safe one, and we shall all meet again in the new year.

6.50 am

The Minister of State, Department of Transport (Mrs. Lynda Chalker): I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Ynys Môn (Mr. Best) for reopening this issue just a week or so after we launched the 1985 campaign. I have done everything I know to get home to people the message that there is no safe way to be on the roads except never to drink and drive.

I thank the police, particularly this year, for their co-operation throughout the planning of the campaign, for it will be through their enforcement that we shall remain safe on the roads. Their intention is that we shall have a safe and happy Christmas. Their intention is not to go after every motorist, as some newspapers might have us believe; I shall return to that point later.

To indulge in the sort of statistical analysis with which my hon. Friend began his remarks might be considered at this hour rather grave, although I shall join him in giving a few figures. Within the whole context of the matters that my hon. Friend has raised are many issues that we must put clearly and squarely before the motoring public and pedestrians, for a large number of accidents at party time —not just at Christmas—involve drunken pedestrians. We are dealing not only with drivers, although they have a lethal machine in their hands.

Drinking and driving is at the front of our minds just now, but please let us not forget that this problem is not confined to Christmas and the new year. It is true that alcohol consumption is at its peak at this time, but the stark truth is that the threat posed by the drinking driver exists on the roads every day of every year, and we must ensure that all our policies take account of that.

I detect a growing indignation, in Britain and elsewhere, by people who are against the irresponsibility and culpable negligence of the few, those drinking drivers. Many people are so concerned that this is a topic of conversation not just at Christmas time but generally. I am frequently asked, "What more can we do to make people behave responsibly with respect to drinking and driving?" Normally sensible people seem to adopt a thoughtless mode of behaviour, and they then easily slip into aggressive and selfish habits. Indeed, once the drinking has begun, that whole process seems to accelerate.

That is what we must stop. I have detected—I have seen it with my own eyes in country pubs and elsewhere—that many more people are seeing the sense of the campaigns. They enjoy their drinking and they enjoy their driving, but they enjoy them by keeping them well apart and by never mixing them.

As we continue to see more than 1,000 people killed each year in road accidents as a direct result of drinking and driving, we realise that we have a long way to go before we have got the message through to a wider number of people. I assure the House that there will be no letting up in the Government's attempts to tackle what is regrettably still our most serious single road safety problem. There are others, but this, like many accidents, is avoidable.

My hon. Friend was right to say that the number of convictions had risen, but he may not have read the small print, as it were, on one statistical matter. In the last year for which we have figures, 1984, about 93,000 people were convicted of drunk driving, out of a total of 101,000 involved in drug and drink-related driving offences.

The increases in convictions are the result of the new law which came into force on 6 May 1983. With the intoximeter now being used at all times throughout Britain I have no doubt that this year we shall have a larger number of convictions than last year. I have no doubt of that because everyone is determined to try to stop this awful savage fatality level on our roads.

Mr. Best: I am grateful to hear that, because it will put the figures in context. When I referred to last year's "stay low" campaign, I said that it had been a disaster. I said that because of the statistics of problems that had arisen. Perhaps my hon. Friend will confirm that the number killed last year was up by 8 per cent. compared with 1983; the failure rate of breath tests increased from 24 to 30 per cent., an increase of 25 per cent.; the failure rate among 16 to 19-year-olds increased by 23 per cent.; and 50 per cent. of all fatalities are in the 20 to 24 age group; casualties in accidents where at least one driver failed the breath test increased by 27 per cent. and casualties during drinking and driving hours—10 pm to 4 am—increased by 22 per cent. The number killed in that period is up by 13 per cent. even though the police conducted 21 per cent. fewer tests than the previous year due to the problems of the miners' strike.

Mrs. Chalker: The whole problem is whether people will police themselves responsibly, as well as the enforcement by the police.

My hon. Friend has given a number of statistics. I shall not counter with others, but if he looks in "Road accidents Great Britain 1984" he will find the latest statistics.

Rather than bemusing the House with statistics at this time of the morning, we should remember that the number of road users killed in accidents where alcohol was a factor in 1984 was equivalent to over three jumbo planeloads of people. If three jumbo planeloads of people had been killed in the air, there would have been a public outcry, yet the public seem ready to stand back when so many people are killed, avoidably, on the roads. That is the point that we have to get home to people who may not like statistics as much as my hon. Friend.

The other thing that hits home particularly hard when one looks at what happened last year—and other years—is that, of the 1,400 road users killed in those road accidents where alcohol was a factor, over 350 were innocent victims of drinking and driving. In other words, they were killed in an accident where one driver at least failed a breath test.

One road death in four last year occurred in accidents where one person had breath alcohol over the legal limit. The driver's impairment by alcohol is a major factor in about one tenth of all injury accidents. We know that it is related to the time of day and drinking. There is no question of that. We also know that the risk goes up the more alcohol is drunk. But, as my hon. Friend said, the point still remains that to have any impairment by alcohol of one's ability to drive means that there is a greater risk than necessary. It is at the point of 35 microgrammes of alcohol per hundred millilitres of breath that the risk of being involved in an accident increases sharply.

The point of a legal limit is to provide a guidance figure. As I said last year, and, as I have said every year in these campaigns while I have been in this job, it is perfectly true that if one's driving is impaired even with no alcohol in one's bloodstream, one is perfectly properly stopped by the police if they think that one's driving is so impaired. Therefore, it does not matter so much what the level is, except with those who drink so much to excess and are then so culpably negligent as to get behind the wheel of a vehicle or on to a motorbike or even a bicycle and who may cause the most terrible disasters perhaps to their own family, friends or workmates—and maiming and fatality are processes that can never be reversed.

With regard to high risk offenders, I know that the procedures that I introduced a couple of years ago to identify motorists with a possible drink problem are not thought sufficient in some quarters. I certainly believe that the concept of screening high risk offenders first—educating them and making them have medical treatment—is the right way to begin, but it is not a total solution. As we said in our response to the road safety report produced by the Select Committee on Transport, there may well be changes in the future. We shall at an early stage examine the threshold blood alcohol level and we shall then consider the case for extending the scheme to take in a wider category of offender. I think that that will go some way to meet the continuing concern about the very high risk levels and those just below.

My hon. Friend has referred to the campaign at Christmas last year. A full assessment of what happened over the Christmas period 1984 appears in "Road

[Mrs. Chalker]

Accidents Great Britain 1984." In brief, that assessment shows, that, compared with 1983, there was an increase in the number of drivers failing the roadside breath test and an increase in casualties during so-called drinking hours. I agree that the figures are disappointing but that was not simply because of the "stay low" message. As my hon. Friend knows, with as many thousand policemen on picket line duties as there were throughout the whole Christmas period last year, the campaign could not possibly have been enforced.

I am sure that the whole House will agree that nothing influences the public so much as the possibility of a flashing blue light. As those who have studied the campaign material this year will know, one poster has the heading "A sobering thought", a photograph of a police vehicle appearing in the rear driving mirror and a slogan at the bottom:

"Think you can drink and drive—think again."

Some people will always say that the campaign is no good, that it should have been stronger or weaker. We had a great deal of publicity about last year's campaign, probably even more because of the controversial slogan, but I wish now to concentrate on this year's campaign.

Mr. Best: The Government promised to take account of the evaluation of the "stay low" campaign before planning this year's campaign, but I understand that the evaluation was published after plans for this year's campaign were well under way.

Mrs. Chalker: There is a problem in getting the statistics through fast enough and linking hospital statistics, conviction statistics and all the rest. Statistics covering the previous Christmas period cannot be published before November, but the knowledge that we were beginning to gather statistics, although it was not complete, was made available to the chiefs of police and myself when we started to plan this year's campaign. It would, however, have been wrong to publish that information, because, as my hon. Friend knows, interim results can be very much affected by later results, as some of the results this year have shown. There is no question of our not releasing figures for last year's campaign. The information that we need comes from a wide variety of sources and we must do the job properly. The final casualty data often come in as late as October.

There is absolutely no doubt that this year's drinking and driving publicity has had more planning than ever before. It has enabled me to do something that I have wanted to do since taking up my job more than three and a half years ago—to plan it in close consultation with the police. Unless we can enforce the campaign, I do not believe that we shall get people to police their own drinking and driving, and that is what we are after.

The police have every intention of enforcing the law firmly throughout the year. The campaign reminds drivers of the serious penalties they face on conviction, including automatic disqualification for at least a year, a fine of up to £2,000 and even the possibility of a prison sentence.

After only 10 days of the campaign, my initial impression is that the message is coming over well, helped by the strong support from local police campaigns and other local campaigns. It is much more the sort of campaign that I am happy to run to try to prevent people from injuring themselves and others.

I was asked why we did not consult users, local road safety officers and Alcohol Concern. I am well known for consulting as widely as time and opportunities allow, but publicity campaigns have to be kept private until the very last moment. My hon. Friend may recall—I am sure that the hon. Member for West Bromwich, West (Mr. Snape) does—that in the road safety debate on 15 November, I declined to be drawn on this year's drink-driving campaign because I wanted the slogan "Think you can drink and drive—think again" to have the full force of the launch on 9 December.

If one consulted very widely, that impact would not be achieved, and it is necessary to have it to get off to a good start. But we listen carefully to all the outside views that are put to us, and we are well aware of the views of bodies such as Alcohol Concern and Mr. Don Steele.

The position with the police is different, and I know that my hon. Friend will understand. We have sought to take the views of local authorities informally, without revealing the publicity campaign during the planning period.

My hon. Friend's comments about the cost of drinking and driving and the cost of this campaign were relevant. The cost to the community is about £150 million, whereas the cost of this campaign is £1·4 million. Nevertheless, this campaign will roll on throughout the year and it will be reinforced during the light evenings in 1986, because we know from experience that there will then be an upsurge in the number of those convicted for drinking and driving.

My hon. Friend said that there must be stiff deterrents. I have already referred to the penalties available to magistrates. Magistrates make up their own minds, and it is not for me to tell them what to do, but I hope that they will not hesitate to hand out severe penalties where they are warranted. That applies to all periods of the year, not just to Christmas and the new year.

We shall look at the suggestion in the road traffic law review that driving licences should be confiscated immediately, but the effect would be to penalise a driver before trial—in other words, before any finding of guilt. I accept that the result of the breath test would be positive, but under present law that would be a real departure from the general principle of the presumption of innocence until proven otherwise.

Mr. Best: I certainly do not wish to see that.

Mrs. Chalker: I am glad that my hon. Friend does not wish to see that, although that has been suggested as a stiffer penalty.

Of all the efforts that we are making with this year's campaign, I believe that it will be the physical presence of police cars—and the help that is being given from a large number of quarters such as the Brewers Society and many publicans themselves—that will make people more and more aware of what is happening, and why it is crazy to drink and drive. We have to keep the two activities apart.

The latter part of my hon. Friend's speech was about the sale of products that are said—I say that positively—to clear away alcohol from or reduce alcohol in the bloodstream.

Mr. Peter Snape (West Bromwich, East): Would the hon. Lady like to comment on the current Daily Express campaign, which seems to be waged largely against her personally, that this year the police are not enforcing the law but making it as they go along by insisting on random breath tests in various parts of the country? Secondly, would not a sensible alternative to drinking and driving be better public transport? Are not some of her Department's policies leading to worse public transport, particularly in the running of late night buses and trains?

Mrs. Chalker: I shall be dealing, at the end of my speech, with the campaigns that are being run by some newspapers.

Many efforts are being made, particularly on special nights during the Christmas period, by public transport authorities to run good public transport. But the message must still be within people's own minds that they cannot drink and drive and that they must think about what they are doing. If people think that they are going to have a few drinks, they should also think beforehand about how they will get home. If local authorities put on public transport, or private companies do so in the future, nobody will be more delighted than I.

There is a need for moderation in all things, and it is the responsibility of the individual, if he has to get home under his own steam, to ensure that he is capable of doing so. One can also be summoned for being a drunken pedestrian; one does not have to be in charge of a motor vehicle. The point about public transport is not lost on me. I am well aware of what the hon. Gentleman says. The campaign is intended to get people to think about their driving and their drinking separately. In that way there may be fewer people who are unable to get themselves home.

My hon. Friend spoke of the fructose-based drink which claims to reduce blood alcohol levels. While the rate at which alcohol is absorbed into the bloodstream is affected by many factors—the type of drink, the rate at which it is consumed, whether the person has eaten before drinking, the person's weight, and so on—there is no evidence, as far as I am aware, that its elimination from the bloodstream can be artificially speeded up by any means whatever. I am grateful to my hon. Friend for the research that he has done into this misnamed product and the claims that it is making. I shall be grateful if he will make available to my office any papers that he has.

As I said in the debate on 21 December last year, we need to look with some care at any products which could mislead the public into thinking that they could get protection by using them. I fear that this may not be the end of the story. Alkaway, thank goodness, went away last year. Perhaps Staylow will go very dead very quickly. It is a cruel deception, as my hon. Friend rightly said. I hope that anybody who sees the product will tell us where it is being marketed, because it would be helpful to see the extent of it. If production is limited to 500 dozen bottles, I hope that they will go down the drain quickly, because that is all they are worth.

Mr. Best: It tastes very nasty.

Mrs. Chalker: If it does, a drunken driver probably would not drink it anyway. We shall do all we can in my Department through all our links and the information of my hon. Friend the Member for Ynys Môn will help us.

I said that we would again consider the Highway Code, and we are doing so. This is a long and complicated job. It is even more important to get better education at an early age on drinking and driving. We shall use the Transport and Road Research Laboratory's information to produce a factual leaflet. In the next phase of the drinking and driving campaign, we shall put greater emphasis on understanding the facts. That has been needed for some time. I hope that that helps my hon. Friend the Member for Ynys Môn in his campaign to make people wiser.

As I said at the launch of the campaign and subsequently, there has been no change in the law on random breath testing. The police have a duty, if they see a defect, to stop the vehicle. If a policeman notes that the driver smells of alcohol and acts strangely, he is within his rights to ask the driver to take a breathalyser test. I speak for the chief constable of Sussex, the chairman of the traffic committee of the Association of Chief Police Officers, when I say that there is no random breath testing and that no chief constable has authorised it.

Mr. Snape: It is not for the police to authorise it.

Mrs. Chalker: I know that, and my point is that no one has authorised it.

The police campaign seeks to keep drivers safe on the road. If the police see a faulty mechanism on a car, they will often warn the driver to put it right. If, in so warning, the police come across a person who should not be at the wheel of the car, for obvious reasons, they must carry out the law as agreed by the House. That is what the police will be doing this Christmas and during the campaign on into the new year.

Mr. Snape: Why is there an enormous discrepancy between the number of motorists breathalysed in a certain police area and the number of motorists breathalysed in an adjacent police area? The hon. Lady has made the point, which we all accept, that chief constables are not authorised to institute random breath testing in their area. She should say something about the Daily Express campaign, which is attempting to produce evidence that random breath testing is occurring, in certain parts of the country.

Mrs. Chalker: I have known many newspapers attempt to produce all sorts of campaigns.

Mr. Snape: They are all in favour of the Tory party.

Mrs. Chalker: This is not a matter of party politics, as the hon. Gentleman well knows.

Last year, police officers could not, because they had to police picket lines, enforce the law as they wished, so the fact that they are now enforcing the law properly has come as a surprise to people in certain parts of the country. I have no evidence that there is any variation between areas. I shall ask the chief constables about this.

At present, it is far better to have a campaign that is strictly enforced and warns people, and therefore may prevent loss of life in the future, than to go about this matter in the way in which some Opposition Members have. The Opposition seem to be divided in their opinion. We have asked for a tough campaign, and we have one, but it will be useful only if it is properly enforced. It can be properly enforced only if police officers are present to carry out the law. They are doing that, but that is not random breath testing. I shall take up the matter, but I can say no more than that.

The campaign spells out that a driver can be safe on the roads only if he or she does not drink and drive. As the campaign states, alongside a photograph of a driving licence and a glass of beer,

"You can't hold on to both."

[Mrs. Chalker]

That may seem a truism to some, but it is a sobering thought that we may lose many people this Christmas, and that if the drivers concerned had had more care for other road users they could have saved lives and injuries. I ask the House and everyone concerned to take home the message to everyone they meet that, if they have driven a car and they find that they cannot drive, or should not be driving, they should leave the car and collect it the next day, or arrange for someone else to drive. If someone thinks that he can drink and drive, he should think again.

Copyright Infringement

7.20 am

Mr. Jeremy Hanley (Richmond and Barnes): I welcome the presence of my hon. Friend the Minister for Information Technology. I apologise for causing him to rise from his slumbers at such an hour, but I know that his concern about the subject of the debate is such that he will not begrudge the hour. The title of the debate is "Copyright infringement", which is a rather bland title for what is often regarded as an unexciting subject. There are many who have thought that a little piracy and a little copyright infringement does no harm. It has been thought that a little stealing from those who already have enough, who already earn enough and who are employed is all right. It is considered that they are greedy if they want to stop any form of copyright infringement and that they can afford to bear it. That is the sort of attitude that so often pervades our society.

Recent events have changed all that. The public are now well aware of the depths to which the pirates can sink. With the recent cases of piracy involving the Live Aid concert, the title of the debate would perhaps be more appropriate if it were "Stealing from the Starving".

The piracy of intellectual property is a world-wide industry. It has been estimated that between £800 million and £1,000 million worth of sales of audiotape worldwide are affected. It is probable that sales of videotapes and films to the value of £2 billion are affected. Books are pirated to the tune of £300 million worldwide on the best current estimate, and there is also piracy worldwide of computer software, textiles and other designs, motor parts, industrial and commercial products, and even of brand-name pills and medicines which are pirated and manufactured out of salts and sugars. The pirated pills and medicines do no good but at worst they can cause death because of their substitution.

I am sure that many hon. Members will have read and discussed the recent cynical attempt to cash in on the suffering of the starving millions in Africa by the Indonesian pirates, who have produced bootlegged tapes of the Live Aid concert which took place in July.

The British people have a good record of providing bilateral and multilateral aid, both through Governments and through private individuals giving generously. No doubt the House will remember that the Live Aid concert galvanised the world. It produced an international inspiration to give, and an international recognition of the fact that so many people, through no fault of their own, were starving and in need of help. We recall that 140 artistes gave of their services for no fee and performed live. Mr. Bob Geldof, in his unique and abrasive manner, cut through the niceties and red tape, put the show on the road and tapped the hearts and consciences of millions.

Perhaps I should explain the difference between bootlegged and pirated tapes. A pirated tape is when the manufacturer takes an existing tape, copies it, sells it—thus breaking copyright—and keeps the proceeds. A bootleg tape is when a manufacturer records something that does not exist on tape — perhaps a concert on television, or even a live concert. He manufactures and then sells the tape.

There are no original tapes of the Live Aid concert. There has never been a genuine, original tape of that concert. Many people may have recorded it in their homes, many people may even have recorded it on video machines, but there is not a single commercial tape that is legitimate. People may question why it was not recorded, and feel that an opportunity may have been lost. They may ask whether Mr. Geldof is causing piracy by creating an unfulfilled demand. The truth is that 140 artistes have 140 lawyers, and to get 140 lawyers to sanction recorded music for sale is a devil of a job. Mr. Geldof gave guarantees that there would be no tapes until such time as the lawyers reached agreement.

After all, the concert was live and some of the performances were fairly instant and unrehearsed. Some of the artistes might not have wanted their contribution on a live platform preserved for posterity and sold on tape. Many of the performances were quite brilliant and inspired, yet they were not in any way performances designed to be recorded and sold to the world. They were an attempt to encourage people to give of their generosity as the artistes were giving of theirs.

The tapes that are being pirated throughout the world are labelled, "Original". The bootleg tapes of the Live Aid concert even state on them, "For African famine relief" in an attempt to convince consumers that they are not only buying good music, but are contributing to a worthy cause. Not a penny of the proceeds of those tapes that are selling in vast quantities throughtout the far and middle east, even in Italy—and, who knows, even here—reaches the Band Aid Trust. The proceeds are pocketed by the pirates as private gain.

The International Federation of Phonogram and Videogram Producers has estimated that more than 1·5 million cassettes have now been sold. The figure might even be nearer 2 million. According to Kevin Jenden of the Band Aid Trust, those proceeds would be enough to feed 2 million people for a month. Who has benefited? It is a few Indonesian millionaires.

The Live Aid recordings are currently on sale all over the middle east, especially in Saudi Arabia. As I said, they have even reached Italy. Boxed set LPs have been uncovered in italy, but they were also made in Indonesia. Those buying the cassettes are being led to believe that their money is going towards helping the starving in Africa, whereas in reality it is going into the pockets of the unscrupulous. At least four bootleg editions of the Live aid concert are on the market in the middle east, all manufactured in Indonesia. Some of the cassettes bear Indonesian Government sales tax stickers, which give a unique production number to each recording. The boxed sets of LPs found in Italy also carry those tax stickers.

In Saudi Arabia there are reports that at least 1 million copies of the Live Aid cassettes have been sold directly to that country because of demand. There was a story yesterday of a new tape cassette factory being opened in Indonesia with a production line capability of 6 million cassettes a month. The tax stickers that appear on the Indonesian cassettes show that the Indonesian Government have taken 15 US cents every time one is sold or exported. That means that the Indonesian Government have collected US $300,000 in money which should have gone to Live Aid. That is just a fraction of the money that has been made by the manufacturers of those bootleg tapes. On the other hand, the starving in Africa have received nothing from this industry.

Legal action can be taken in some countries. In Italy the industry is now carrying out nationwide raids on retailers of those bootleg tapes. To date 10,000 bootleg LPs manufactured in Indonesia have been seized in Italy. Meanwhile, in Indonesia, virtually nothing happens. The copyright law protects only local recordings, and an estimated 30 million pirated cassettes are exported every year. The Indonesian Government claim that all exports of cassettes to Saudi Arabia are, according to a letter that I have, either recitals of the holy Koran or Indonesian Arabic music recordings. However, the facts speak for themselves. How can the Indonesian Government claim that the exports are only of the holy Koran when the stickers show that they know very well what they are collecting tax upon? The Live Aid bootleg is not a recital of holy works; it is a deliberate rip-off.

The message of international anger at the Live Aid piracy is beginning to embarrass the Indonesians. Mr. Mochtar Kusamaatmandja, the Indonesian Foreign Minister, has announced that he has asked the Justice Ministry to take action against the pirates. That may sound fine, but the problem is how. In response to previous complaints by the record industry, the Indonesians have always replied that piracy is not illegal under Indonesian law as no foreign records are covered by Indonesian copyright, as I explained. Only yesterday it was announced in Indonesia that the bootleggers were donating £22,000 out of the kindness of their hearts to Live Aid. That was meant to be compensation for the millions of profit that they have made. I do not believe that that is a generous gesture at this Christmas time. It is a penny in a bucket, and one of the most cynical Christmas presents that I have ever heard of.

Live Aid is only one example, albeit perhaps the most despicable of late, of a much wider problem. The American charity record "We are the world" has been widely pirated, and many others, too. In fact, any successful record, whether for charity or not, is likely to be copied by the Indonesians and others within weeks of release.

That is costing the legitimate industry over US $1 billion per year in lost sales. The British music industry alone is losing almost £100 million per year from only six countries—there is more from others. Those countries are Indonesia, Singapore, Taiwan, Korea, Nigeria and Malaysia. In Singapore, tape piracy accounts for 85 per cent. of the market. An estimated 10 million pirate cassettes will be sold on the local market and 50 million produced for export in 1985. However, I must give credit to Singapore. Although it has the worst record for copyright infringement of any country in the world, the Government have, as a result of pressure from the USA, announced their intention to enact a new copyright law before July next year. The level of piracy in Singapore is already declining, and if the legislation is enacted it should be down to under 10 per cent. by the end of next year. It is important that the pressure exerted upon Singapore by the USA should be maintained by foreign Governments until that happens.

In Taiwan, tape piracy accounts for 55 per cent. of the market. In Korea, it accounts for 10 per cent. of LPs and 90 per cent. of cassettes. In Malaysia, 85 per cent. of all cassette sales are pirated. There is very little piracy of LPs in Malaysia. In Nigeria, piracy accounts for 27·5 per cent. of LP sales and 83 per cent. of cassette sales. In Saudi Arabia there is little piracy of LPs but 95 per cent. of all cassettes sold are pirated. The only legitimate product available tends to be educational material. It is estimated that in Saudi Arabia 50 million pre-recorded pirate cassettes will be sold in 1985. In addition, an estimated 100 million blank tapes will be sold, 40 per cent. of which will be used by shops for in-store pirate taping. In Indonesia, virtually 100 per cent. of recordings of international repertoires sold are pirated. The lost sales to the United Kingdom music industry are estimated to be as follows: Singapore more than £51 million; Taiwan £1·5 million; Korea £1·5 million; Malaysia £9·3 million; Nigeria £8·8 million; and Indonesia £14·8 million.

[Mr. Jeremy Hanley]

In Indonesia alone, record pirates are costing British companies some 15 million unit sales a year. It is time that the Government made a strong call for justice. The copyright law in Indonesia covers only local works. No protection is given to foreign works, whether they be books, sound recordings or films. Throughout Indonesia, foreign sound recordings are pirated extensively and about 30 million international recordings, as well as an Arab repertoire, are exported to Saudi Arabia. The matter has been raised with the Indonesian Government, and the International Intellectual Property Alliance, representing all of the major copyright interests in the United States, recently submitted a report to the United States trade representative on piracy including Indonesia. The report is a staggering indictment of the pirates and a staggering record of the extent of the piracy worldwide.

Like any other, the record business deserves a return on its investment. Only one record in 10 becomes successful and the profits from that 10 per cent. are needed to fund development and rising artistes and to pay for less profitable but culturally valuable recordings such as jazz and classical music. It is not generally known, though it is obvious with a little thought, that there is no other industry in Britain in which young people, perhaps with little education or hope of great success, can succeed in a manner which is beyond most people's dreams. No other industry enables groups of young people to succeed financially and to rise to popular acclaim so quickly, knowing that their talents will be used for many years to come. The investment in new groups and new recording artistes is one of the most valuable contributions of the record business. It is the marginal profits which help to create extra investment. If the record industry gets the correct return for its services, more groups and more young people will be given a start to see whether the public approve of their musical tastes.

The pirates put nothing into the industry. They discover no talents and take no risks. They copy only the top 10 per cent. and siphon off the money needed to invest in the future. Without that money, fewer artistes are recorded, fewer classical records appear and our culture is weakened. We have institutionalised piracy in the United Kingdom. How many people can honestly say that they do not record records or programmes from the radio or television? It is regrettable that the Government are no longer considering a royalty on blank cassette tapes. I believe that the public would prefer their taping of records and programmes to be legitimised. If, in exchange for that, a royalty of 10p or 20p per blank tape were paid, I am sure that everyone would understand the benefits which would flow from a better funded record business. I am told that that is not to be, and I have registered my regret.

Records are not alone in being attacked. The copiers attack any successful industry—the book trade, software houses and film producers. Counterfeiting strikes at well-known British trade marks, and often with dangerous results. We have all heard of the fake Ferodo brake linings sold in Africa which take six times as long to stop a vehicle as genuine linings and the useless drugs that are sold under well-known names. Fakers are costing the industry millions of pounds and thousands of jobs. When will it end?

The Live Aid piracy puts not only the Government but all of us under a moral obligation to take a firm stand. British works are not protected in Indonesia, yet the Indonesians get the sixth highest amount of British foreign aid in the world. In 1984 we gave them £28 million in trade loans and aid. Is it not time that we imposed a few more conditions when we are so generous? I am not asking that we take money from the starving, or that we withdraw genuine money aid which will be used for those less fortunate than ourselves, but if we are lending money for industrial purposes and bilateral trade arrangements, the conditions should be much stronger.

The old cautious arguments that we must do nothing to upset existing trade are not good enough. The Americans do not think so. Section 301 of their Trade Act allows them to impose sanctions in countries that do not protect United States copyrights, trade marks and patents. Moreover, they have shown that they are prepared to use it. There is even a danger that countries such as Indonesia will seek bilateral deals with the United States to protect only American products. That will allow the pirates to turn their full attention to copying the goods of more cautious countries that will not act to protect themselves.

We know what can be achieved by a strong line. Secretary of State Shultz, during a recent visit to Singapore, laid down the law. When the public in Singapore discovered that they had not bought genuine Live Aid cassettes and that the money had not gone to the starving in Africa, they were livid. The Singapore Government asked the public to seek out the bootleggers. They were discovered within a few days, and are now serving 10 to 15 years imprisonment for what I regard as theft.

Exactly five years ago there was an Adjournment debate about counterfeiting of United Kingdom trade marks in Taiwan, especially in the textile and motor industries. The then Minister for Trade, my right hon. Friend the Minister for Hertsmere (Mr. Parkinson), made a robust reply. He said:

"The hon. Member said that the way forward is for us to ban the import of products from Taiwan. I must tell the Taiwanese authorities that our patience is wearing extremely thin. We are considering the evidence at our disposal. They have the opportunity to avoid a major incident by taking the strong action that Hong Kong has taken. Unless they do, the Taiwanese authorities must be prepared to accept the consequences".—[Official Report, 19 December 1980; Vol. 996, c. 730.]

The result was not a trade war, as some timorous souls forecasted, but strong new Taiwanese legislation within months. It can have been no accident that a delegation from the European motor industry shortly afterwards saw that the Taiwanese Trade Minister had a copy of the relevant Hansard on his desk.

In reply to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for York (Mr. Gregory), the Government have said that they will make representations to the Indonesian Government about Live Aid piracy. That is a start, but it is not enough. The Government should make it abundantly clear to the Indonesian Government that piracy of any British work will no longer be tolerated, and that unless reciprocal copyright protection is granted to United Kingdom works they must face the consequences.

In a letter of 30 November to the Confederation of Information Communication Industries, my hon. Friend the Minister said that we must have proof of the illegal act. I have proof, which he can see later today—bootlegged cassettes with Indonesian sales tax stamps and individual numbers on them. That is the extent to which the pirates will go.

The anti-counterfeiting unit of the Department of Trade and Industry was doing valuable work which I should like to continue. I am pleased to announce that the copyright industries — the Publishers Association, the record industry, and video and software producers — are now coming together in a new coalition to present to the Government evidence of the damage caused to British companies, and to spell out the case for protection. At this time of Christmas, I call on the Government to heed their call.

7.44 am

The Minister for Information Technology (Mr. Geoffrey Pattie): My hon. Friend the Member for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley) has done the House a service in raising this important matter at a very important time. I make it clear to him and to the House that the increasing problem of copyright pirating and bootlegging in export markets is taken seriously by the Government. Recently, I had the opportunity to make our attitude clear when my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Adley) brought Lord Macmillan and members of the Publishers Association to discuss problems with the printed word. We had a constructive meeting.

I am grateful to my hon. Friend for defining, for the benefit of the House and of the Official Report, exactly what bootlegging is in this context. It means that I need not do so again.

The House will recall that the problem of video and audio piracy within the United Kingdom has been largely brought under control by the Copyright Act 1956 (Amendment) Act 1982 and the Copyright (Amendment) Act 1983, and we hope that the Copyright (Computer Software) Amendment Act 1985 will do the same for the emerging problem of computer software piracy. But those measures are of little help to British exporters of books, videos, sound recordings and software, who must rely on the copyright laws of the importing country to fight any piracy of their material occurring locally.

Mr. Bryan Gould (Dagenham): Before the Minister leaves the domestic scene and moves to the main theme of the speech of the hon. Member for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley), will he comment on the hon. Gentleman's remarks about the pirating of audio recordings at home and on the reports that we have both heard to the effect that the Government are having second thoughts on whether to place a levy on blank tapes? Will he comment on the accuracy of those reports, and perhaps suggest what other thoughts the Government have had on the subject?

Mr. Pattie: I was intending to do so, and will do so gladly.

Such piracy is unquestionably losing our exporters a substantial volume of business in some parts of the world. One main area of concern is the far east, where piracy flourishes not merely for local consumption but for export — as my hon. Friend described — and where local copyright law frequently fails to protect foreign works. The middle east is also a problem area, since it is an important customer for much of the pirates' output.

Reliable estimates are difficult, if not impossible, to obtain, since pirates do not publish statistics. But the United Kingdom sound recording industry estimates that worldwide it could be losing as much as £300 million of export sales through piracy and bootlegging. The United Kingdom publishing industry puts the figure for lost book sales at about £100 million.

It is sometimes argued that unauthorised reproduction of copyright material by developing countries is justified in the cause of education, or because the price of educational material is unreasonably high and beyond the purchasing power of Third world students. This argument fails to recognise that destroying the market for the legitimate producer itself contributes to raising his costs, but in any case a large proportion of the material pirated throughout the world—the Live Aid bootleg is a case in point — is not for the educational market at all. It is reproduction of straightforward entertainment works of one sort or another — popular music on record or cassette, feature films and popular novels. No country can reasonably defend the pirating or bootlegging of intellectual property of this sort in the name of educational advancement or anything else. It is, on any analysis, a form of theft, and the absence in some countries of legal rights protecting foreign works or performers does not make it any less so.

The Government, in common with our Community partners, take seriously the problem of copyright piracy, as we do the allied problem of counterfeiting, which overlaps it. The first essential is to encourage the adoption of comprehensive and enforceable copyright law in those countries which lack it, and improvement of the law in countries where, as is too often the case, rights are inadequate, enforcement procedures cumbersome and penalties for piracy too low to deter.

We must also encourage these countries to extend their copyright protection to the works of foreign nationals. The Government will continue to support industry's efforts to combat piracy by pressing these objectives on the Governments concerned, as we have in the past where evidence of a problem has been presented to us. I stress the need for evidence because, hard as it may be to obtain —I do not under-estimate the difficulty—one can hardly expect another Government to take seriously a charge that they are permitting or encouraging copyright piracy, if no concrete evidence is produced in support. Here we must inevitably look to the copyright industries to keep us as fully informed as possible about the nature and scale of the problem. I am grateful to my hon. Friend for the proof that he has in his hand. Let the Official Report show that that is the case.

I refer again to the recent meeting that I had with my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch, following which I am aware that significant details of further evidence of that particular part of the counterfeiting problem were made available to my officials, and that is extremely helpful.

Secondly, the Government will continue to participate in international initiatives to combat piracy and counterfeiting. Piracy is currently a concern of the World

[Mr. Pattie]

Intellectual Property Organisation, which administers the Berne copyright convention, of the Council of Europe, and of the European Community. The Community's Ministers of Culture adopted a resolution in July 1984 on measures to combat audio-visual piracy, and the Commission's forthcoming Green Paper on copyright is also expected to address the issue of copyright piracy.

Counterfeit goods do not necessarily infringe a copyright, but they will often do so. The Government are concerned about the growing trade in counterfeit goods and we are particularly keen to bring current work in GATT on counterfeiting to a speedy and successful conclusion. We want to see a GATT code that would give national customs authorities powers to tackle imports of counterfeits at their borders.

We hope to achieve this objective in the forthcoming GATT round, although this will not be easy. The United Kingdom, through the Community, has been trying for over 10 years to secure the agreement of developing countries to such a GATT code. At the moment, of course, "counterfeit" in this context means goods bearing an unauthorised trade mark, but even on this narrow front we have encountered strong resistance, and many developing countries argue that GATT is not competent to address the subject. Against this background, the Community is shortly to begin detailed consideration of the link between intellectual property and trade policy, in preparation for the new GATT round.

My hon. Friend the Member for Richmond and Barnes has raised a number of specific piracy issues—first and foremost, the alleged production in Indonesia of bootleg cassettes of the Live Aid concert. I say "alleged" almost from the legal point of view. I am persuaded by what my hon. Friend has told the House. I am aware of the allegations, and I am looking forward to receiving the cassettes from my hon. Friend.

Clearly, these cassettes, whatever their place of origin, must be bootleg, since, as my hon. Friend has said, no official recording of the Live Aid concert has yet been issued. The cassettes carry a legend calculated to mislead the purchaser into believing that the proceeds will go towards African famine relief, even though this is not explicitly stated. I have to share my hon. Friend's contempt for this despicable series of actions. I share his encouragement that the Indonesian Minister, Dr. Mochtar, has recently called for action to be taken against the bootleggers. My hon. Friend and the House may be interested to know that my hon. Friend's debate is particularly timely, because officials are discussing this issue and making representations on the matter to the Indonesian high commission in London today.

My hon. Friend asked what, if any, conditions should be imposed upon our relationship with Indonesia, which is across many fronts. I have considerable sympathy for the position that he has expressed. I have never believed that the Government's position on any issue is weakened by a firm statement of belief by the United Kingdom Government, or by saying that we find the present situation unsatisfactory and that we shall not tolerate its indefinite continuation.

We have noted the effect of the United States action, particularly in places such as Singapore. Although the United States can bring considerably more clout to the international market place than we can, we must not under-estimate our position in the world market or our position over intellectual property rights. My hon. Friend knows that trade policy is not a matter for me but for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. However, we consult one another closely about these matters. I should not like my hon. Friend automatically to assume that we wish to adopt the feather duster approach. We do not.

My hon. Friend referred to the fact that there are alleged centres of piracy elsewhere in the Far East. We are encouraged by recent moves to improve the protection for foreign copyright owners in two places in particular which have given cause for concern—Singapore and Taiwan. Singapore has recently completed a new draft copyright law, with a view to its adoption during the next year or so. We should like to be told more precisely when that is likely to be. The United Kingdom hopes soon to be in a position to furnish comments on this draft law to the Singapore authorities.

In July of this year, Taiwan also introduced a new copyright law, which provides for the protection of foreign works on a reciprocal basis. The United Kingdom has already taken the necessary steps to meet this criterion of the new law. My hon. Friend may like to be reminded that the United Kingdom has made an Order in Council that applies the protection of the Copyright Act 1956 to such works in Taiwan, with effect from yesterday. My hon. Friend's debate is therefore timely on both those counts. Who knows?—Taiwan's position could be linked to the earlier debate to which my hon. Friend referred.

Both my hon. Friend and the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) referred to a blank tape levy. A White Paper on intellectual property and innovation is expected to be published early in the new year. No matter what the newspapers may say, no final decision has been taken on this issue. It would not be the first time that the newspapers, while speculating—and having every right to speculate—have not necessarily been accurate. The House will not expect me to speculate about the contents of that White Paper. I think that when my hon. Friend looks at some of his arguments on this subject he will agree with me that they were a little unfair. The Government's Green Paper that was published at the beginning of this year considered audio tapes and video tapes. With video tapes there is a significant element of time shifting, as it is known. My hon. Friend is, I know, aware that many people record off television for viewing on another occasion, either later in the evening or at the weekend.

As for audio taping, it is agreed that there is copyright infringement. However, many people put records that they have bought on to audio tapes because they wish to use them either in their motor cars or elsewhere in the house. That does not invalidate the case, but the copyright fee is often paid in the original purchase price.

The issue is difficult and complicated, and final decisions have not yet been taken. However, the issue will be discussed in the White Paper to be published in the new year.

I thank my hon. Friend very much indeed. I know that it is something of a cliché for Ministers to say that during the night through clenched teeth, but whatever the time —this time is not particularly inclement—I should have been happy to respond to comments on this extremely important subject.

Industrial Tribunals

8 am

Mr. Richard Holt (Langbaurgh): The Minister will not be surprised to hear that I have chosen to speak about industrial tribunals and to explain to the House how industrial tribunals work today compared with how they worked under the legislation which established them. I first spoke on this topic on 15 May, since when my views have been formally reinforced by recent experiences at Ebury street.

The idea of some form of industrial relations court was first mooted as long ago as 1919. Not until the passing of the Industrial Training Act 1964 to determine appeals for people assessed for levy were industrial tribunals as we know them set up. Their functions have gradually been extended by the Redundancy Payments Act 1965, the Docks and Harbours Act 1966, the Equal Pay Act 1970, and other measures. Today unfair dismissal and sex discrimination cases are no longer dealt with in the informal tribunal manner.

The idea of a tribunal is to provide a place where people can place their grievances fairly before an impartial panel. If an injury or injustice has been done, they can seek to have it put right. If the finding is in their favour a financial settlement will be made in compensation. It is right that there should be a court of last resort.

The concept of tribunals has changed. Originally the idea was that there should be an informal atmosphere unburdened by legalistic practices, prejudices and all the panoply of a court. Today, if one presents oneself at an industrial tribunal, one is in a court of law just as one would be if one was at the Old Bailey on a serious charge.

Employees should not be put in that position. Unless one is legally represented at an industrial tribunal, one's chances of success will not necessarily be measured by the merit or otherwise of the case. It will be measured by some obscure precedent of which one has no detailed knowledge, other than that which is read in the law reports and reviews.

This subject was raised a long time ago in the House by a number of distinguished former members. Mr. Charles Pannell, speaking in this Chamber in December 1970, said:

"Yet these are courts, and one of the prime objections I find to this Bill is that it will lift industrial relations into the purely legal atmosphere, where precedent will be added to precedent and very few things will be discussed on their merits."

What a far-sighted statement that was. He also said:

"I think this whole thing will be a lawyers' paradise. I came across this quotation which was used by Philip Snowden on the Trade Disputes Bill in 1927. I only use it because he quotes Winston Churchill in an earlier incantation". — [Official Report, 14 December 1970; Vol. 808, c. 1031-2.]

As we see, for a long time the lawyers have gradually been getting matters to go their way. Markers have been put down. Charles Pannell put down a marker when he used the words that I quoted. Lord Carr, as he now is, also spoke in that debate in 1970. Mr. Pannell having made the comment that I quoted, Mr. Carr, as he then was, apologised for not quite catching Mr. Pannell's remark. Perhaps the ball was a little too fast as it came off the face of the bat.

The idea of these courts was that they should not be terribly legalistic places. The idea was to have a friendly atmosphere, perhaps discussing matters over a cup of tea or coffee; I would not suggest anything stronger. Let us do away with all the trappings of a court of law. That was why the House decided to call them tribunals, not courts.

My hon. Friend the Member for Warwick and Leamington (Sir D. Smith) was the Minister at the time of the debate in 1970. He said then that people would be put at their ease. He said:

"As I was saying, deliberate efforts will be made to put people at their ease. Generally in civil cases the panoply of the law, even though there will not be the full criminal court procedure, can put people at a disadvantage". — [Official Report, 14 December 1970; Vol. 808, c. 1072.]

It was recognised by the Government at that time that the full panoply of the law and a legalistic framework would put people at a disadvantage, particularly if they were not used to the courts and the legal framework. In that same debate, the present Lord Wilson of Rievault said that he was interested in the word "informality" in the context of the new court, whatever it might be called.

There was concern then, and I am expressing concern today, because the drift has gone on and on, so that now we no longer have that which was intended by Parliament in the first place. The Government must tackle this problem because in industrial relations we are drifting into waters that are familiar to us all: one can get justice in many cases so long as one can afford it, and frequently the cost is such that one is denied the opportunity for justice.

Another telling point is that because industrial tribunals are not courts of law a person's right of appeal, as might apply if the offence had been murder or rape or some trivial offence, is not there. Once a person has been found guilty in the eyes of the tribunal, he has no right of appeal unless he can prove a point of law. That is wrong.

Let me dwell a little on the composition of the tribunal. I can find no justification whatever for the chairman of a tribunal being a barrister or a lawyer of a minimum of five to seven years' standing. They may never have been inside a place of commerce or industry—a shipyard, a mine or even a farm, although they may have that as a side interest. They have no depth of knowledge of the real world of industry and commerce, but they have knowledge of the law and they are there in a quasi-judicial capacity.

The other two members of the tribunal are nominated, one from the trade union's side and one from the employer's side. Does not that bespeak the fact that there is an intrinsic interest on both sides before a case comes before the tribunal? There has to be an idea of prejudice, otherwise there would have been no need to seek a balance. Why should there be one from either side? If people are to judge a case on its merits as it is presented by the appellant and/or the employer, surely, in the same way as the jury system takes virtually anybody and allows them to become jurors, we should have well thought of honest people of integrity, but not necessarily with a track record as employers or employers' hacks or trade union nominees. The view might then be expressed that they were a little more impartial in the way in which they looked at things.

Since I last spoke on this subject it has been brought to my attention that nominees from trade unions are liable not to be resubmitted by the trade union for consideration to remain on tribunal panels if too often they do not find in favour of the appellant. That is something new which has not been widely expressed previously.

One man came to see me, who, for obvious reasons, has to have anonymity, because he was concerned at the pressure being put upon him through the new militancy within his trade union which said that it would not support him any further as a so-called independent member of a tribunal if he kept on finding in favour of the employers. [Interruption.] I am sorry if I hear an interjection from the Opposition Front Bench that that cannot be true. I shall supply privately to that hon. Member the name and address of the man in question. I have already supplied it to my hon. Friend the Minister. Therefore, that helps to make my case that we should be re-examining tribunals and their composition——

[Mr. Richard Holt]

Mr. Norman Hogg (Cumbernauld and Kilsyth): Will the hon. Gentleman make it clear that the intervention to which he referred did not come from the Opposition Front Bench?

Mr. Holt: I am happy to do that. It came from a sedentary position on the Conservative Benches.

I am worried that the integrity of the tribunals themselves is now being called into question.

Mr. Don Dixon (Jarrow): The hon. Gentleman has referred to trade unions putting pressure on their nominees to industrial tribunals. If he took that claim to its logical conclusion, there would be no trade union nominees on the tribunals because in the vast majority of cases the tribunal finds in favour of the employer.

Mr. Holt: I accept what the hon. Gentleman says. He will see from Hansard that I said that this was something new, not something that has been going on since the courts were established in 1971. I am saying that it is a new phenomenon which emphasises my point that it is time for a full review of the tribunals their composition and their procedures.

Mr. Dixon: Just for the record, should not the hon. Gentleman refer to it as a new allegation rather than a new phenomenon?

Mr. Holt: Whether the hon. Gentleman takes it as an allegation or not, I will stick to the word "phenomenon". I do not think that bandying semantics will achieve very much. I am concerned about this because the impartiality of the tribunals is essential.

On the hon. Gentleman's point about the outcome of cases, I am approached fairly regularly and I talk to people quite a lot on this subject and I know that a vast number of cases do not come before the tribunals at all. Where compensation is paid one might reasonably assume that those cases might well have been won by the appellant if they had come to court. In those circumstances, the bare statistics do not tell the whole truth and it is hard for anyone to justify the argument one way or the other in that context.

With regard to the chairman—the lawyer or judicial person—I recently appeared at Ebury street in front of a Lady Mitchell. Everyone I speak to tells me that if a case comes before Lady Mitchell the employer's chance of winning it is nil. That seemed a very strong allegation, so I decided to investigate whether it was credible. I asked the Department to tell me how many cases had come before that lady as chairman and whether the outcome was for or against the employer, but I could not obtain the information. I then asked the industrial court, but again I could not obtain the information. There is more secrecy and difficulty over this than over criminal proceedings in the High Court. That is highly unsatisfactory. Very learned lawyers have told me that as soon as they know the outcome of the Russian roulette system of allocating cases to court rooms they know what the outcome of the case will be.

That takes us a long way from the orginal idea of informal courts to adjudicate on individual cases of dismissal. We now have 15 centres and a large number of people, costing £20 million or more. It is time for a reappraisal of the system by the Government. Now that we have 15 years of case history, with 16,000 cases per year, we can see that the tribunals are not working out as originally intended. They are not cheap and they are not speedy. The average time for a case to come to court is 13½ weeks. There is no incentive for the individual to find a job in that time because if he is then found to have been unfairly dismissed the compensation will be diminished. What we really need is a vast number of tribunals made up of the local great and good nominated and supplied from a wide variety of sources. If someone is dismissed, he can go very speedily—within 48 or 72 hours—before an informal tribunal. The test is not necessarily whether in law a person has been fairly or unfairly dismissed, but whether that is so in the eyes of the tribunal.

I know of one employer who was told, "You had another job of a lower grade which you did not offer to the appellant and therefore in law it was an unfair dismissal." On the next occasion, he offered a job in a lower grade but was told, "You cannot do that." and the case went against him. Therefore, the present structure is over-legalistic and costly.

Some employers are being forced to contemplate very high costs indeed for the legal profession in respect of cases brought by the Equal Opportunities Commission. The EOC has an unlimited fund of money from which it can pay lawyers. One furniture manufacturer will shortly face a five-day hearing as a result of the Ford decision. If the decision goes against him, he is liable to lose between £200,000 and £250,000 and could be faced with a legal fee of £20,000. That is not what industrial tribunals were intended for. That is what Mr. Charles Pannell said in 1970.

The informality does not exist by which there can be a free exchange of views. I challenge the Minister or any of his officials to go to Ebury street, to sit in on a hearing and to listen to the way in which it is conducted on a legal basis. One can present an opening statement, call witnesses, cross-examine, have re-examination and make closing submissions, but one should not necessarily look for truth or fairness. One should look for a case precedent during the last 15 years on which one can hang the case and outwit the other barrister who has not come across that loophole.

I attended a case in which there were 10 precedents. Let us imagine an employer with 25 or 30 employees. Let us suppose that he is living on the margin, and let us also suppose that the appellant turns up with a solicitor provided by one of the law societies or citizens advice bureaux who is armed with all the facts and figures and who takes cases on a regular basis. What chance does that employer have if it is purely a legal matter?

When I pressed the Government on this matter some time ago, the Minister's predecessor said that they were concerned that the tribunal courts were becoming over-judicial, over-legal, over-costly and not quick enough. But 18 months have gone by, and absolutely nothing has been done. It is almost as bad as trying to discover the boundaries of Cleveland. No one disputes that there ought to be some form of industrial tribunal at which those who feel they have been wrongly dismissed may have their cases assessed and heard. If there has been an injustice, there should be compensation; no one disputes that. But many people today — other than those with vested interests in the legal profession—would perhaps say that things have gone too far.

Can anyone seriously believe that the tribunals were intended to deal with cases such as that of the singing rabbi comedian which filled our papers, gave us all some amusement, but cost us all a lot of money? Can anyone seriously imagine that the tribunals were intended to deal with the case of a sacked football manager such as Malcolm Allison? The transcript shows how much he managed to smoke and drink in his short time at Middlesbrough football club at the expense of my constituents. Were the industrial tribunals set up for that sort of case? I accept that at the end of the debate on the Consolidated Fund a little lightheartedness comes in, without any harm, but it is a serious matter.

I urge the Minister to say that he will ask for a Select Committee of the House of Commons to be set up to examine the working of the tribunals today, as opposed to what they were intended to be, the drift into legalism, the drift into heavy cost and the drift towards the slowing down of the process of justice.

If the Government do not do something about the matter, I shall be as tenacious as any Opposition Member. I do not believe that any of the parties involved are being given a fair crack of the whip, other than the lawyers, and I do not want industrial tribunals ultimately to become the "Bleak House" of this century.

8.27 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment (Mr. Peter Bottomley): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt) for raising the subject of industrial tribunals.

With regard to excessive legalism, both the Court of Appeal and the Employment Appeal Tribunal have made statements which demonstrate that they, too, are losing patience with legalistic tendencies. In particular, the president of the Employment Appeal Tribunal has on several occasions emphasised the need for industrial tribunals to look to the words of the statute for their authority in deciding cases. He said that they should not be too quick to draw comparisons with the facts of other cases and treat them as binding precedents, even those which have come to be widely known.

When my hon. Friend talks about excessive legalism, he describes it in exactly the right way. We need some degree of legalism. What we do not need is the excessive digging back into cases, with people thinking that they are being very clever in showing that they have done more research than anyone else. The important point, as my hon. Friend rightly emphasised, is to discover what happened, was it reasonable and was it fair.

My hon. Friend said that the only grounds for appeal against the findings of an industrial tribunal were legal. That is not a bad position to be in. If one were able to appeal on other than legal grounds, it would put the tribunal into great difficulty. Both claimants and respondents would be seen to be in an impossible position, because the tribunal exists to decide what happened and whether it was fair, reasonable and lawful. If people were able to appeal on matters other than points of law, it would tend to reopen matters and to duplicate everything that the tribunal is there to hear.

My hon. Friend mentioned a minority of my predecessors. He has shown that the half-life of a Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment is not long. There may be times in the future when others will be able to refer to my hon. Friend in my position. I do not think that his approach as a Minister would be different from mine.

My hon. Friend invited me to go to Ebury Bridge road. I have been there twice, once as Minister, to observe and the other time when I was an employer who had been involved in the sad issue of redundancy and three of the people involved made a claim for unfair dismissal. I went along without legal representation. i did not consult a lawyer before I went. The work people were represented by their union representative. We managed to get three cases through in four hours, to the satisfaction of both sides. I do not think that it is relevant to say which way the case went, but the firm incurred no extra cost.

Before a case comes up for consideration by a tribunal —this applies not only to my case, but to all cases— there are opportunities for ACAS to work for individual conciliation. It is worth remembering that a minority of dismissal cases lead to claims for unfair dismissal. Of those cases that come forward, about a third are withdrawn, about a third are conciliated and about a third go before a tribunal. The claimant is successful in about a third of the cases that go before a tribunal. Taking the whole procedure together—the opportunity to withdraw, the opportunity to conciliate and the tribunal hearing— and even looking on the tribunals as legal instruments, I believe that the tribunals consider only a minority of a minority of cases. Looked at in the round, there are opportunities for people to come to an agreement on facts and to avoid putting their future and fate in the hands of three people.

My hon. Friend asked whether it should be necessary for the chairman of a tribunal to be legally qualified. I have not torn that proposal up by the roots to examine it. I doubt whether we can change the requirement. There is a split responsibility. The Department of Employment is responsible for administration and for proposing laws to Parliament, and appointments of chairmen are in the hands of the Lord Chancellor's Department. My hon. Friend will need to be persistent, as he has promised, in trying to get the two Departments to look at this matter together.

My hon. Friend asked whether I would refer the whole issue of industrial tribunal procedure and presumably, that procedure's part in industrial relations, to a Select Committee. It is not in Minister's hands to do that. No doubt, Select Committee members will read my hon. Friend's words.

My hon. Friend referred to excessive legalism, excessive cost and excessive time. I hope that my response will not be taken as diminishing my hon. Friend's legitimate concerns, but I believe that it is worth putting another perspective. This does not destroy my hon. Friend's argument, but it provides a separate perspective. In a way, that can be used as an explanation of the membership of the industrial tribunals.

My hon. Friend used what I would almost call "South Down logic" in saying that balance in the membership of the tribunal implies prejudice. I would say that balance engenders confidence and that people, because of their work responsibilities, will have differing perspectives. In many cases the tribunal's membership are unanimous. That suggests confidence. If people have differing points of view, it is not normally because of different prejudices, but because of different views on the facts put forward by the tribunal. It is not the case that people who are brought up in the same way, or who have the same training or experience, normally agree with each other. My hon. Friend is not a lawyer; nor am I. We are both personnel people. One cannot get lawyers to agree, especially if they are on different sides in a court case or tribunal hearing. Presumably they have not had the experience of being employers or trade union representatives.

[Mr. Peter Bottomley]

My hon. Friend referred to a union suggesting to a person who had been nominated to be a member of an industrial tribunal that his re-nomination might be at risk if he did not find in a particular way in a certain percentage of cases. That is a serious allegation, which we regard as unacceptable if it can be demonstrated to be general. If people feel that they are being victimised in that way by a trade union or the nominating employers' bodies, I hope they will feel that it is their responsibility to ensure that the information is drawn to the attention of Ministers and, in the case of the TUC and the CBI, to the attention of those organisations.

My hon. Friend spoke about cost. I am not sure whether his figure of £20 million makes allowance for costs outside the public expenditure remit. My information is that the cost of the tribunals is about £13 million at present. We look to those with responsibilities for organising industrial tribunals to try to ensure that we get value for money. We hope that in the courts and tribunals efforts are made to ensure that financial management is regarded as seriously as in the private sector and that equal importance is attached to it.

Mr. Dixon: When the Minister talks about costs, will he bear in mind that he is talking about men's jobs and men's futures? I shall give him an example of what happened to me prior to the establishment of tribunals. I was a member of a safety committee representing employees in a shipyard. I was asked to leave the committee because the foreman wanted to see me. I was sacked two hours later. I had no opportunity to go to an industrial tribunal to put my case. I was put out of the yard and I had no appeal. That is an example of what happened prior to the establishment of industrial tribunals.

Mr. Bottomley: The hon. Gentleman makes a very important point. My hon. Friend talks rightly of employers who are operating on a knife edge and who face being broken financially by going before a tribunal. The hon. Member for Jarrow (Mr. Dixon) rightly observes that employees have been exposed to arbitrary discipline, to injustice, and to unfair dismissal, including when they have been carrying out important work to try to provide physical protection for those working with them. I become upset occasionally when others assume that a Minister, even in the present Government, is automatically on one side or the other. There is a balance to be found, and where we bring the parties together before an industrial tribunal the balance is usually found.

My hon. Friend talked about time. With the built-in conciliation procedures, some time needs to be taken. One can argue that the conciliation service of ACAS, good though we expect it to be—we hope that it will become better, for there is always room for improvement—is a process that can be described as a talk around a table. Some parties, they are often employers, believe they require legal representation and try to get their legal representatives to talk to the ACAS conciliator. I hope that my hon. Friend and I would say, even if we were lawyers, that both the employee, or ex-employee, and the employer should consider carefully at what stage it is necessary, and whether it is necessary, to bring in legal representation, and whether it is not better to get the parties round the table.

Mr. Gordon Brown (Dunfermline, East): Will the Minister comment on industrial tribunals in the Scottish mining industry? The coal board directorate in Scotland and the rest of the country has refused to give any undertaking that it will reinstate ex-employees if the industrial tribunals find in favour of dismissed miners, and has said that it would probably not reinstate many of them. Will the Minister comment on the position of the coal board as a good employer?

Mr. Bottomley: No, Sir.

My hon. Friend the Member for Langbaurgh suggested that information should be available on individual chairmen. He will know that I cannot, will not and would not provide the information. If it were to be made available in one instance, the same information would be sought on every chairman. We would end up with research students obtaining PhDs and suggesting that there would be a 5 per cent. better chance by avoiding this court or that court. I do not think that my hon. Friend would want what he might regard as excessive statistics. He referred to excessive legalism, and both might go together.

Mr. Holt: I would not want that, but I think my hon. Friend will accept that his reply underlines my contention that every time there is an appearance before a tribunal, there is a game of Russian roulette, and not necessarily fair justice.

Mr. Bottomley: There is some element of truth in that, but that is to be found in any system that is created by man. One can look for experienced interventions and review. With the leading members of the industrial tribunal system, the Lord Chancellor's Department, my hon. Friend's constant presence and genuine concern for these issues and the views represented by the hon. Members for Jarrow and for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown), I am sure that we can create a better system. We have a good one, and we can make it work better, and that requires our continued attention. I am grateful to my hon. Friend for initiating the debate. I hope that he regards my response as adequate and that we can continue our discussions.

Cornish Tin Industry

8.40 am

Mr. David Harris (St. Ives): Even at the end of an all-night sitting, and with limited time available, I am grateful for the opportunity to raise what is undoubtedly the most important question facing the county of Cornwall today—indeed, the most important question that that county has faced for a long time—the deep crisis in the tin industry.

It is exactly eight weeks ago today that trading in tin on the London metal exchange was suspended with the price of tin at £8,140 per tonne, whereas at the beginning of the year the price of tin on the exchange had been more than £10,000 a tonne.

The suspension came about with the withdrawal of the buffer stock manager of the International Tin Council from the operation of that market. The price of tin was falling fast and the fear now is that if the market reopened with the buffer stock manager taking part, tin would go into what is colloquially called a free fall and would drop dramatically to an artificially low level. That is the background to the crisis.

Although I have raised this matter on about six occasions, and the hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Penhaligon) has also done so—for example, earlier this parliamentary day, although it was a whole night ago—we have not yet had a statement from my hon. Friend the Minister for Trade. That is through no fault of his. I pay great tribute to him for the patience that he has exercised over this matter and the very hard work that he has put in behind the scenes to try to achieve a solution to an extremely complicated matter.

There are many ramifications to this crisis. There is the question of the international position, and the fact that the International Tin Council now represents only 60 per cent. of world production of tin. There is the European dimension, there are big questions for the City of London and its good name, and there is the question of the liability of Governments to stand behind their commitments under international agreements.

My main preoccupation must be—and I make no apology for this—the effect of this crisis on the tin industry in Cornwall. I am especially worried about the effect on the Geevor mine in my constituency, which has already been mentioned a number of times in the House. Just over a fortnight ago, the Geevor mine, a small public company, served redundancy notices on 340 of its 375 work force. It did so with the greatest reluctance but had to do so because of the crisis hanging over the whole industry. If nothing happens between now and the end of April, those men will be made redundant. That will have an absolutely disastrous effect on the economy of that part of Cornwall. Indeed, west Cornwall is now facing its biggest crisis for many a long year.

Geevor is in the village of Pendeen, some six miles from Land's End. It is beautiful country on the north coast of Cornwall. It is very remote—there is nothing else there other than some farming and some tourism. If, heaven forbid, anything happened to Geevor mine, the economy of Pendeen, the neighbouring town of St. Just—some say the most Cornish of all Cornish towns—and the whole of that area would be absolutely devastated economically. Male unemployment there is already more than 26 per cent. There is nothing else there to provide jobs.

My right hon. Friend the Minister has tried his hardest behind the scenes to bring about an agreement in the International Tin Council at least to start trading again on the London metal exchange in an orderly fashion. That must be the first priority. However, after the long meetings of the International Tin Council, the signs seem to me, as an outsider who is not privy to all that goes on in those meetings, to be not good. The talks seems to be dragging on and getting nowhere.

I hope that my right hon. Friend will throw some light on the matter. He has made valiant attempts to get a common position inside the European Community with his fellow Ministers, but so far they do not seem to have brought much success. That is not for want of trying by my right hon. Friend.

A few weeks ago, in the presence of the hon. Member for Truro, I took a delegation to see my right hon. Friend from the county council and the mining industry. At that important meeting, we said to my right hon. Friend that we believe that there is an overwhelming case for temporary assistance for the industry to get it through this deep crisis.

Before anybody says, "You did not argue that in the case of the coal industry," let me say that there are great differences between the situation facing tin mines in Cornwall and that facing some mines in the coal industry, although I accept that the social consequences are probably similar. However, we are not talking about mines that have come to the end of their life in the case of the Cornish tin mines. There are good reserves of ore there, and the problem is that if they close they will not open again. The history of the price of tin is one of fluctuation, although it has been ironed out by the International Tin Council in recent years. If those mines closed and the pumps were switched off, it would be like switching off a life support machine, and those mines would not reopen. That must not happen. I do not believe that it will.

There is an overwhelming case for the Government to give temporary assistance to those mines. I believe that the best way is to help them with their considerable development programmes in the same way as the Government rightly are helping the coal industry with its considerable development programme. That is what I am asking for today.

I do not expect my right hon. Friend to come up with an answer or, indeed, to reach for his cheque-book; life is not like that. However, I am saying, as the House prepares to adjourn for the Christmas recess, please do not sit back; please give urgent consideration to the case being made by the industry, the county councils and the district councils, particularly Penwith district, in which Geevor is situated, and St. Just town council.

We are united in Cornwall. I am delighted to say that the argument in support of the industry is solid, going right across the political boundaries. I am pleased that the hon. Member for Truro is here today. I pay full tribute to the role that he has played in the crisis. We are united, but we look to the Government to save the part of the industry that might be in danger, because the signs are not good. I hope that the Minister will be reassuring, but I do not think that they are good. Even if trading in tin is resumed fairly soon on the London metal exchange, parts of the industry will need special temporary assistance. The case for assistance is overwhelming. Aid can best be channelled through the development programme, which would make the industry more efficient, open up new reserves of ore and, I hope, enable it to compete with the rest of the world when we return to stability.

[Mr. David Harris]

We look to my right hon. Friend to respond sympathetically to the case being made by Cornwall on behalf of perhaps its oldest industry, which is part of its heritage. The industry must not be allowed to die.

8.50 am

Mr. David Penhaligon (Truro): As the hon. Member for St. Ives (Mr. Harris) said, there is no political disagreement on this issue. Our job is to ensure that London is aware of what faces our county.

We all recognise that the world's tin producers have operated a cartel and that the cartel has broken. One of the initial problems after a cartel is broken is that the commodity's price falls way below the marginal costs of production. That presents great difficulty for the industry. It requires much belt tightening and investment. If the price falls dramatically below the marginal cost of production, swathes of our industry are in the greatest difficulty. Indeed, I wonder whether there is any future for it.

I am aware of the international ramifications and of the European role, but the mines are in Cornwall, which is represented here, and we look to the British Government for some assistance. I hope that the Minister does not put off saying whether he will be able to help by saying that we are appealing to the EC, the United Nations or someone else. It is a British responsibility and there should be a British response. I do not expect the Minister to stand up with his cheque book and say exactly how assistance will be given, but he could give west Cornwall the most joy by saying that the Government recognise the problem and, come the crunch, will assist.

8.52 am

The Minister for Trade (Mr. Paul Channon): My hon. Friend the Member for St. Ives (Mr. Harris) and the hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Penhaligon) deserve the congratulations of the House and their constituents on the extreme assiduity and persistence with which they have pursued this important subject, the crisis in the tin market and the difficulties that have arisen with the international tin agreement.

The House will appreciate that, at this very minute, the International Tin Council is in session in London, so I hope that hon. Members will understand if I am cautious about what I say about what might or might not be the outcome of any talks. The United Kingdom has been a member of successive international tin agreements since 1956. The current agreement—the sixth—came into force in 1982. Like previous ones, it provided for the International Tin Council to engage in buffer stock operations—buying and selling tin—to keep tin prices within an agreed price range. It was a commodity agreement with full economic provisions and was due to expire in 1987, but it could be extended up to two years. Its purpose was to maintain the price within a given range. Buffer stock was therefore established and a buffer stock manager operated a system of intervention buying and selling to keep the price within that range. The agreement has had the difficulty from the start that the price range seems to have been always higher than that which might have been set by a free market. Therefore, production has been stimulated, consumption has fallen, and large stocks of tin have accumulated, despite export controls in some producer member countries. It is a case of over-supply.

On 24 October the International Tin Council announced that it no longer had sufficient funds to continue buffer stop operations. The London metal exchange later announced the suspension of dealing in tin, and since then it has remained closed. From the outset the Government have made it clear that our overwhelming priority is to secure agreement to a satisfactory resolution of the ITC's obligations, and to get a return to ordinary trading in tin. That must be in everyone's interests.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State has repeatedly stated that the Government remain fully committed to meeting their share of any commitments of the council member countries. He has used every conceivable channel open to him, diplomatically, through the Community, and in every other way, to impress on other members of the ITC that that is the case, and that they should adopt the same position. His proposals are still under consideration in the ITC, and we are pressing other council members to follow his lead on financial obligations.

The present meeting, which began on 2 December, will remain in session until definitive decisions have been taken. I hope that the House will understand if I decline to comment on the progress of those discussions, as we do not wish to prejudice the chances of a successful outcome. The task is extremely difficult. The United Kingdom is one of 22 members of the international tin agreement. It has been suggested that the ITC should be enabled to recommence its buffer stop operations to protect the interests of poorer countries which are particularly dependent on sales of tin, and the Cornish tin mining industry. Our priority is to secure the agreement of the member countries on an equitable way of settling the council's obligations. It is premature to discuss any future arrangement until we have agreement on what should happen now, and until an agreement has been reached. However, it is difficult to envisage that it is likely that we shall find an agreed basis for the renegotiation of the agreement in future.

I agree with my hon. Friend and the hon. Gentleman that the matter is tremendously important to Cornwall and those who live and work there. There are only three main tin mines, as I understand it. My hon. Friend referred to Geevor and the hon. Gentleman has talked about Wheal Jane and South Crofty. About 1,520 people are directly employed in tin mining. The figure includes the three mines and smaller mining activities. Other people are indirectly employed. We are fully aware of their great anxiety.

I had the opportunity to meet members of Cornwall county council with my hon. Friend and the hon. Gentleman. It is too early to judge what impact recent developments will have on the commercial prospects of United Kingdom tin mining. The most important factor will be the price at which tin settles when orderly trading has been resumed. The hon. Gentleman is right in saying that if we have a hard landing, it is likely that the price of tin will fall lower than if there was a soft landing.

Mr. Gordon Brown (Dunfermline, East): Will the Minister respond to calls from companies and trade unions in the Cornwall area for a capital injection? Will he delay a decision on this beyond the point at which many people may be made redundant?

Mr. Channon: Of course, no decisions will be delayed beyond the point at which decisions would be too late. As my hon. Friend the Member for St. Ives said, we have a little breathing space. We cannot foresee what the position will be when ordinary market trading resumes, but we are monitoring it extremely carefully, and we shall continue to listen to the views of all those with an interest in the well-being of the Cornish industry. I have taken full note of the views of hon. Members on both sides of the House, and the views of hon. Members who visited me recently with representatives of the Cornish industry. I hope that my hon. Friend and the hon. Member for Truro will remain in touch with me. The position will be much clearer in a few weeks, if not days, when the International Tin Council concludes its deliberations. I shall take every care——

It being Nine o'clock am on Thursday, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

Maternity Provision (Greater Glasgow)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Thompson.]

9 am

Mr. Norman Hogg (Cumbernauld and Kilsyth): We have reached the end of a long day and what seemed an even longer night. Throughout the Consolidated Fund debate, we were assisted by the Clerks and the staff of all the Departments of the House. It would be right to place on record the grateful thanks of Members for that help.

I am pleased to see with us this morning my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith), my hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown), and my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Maxton), who has shadow responsibility for the Health Service. I am also pleased to see my hon. Friend the Member for Jarrow (Mr. Dixon), who has a keen interest in Scottish affairs.

I am grateful for the opportunity to raise on the Adjournment the important issues surrounding the proposal of Greater Glasgow health board to close Stobhill hospital maternity unit. Ministers frequently refer to spending limits within the Health Service, and claim that more money in real terms is being spent. "Safe in our hands" is their favourite slogan. Why then do we keep hearing of hospital closures? Why then are hospital closures such a feature of Adjournment debates in this House? Why then is the Greater Glasgow health board having to slash its services by £13 million, and why is Stobhill maternity unit on skid row?

Last year, there were 2,000 births at Stobhill, but the board says that the unit is under-used. It is certainly not under-used by my constituents. That is amply demonstrated by the Minister's replies to two parliamentary questions that I tabled. He said that the number of patients from Cumbernauld who were discharged from Stobhill maternity unit during the past five years were 461, 620, 532, 518 and 510. The figures for Kilsyth were 181, 188, 172, 176 and 142. There can be no question of the unit not being used by my constituents. Kilsyth has a long tradition of using Stobhill maternity unit, and the community council in the town pointed this out most forcibly to Councillor Tom Barrie and myself. Cumbernauld new town is a young community with an average age of 31, which needs and uses the unit.

This unit enjoys a reputation for progressive and forward-looking maternity care. It fulfils all current NHS recommendations for modern obstetric practice. It is an integral part of a general hospital with full laboratory, anaesthetic and surgical facilities. It is a teaching unit giving a combined training for doctors of obstetrics and gynaecology in health centres. It deals with one quarter of all medical undergraduates at Glasgow university. All this, yet perhaps the high levels of efficiency achieved at the unit have contributed to it becoming a target for cuts. It was an 85-bed unit, which was reduced to 65 because of the excellent day care provided for expectant mothers, which reduced the necessity for 24-hour bed care. The latter has been of particular help to the mothers and families alike.

The economics of the proposed closure requires greater scrutiny. The board says that it will save £1 million on Stobhill hospital, yet the 2,000 patients will have to go somewhere—possibly Monklands general hospital will cover Cumbernauld, and Kilsyth will be served by Stirling or Falkirk. Such provision would not be acceptable to my constituents. It would be extremely awkward in travel terms, involving costly journeys, and would be extremely inconvenient for the expectant mothers. To be plain, Kilsyth and Cumbernauld cannot do without the Stobhill unit, and I am sure that is equally true of northern Glasgow, Bishopbriggs and Kirkintilloch.

[Mr. Norman Hogg]

I have already pointed out that a large number of the patients come from Cumbernauld new town, and the unit has a direct relationship with Cumbernauld's central health centre, where a specialist ante-natal clinic is provided. Kilsyth has a similar service, provided twice a month. Were Stobhill to close, the service to my constituents would be drastically reduced. A hundred highly skilled people would either lose their jobs or be transferred. A highly efficient team would be broken up and lost to the Health Service in Glasgow. Cuts of the kind proposed reveal the awful consequences of Government policy. How far removed from reality is the easy rhetoric of Ministers. My constituency is at one in condemning this proposal. Kilsyth community council, Cumbernauld and Kilsyth district council and myself, are utterly opposed to the proposed closure, and we urge the Minister to ask the Secretary of State to withhold his consent from the board's proposals. Instead he should make further financial provision to the Greater Glasgow health board so that this facility can continue its excellent service to my constituents.

9.7 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. John MacKay): I have a distinct feeling of déjà vu about this debate. The hon. Member for Cumbernauld and Kilsyth (Mr. Hogg) and I faced each other across the dispatch box in very similar circumstances and at the same hour of the night—or morning—in July of this year. On that occasion, the subject chosen by the hon. Gentleman related to the acute hospital services provided by the Greater Glasgow health board for residents of the towns of Cumbernauld and Kilsyth which the hon. Gentleman represents but which are situated within the area of Lanarkshire health board. If my memory serves me right, our previous debate rather concentrated on the service provided by the Glasgow royal infirmary.

Although the subject of today's debate is maternity services in Greater Glasgow, the hon. Gentleman's particular interest is the maternity service provided by Greater Glasgow health board to residents of Cumbernauld and Kilsyth. There are aspects of the debate which we had in July which are relevant to today's debate and to which I shall return later in my speech.

I would not, however, wish to draw too close a parallel with the debate in July since the subject of today's debate raises a number of separate and specific issues which, given the current widespread concern about the future provision of maternity services in Glasgow, it is only right that we should have the opportunity to debate and set out for the record.

To begin with, it might be helpful to describe briefly the current provision of maternity services in Greater Glasgow. Maternity services cover, of course, the primary care sector, the community care sector and the hospital service. While much of the current attention focuses on the last of these, it is important to recognise the substantial contribution made to the health and welfare of expectant mothers and their babies by general practitioners and by the community nursing service. There have been significant improvements in the perinatal mortality rates in Glasgow during the last few years. Everybody can be rightly proud of those improved rates. For example, in 1975 the perinatal mortality rate was 22·5 per 1,000 births. By 1984, it had been reduced to 10·2 per 1,000 births. This is a considerable achievement for the Greater Glasgow health board, and credit for the successful implementation of these measures must go to the doctors and nurses working in and with the community as well as in the hospitals.

The hospital maternity service does not, of course, operate separately from the community maternity service and it is self-evident that there must be close co-operation between the two, and, indeed, as full an integration of them as possible. Here again I would mention the practice of the Greater Glasgow health board of setting up ante-natal clinics in some of its more deprived peripheral housing estates staffed by hospital-based doctors and nurses. I think it is again worth our taking the time to recognise and applaud such service developments which have played their part in the reduction of perinatal mortality.

I turn to the hospital services in Greater Glasgow. There are five maternity units in the board's area — the Glasgow royal maternity hospital at Rottenrow in the east of the city; the Queen Mother's hospital at Yorkhill; Stobhill hospital to the north of the city; Rutherglen maternity hospital and the Southern general hospital, both serving the city's southern parts. Together, these units provide a total maternity bed complement of 557, and in 1984-85 the total average number of these beds, staffed and available for use, was 524. In the calendar year to 31 December 1984, there were 15,189 deliveries at these hospitals, with the largest number—4,000—being at the royal maternity hospital at Rottenrow and the smallest—2,100 — at the Stobhill maternity unit. These figures reflect to some extent the relative sizes of the units.

Of the 15,189 births in the Greater Glasgow hospitals in 1984, some 1,650, or 11 per cent., were to mothers resident in Lanarkshire. This reflects the general pattern of health care in that part of Scotland to which we referred in our July debate and to which the hon. Gentleman referred earlier—the historical and continuing practice of hospitals in Glasgow providing a service to nearby centres of population in immediately adjacent health boards, notably in Lanarkshire. Of the 1,650 births in 1984 to Lanarkshire mothers in Glasgow hospitals, 656 were at the Rutherglen maternity hospital; 440 at the Stobhill unit; 430 at the royal maternity hospital; 94 at the Queen Mother's hospital; and 30 at the Southern general hospital.

This cross-boundary flow of patients is of course a common feature of the Health Service and the receiving health board is suitably reimbursed for the additional work load created. Here, however, I should like to pick up a theme from the debate earlier this year to which I have referred: the importance of close co-operation between health boards in such matters so that as full and complete a service as possible is provided to all patients, irrespective of their place of residence, and in the way most cost-effective to both boards. So far as I am aware, there has been very good co-operation and understanding between the Greater Glasgow and Lanarkshire health boards in the provision of maternity services across their administrative boundary and it is most important that this should continue. I am sure the hon. Gentleman would wish to acknowledge in particular the important and positive role which the Greater Glasgow health board has played in the provision of maternity services for his constituents in Cumbernauld and Kilsyth.

It is of course the future provision of these services that concerns the hon. Gentleman. Indeed, in a wider context it concerns a number of Opposition Members who represent Glasgow constituencies, and also my hon. Friend the Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Hirst). They have indicated to me their concern about these services. It may be helpful at this point to explain some of the background to the current proposals by the Greater Glasgow health board to rationalise its hospital maternity services by the closure of the unit at Stobhill general hospital.

The Greater Glasgow health board's net revenue allocation for 1984-85 was £343·9 million and for 1985-86, £359·2 million. The board announced earlier this year that it was facing a £9 million budgetary deficit for the current financial year and a possible £13·5 million budgetary deficit for next year, 1986-87, although I have not yet announced the allocations to boards in 1986-87. It is most important to recognise that this arose not from any financial cuts imposed on the board but from the realisation by the board that if it continued its existing spending patterns it simply could not live within its means. Some hon. Members have commented that these budget deficits arose from the effect of the pay awards this year for doctors and nurses. This is not so because, as a result of the Government's deliberate staging of these awards, their net effect on Greater Glasgow's budget in each of the years in question is considerably less than the budget deficit figures that I have quoted.

The prospect of these budgetary deficits led Greater Glasgow to seek measures for generating savings through increased efficiency and through possible rationalisation of services. It was not simply this short-term crisis, however, that prompted the board to look at such measures. The board is well aware of the considerable improvements which are increasingly becoming necessary in its long-stay hospitals, for the elderly, whose numbers are as a proportion of the total population increasing, for the mentally ill, who for years have been accommodated in aging Victorian buildings which are more and more becoming substandard and for the mentally handicapped who, in Glasgow, are almost all accommodated in one single institution at Lennox castle.

To give credit to the board, it has in recent years been progressing a number of major projects in the psychiatric field—a 240-bed redevelopment at Lennox castle, a 120-bed development at Gartloch, a 120-bed development at Parkhead and most recently a prospective 240-bed development at Rutherglen. These are significant advances, but much remains to be done, particularly north of the river Clyde. All these developments require revenue resources to staff and operate them and the board is aware that while it can expect to continue to receive growth money in its annual allocations it will require to supplement this by finding resources from its existing allocations as a result of its very favourable funding position at present. Indeed, the board is the second best funded board in Scotland by reference to the objectively based assessment of relative need provided by the SHARE formula, introduced by the Labour Government. For the present year the board is about £16 million better off than it would be were the resources allocated purely according to this assessment. In the years to come, however, the board is aware that it will gradually lose this advantage as funds are increasingly directed to the relatively under-funded boards. Ayrshire and Arran and Lanarkshire are but two of them in close proximity to Greater Glasgow.

At the same time, it is also well known that Greater Glasgow has some of the highest cost acute hospitals in the country, even comparing teaching hospital with teaching hospital. This results in part from the higher level of doctors and nurses which the board has maintained despite the constant fall in the size of population which it serves. The board recognises that it is time that the running of these hospitals was examined to find out why they should be so much more costly comparable hospitals elsewhere in Scotland.

All these factors have contributed to move the board towards a programme of efficiency savings and rationalisation within its acute services sector which, for this purpose, includes its obstetric service. The package of savings that it has devised amounts to a maximum of £13 million, though there may well be further potential savings available within the board's operations which the board will have to continue seeking, both to secure maximum efficiency in the resources it uses and to redirect such savings into the areas of patient care which I have outlined and where improvements are very much required. Of the present package, however, most of the savings proposed are in the main acute hospitals where an analysis of staff costs, supplies costs, and total costs per patient has revealed significantly higher figures than in comparable hospitals elsewhere in Scotland.

A further element of the package, however, and the one which concerns hon. Members is the proposed closure of the Stobhill maternity unit, with a possible overall expenditure saving of about £1 million per annum. I will explain why the board is considering this possibility.

I mentioned earlier that during the financial year 1984-85 there were on average 524 maternity beds staffed and available for use. On average, however, only 368 of these beds, or some 70 per cent., were occupied, and the maximum occupancy achieved in that year was only 440 beds, or 84 per cent. In other words, even on the day of maximum occupancy, there were 84 additional beds available and fully staffed but not in use. Compared with the official bed complement of 557, the discrepancy is even greater.

Against those figures and against the general background that I have described as to Greater Glasgow's budgetary position, it must be entirely understandable to all concerned that the board has some scope for efficiency savings here. It is simply a waste of resources to staff beds which are not required, and particularly when the resources so used are desperately needed elsewhere in the board's services.

The board's specific proposal, as I understand it—and I have yet to see it formally—is to close the in-patient accommodation at the Stobhill maternity unit. This unit has a notional bed complement of 83 beds. In 1984-85, it had an average of 65 available staffed beds with an average occupancy of 40 beds. This represents 61 per cent. of staffed beds, and less than 50 per cent. of the notional bed complement.

[Mr. John MacKay]

On the basis of the current bed usage figures for the area as a whole which I quoted earlier, the board should be able to withstand such a closure and provide alternative accommodation on the 84 unused beds at the four other maternity units in its area, presumably at the Royal Maternity hospital if at all possible, as that is closest to the population in the north of the city which the present Stobhill unit serves.

If this closure went ahead, it would, as the hon. Gentleman explained, have a major effect on the maternity service provided by Greater Glasgow health board for the residents of Cumbernauld and Kilsyth. Clearly, this is a case where my right hon. Friend and I would expect the Greater Glasgow health board to consult closely with the Lanarkshire health board to find the most acceptable alternative service which can be provided. Indeed, I understand that preliminary discussions have already been held between officers of the two boards.

But such discussions will be only part of the much wider consultation which Greater Glasgow is obliged to undertake in consequence of the well-established procedures where a closure or major change of use is envisaged. The great merit of these consultation procedures is that they give all parties or individuals who may be affected by the proposed closure or change of use the formal opportunity to express their views on the proposal in the light of the consultative document which the board must issue.

That consultation document will have to set out clearly the reasons for the proposed closure and the alternative services which the board proposes to provide in place, in this case, of the Stobhill maternity unit. The Greater Glasgow health board has yet to issue its consultative document, and in many ways it is premature to discuss the issue in detail until the board has set out its case fully. I urge hon. Members, therefore, to wait until they have seen the consultation document before coming to a final view on the merits of the case. I urge hon. Members, having read the document, to take the opportunity provided by the consultation exercise to make their observations directly to the Greater Glasgow health board. The same applies to anybody else who feels affected by the proposed changes that the board will make in the consultative document. When the board has received all the responses to that document, it will again consider the matter, and if the board decides to proceed it must come to my right hon. Friend, and that is the other purpose behind the consultation exercise.

Before any board may proceed, it has to come for approval to my right hon. Friend and I. In making a decision, my right hon. Friend and I take fully into account the result of the board's consultation exercise so that the consultation process and the responses to it are not only useful for the board in coming to its decision but, if it decides to continue with its closure decision, the consultation exercise is useful to my right hon. Friend and I when we come to consider whether we should agree with the board.

The hon. Gentleman has raised a number of detailed points about the effect which possible closure of Stobhill would have on his constituents. I hope that he will accept, in the light of the formal position held on this matter by my right hon. Friend and I, that it would not be proper for me to comment on the merits of the board's proposals. In this speech I have sought to avoid comment on that for the very reason that eventually my right hon. Friend and I will have to decide. But I have tried to explain some of the factual background which has led up to the board's proposal.

Maternity provision throughout the country is facing the same sort of problem because with falling birth rates and improvements in maternity services leading to shorter stays in hospital by mothers after the birth we are seeing a lot of surplus capacity in maternity services in many health board areas. I do not think that there is one health board that does not have an imbalance in its maternity service, with more beds than its maternal population demands. There is spare capacity. It cannot be anything other than right for health boards to look at that spare capacity and to ask themselves whether they really need it because the resources which are going into those unused beds and facilities could be used for other patients who need services. I mentioned earlier the care of the elderly, the mentally handicapped and so on.

I should like to assure the hon. Gentleman and all other hon. Members concerned in the matter that my right hon. Friend and I will give close attention to their responses to the Greater Glasgow health board's formal consultation document before we reach any decision on the matter. In view of the considerable concern which the issue has aroused, I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving me the opportunity to explain some of the background to the board's proposal even if, as I say, I cannot comment on the proposal at present and at this early stage in the board's consultation process. But I can assure him that I am more than mindful that it is not just the patients of the Greater Glasgow health board area who are affected by the proposals, but also the patients in Lanarkshire health board area. All those matters will be taken into account by the board, in conjunction with Lanarkshire, and also by my right hon. Friend and I if the decision comes to us.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty-seven minutes past Nine o'clock on Thursday morning.

House of Commons

Thursday 19 December 1985

The House met at half-past Two o'clock

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

Oral Answers to Questions

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Cereals

1. Mr. Heathcoat-Amory asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what information he has on the size of intervention stocks of cereals held in Britain.

The Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. John Selwyn Gummer): I am replying on behalf of my right hon. Friend the Minister, who is at a Council meeting in Brussels.

On 6 December, unsold stocks in intervention stores in Great Britain were 2·1 million tonnes of barley and 3·6 million tonnes of wheat.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Will my right hon. Friend explain how those quantities persist even after a poor harvest? Does he agree that those surplus stocks represent a standing indictment of the way in which the common agricultural policy is still being run and are doing great damage to the image of British farming? Will my right hon. Friend make proposals for reducing those surpluses?

Mr. Gummer: My hon. Friend is right to say that the surplus stocks are far too high and do no good to the image of agriculture. The Commission has presented its proposals and they are being discussed. It is obviously necessary to move the CAP away from being a means of ensuring that we do not have a shortage of food and towards becoming a system that enables us to control what are now surpluses.

Mr. Home Robertson: What is the cost of that storage exercise in a full year? What proportion of cereal stocks have been in store for more than 12 months?

Mr. Gummer: Detailed replies to those questions have been given to the hon. Gentleman and his hon. Friends recently, but the average cost of commercial storage is about £10·22 per tonne per year.

Sir Peter Hordern: Are not cereal farmers already getting far too much subsidy? When will something realistic be done to reduce those subsidies so that consumers pay a reasonable price for their bread?

Mr. Gummer: My hon. Friend is right to say that price must be the basis of the removal of the surpluses; there must be much greater price discipline. However, we must also ensure that there is a sufficient return for the farmer so that he is able to produce the goods. We have to balance those aspects. If we are to do that, we must ensure that the increasing ability of farmers to grow more on the same acreage results in a lower price per tonne.

Milk Quotas

2. Dr. Marek asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a further statement on the impact of milk quotas in England and Wales.

Mr. Gummer: At the end of November total wholesale deliveries in England and Wales were about 2·5 per cent. below the Milk Marketing Board's quota projection. If this trend continues, no producer will be liable for levy on milk he supplies to the MMB. I hope that producers will take good note of this and make every effort to maximise uptake of our national quotas.

Dr. Marek: In spite of the temporary underproduction compared with the quota, does the Minister accept that a further 3 per cent. cut across the board throughout the Common Market would be unfair to this country and lead to a further loss of jobs in our creameries? Has the right hon. Gentleman any new proposals for action within the Common Market over the flouting of its rules by countries such as France and Ireland? We religiously stick to what has been agreed.

Mr. Gummer: That is not an accurate statement of what has happened in the rest of the Community. We are discussing a further Community outgoers' scheme. We have the details and the scheme is before the Council. We have to make a decision. We are still talking about a considerable surplus of milk throughout the Community and we must put that right.

Mr. Maclean: Does my right hon. Friend agree that Britain's milk output is as low as is desirable and that the only merit of the 3 per cent. reduction scheme is that it gives some rights to tenants? However, the amounts per cow are too generous and the knock-on effects in beef and other sectors would be disastrous.

Mr. Gummer: We have many real concerns about the proposals and my hon. Friend has mentioned some of his concerns. Clearly, we must argue those proposals out. However, it remains true that the Community does have a surplus of milk. If there is a surplus, the consumer pays through the tax system in the end.

Mr. Strang: Is the Minister aware that most of the dairy industry will be appalled by his answers? When will the Government face up to the disproportionate cuts in production and jobs that have taken place in Britain's dairy industry? Will the Government recognise that the proposed outgoers' scheme is likely to have a disproportionate effect in Britain? Many organisations, including the Dairy Trade Federation, have argued that case. When will the Government start saving jobs in the dairy industry?

Mr. Gummer: It seems that the hon. Gentleman, who represents a party which claims to be an internationalist party, has an odd view of the European Economic Community and the excellent way in which it seeks to solve the problems of agriculture across Europe.

Mr. Colin Shepherd: Will my right hon. Friend reaffirm that if at the end of the milk year British producers have not produced up to quota there will be no question of the national quota being reduced in ensuing years?

Mr. Gummer: My hon. Friend is right. We are concerned to fight for a fair deal for Britain within the Community. In that case, it would obviously be wrong for the quota to be changed because we did not meet it this year for what may well be temporary reasons. However, it is to the advantage of the industry if it does produce up to quota. That is why my right hon. Friend the Minister has drawn that to the industry's notice.

Mr. John: Why do the cheese manufacturers complain that they cannot obtain enough milk to manufacture Cheddar cheese in Britain if, as the hon. Gentleman says, we are running short of our quota?

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Gentleman is right in that there have been complaints from some manufacturers. That is a matter for the Milk Marketing Board, which decides where the milk shall go. It is, in its view, the right way to do it. I am looking into this matter carefully because it would be quite wrong if there were any truth in that allegation.

Mr. Andy Stewart: In 1984 we had a shortfall in milk output targets and we shall also have a shortfall this year. Is that not an indictment? Is it not high time that we had a scheme for transferring quotas between farmers?

Mr. Gummer: My hon. Friend is right to say that the quota system will not work effectively unless there is a reasonable degree of transferability between farmers. Britain has always stood for that. We are fighting hard in the Council to see that we get a sensible transfer scheme.

Cereals

4. Mr. McQuarrie asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will propose to the European Economic Community that surplus cereals in intervention should be released for use as feed by farmers who have been adversely affected by the severe weather crisis.

Mr. Gummer: Feed grain in intervention stores in Great Britain is available for sale on the home market at the intervention price. There is little demand at present, as supplies from the open market are cheaper. In addition, measures have already been adopted to make intervention feed wheat from stores in Great Britain available in Northern Ireland.

Mr. McQuarrie: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that reply. Does he accept that the feed grain which was given to Northern Ireland was given at a reduced price? In view of the information that he conveyed to my hon. Friend the Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory) in an earlier question, does he agree that all farmers who suffer severely from the winter weather crisis should be entitled to the same consideration, whether in Scotland, England or Northern Ireland?

Mr. Gummer: I am sure my hon. Friend will agree that it is reasonable for people to be able to get the feed wheat at least at the same price in various parts of the country. We needed to transfer the wheat to Northern Ireland, and there were special reasons why it had to be done from the rest of the United Kingdom intervention stores. As for that being part of weather aid, it was considered, and I think in general the agricultural community agrees that it was right to provide that aid in other ways. A certain amount of money was available and we used it in other ways, but we do not believe that in Scotland that would have been the best way to help those worst hit by the bad weather.

Mr. Pike: At the end of November over 29 per cent. of the intervention stock of cereals had been held for over a year. Is it not time that we had action rather than words from the Government to deal with that problem in view of the cost that the Minister gave in reply to an earlier question.

Mr. Gummer: Of course it is time that we stopped over-production of cereals. That is why the Government have fought hard for a system that is based upon price restraint and ensures that in the future we do not produce too much. We have passed through a period in which shortage has been the main problem. We have moved into a period in which we are producing too much, and in those circumstances the whole system of agricultural support must be turned to deal with the new situation of plenty.

Sir Hector Monro: Does my right hon. Friend accept that there has been a warm welcome in Scotland and the north of England for the help that he has been able to give farmers who have been affected by the extremely bad weather? Nevertheless, referring to the question asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. McQuarrie), it would be of additional assistance if my right hon. Friend could give some intervention grain for feed mixtures until the spring. It could be helpful for livestock producers.

Mr. Gummer: I am most grateful to my hon. Friend for making the point about the great welcome that has been given to that package. It has been widely accepted as especially good in view of Government restraint on expenditure. It is unlikely that that package will be extended, although, of course, I shall carefully consider what he said.

5. Mr. Home Robertson asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what acreage of barley and wheat has been sown this winter.

Mr. Gummer: This information will not be available until about March, when the results of the December agricultural census will be published.

Mr. Home Robertson: Is the Minister aware that the substantial areas that have already been planted will add to the cereal mountain next summer? As 29 per cent. of the cereal in intervention stores has been there for more than 12 months, as my hon. Friend the Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike) said, does the Minister recognise the complete inadequacy of his proposals and those of the European Commission to deal with the matter? What is his response to the Labour party's demand for incentives for alternative land uses coupled, if necessary, with a quota scheme for cereals?

Mr. Gummer: It is odd that the hon. Gentleman should suggest that his party has any answer to that problem, because we are now in a world in which technological advance has meant considerable increases in what we can produce. We should start by saying, thank God that we are in the business of dealing with plenty rather than shortage. The answer must be a Community answer. The Commission has put before us proposals about which we have considerable doubts. We are seeking a price restraint system which will ensure that we do not produce too much. The hon. Gentleman may push his hand like that, but if we have too high a price we shall go on producing too much.

Mr. Ralph Howell: Does my right hon. Friend accept that he must find an answer to this problem? If he will not accept quotas, will he accept production control? Does he agree that every other industry has to accept such control? It is time that the Government recognised that cutting prices will not solve the problem; it will aggravate it. We must alter our stance and have production control in cereals.

Mr. Gummer: My hon. Friend and I have argued about this matter before. I am aware that we do not agree. Until we have a package in which price is the basic way in which we reduce production——

Mr. Howell: No. Nonsense.

Mr. Gummer: —we shall not have a package at all.

Mr. Skinner: Give it to him.

Mr. Gummer: It is all right for Labour Members to say, "Give it to him," to my hon. Friends, but at least my hon. Friends are arguing about something for which they care, which is more than the Opposition do.

Mr. Deakins: What estimates has the Minister made of the impact on British cereal production in the current year of the Commission's cut in cereal prices in that year?

Mr. Gummer: There has been a net cut of about 3·5 per cent. in the price of cereals. We cannot dissociate that from any other element which has affected production this year. I am sure that had the price continued to increase production would have increased even more than it has.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Does my right hon. Friend accept that many involved in the industry feel that if a prudent price policy is to be effective the cuts must be dramatic? That being so, there is a move within the industry to support acreage quotas. What is his view on that?

Mr. Gummer: I am sure that my hon. Friend is correct and that the industry is moving towards a mixture of price and some kind of quota system. I hope that the industry considers carefully how such a system would be policed and organised and whether it would not, perhaps, result in a kind of sterilisation of the industry which neither he nor any of my other hon. Friends would like.

Food Labelling

7. Mr. Alton asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will convene an inquiry to study and recommend methods of standard and informative food labelling.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mrs. Peggy Fenner): My right hon. Friend the Minister is advised on such matters by the Food Advisory Committee, which is composed of independent experts. Its reports, and any proposals for legislation, are subject to consultation with all interested parties.

Mr. Alton: How long will it be before the Ministry implements the findings of its research, carried out in conjunction with the National Consumer Council, into whether clearer labelling should be provided on canned food, and especially should show levels of added sugar and salt? If that does not happen, would not the Ministry be open to the charge that it is simply pandering and kowtowing to the interests of the canned food manufacturers?

Mrs. Fenner: No. My right hon. Friend made it very clear that we accepted the report of COMA. We have been holding consultations to find the most practical way to implement it. The hon. Gentleman was right to say that we also carried out a consumer survey to assess the needs of consumers in relation to labelling. We are considering all the comments made and hope to bring forward proposals shortly.

Mr. Coombs: Is my hon. Friend aware that 60 per cent. of those responsible for food shopping who were interviewed in a recent market research survey said that they considered the health aspect of food when deciding what to buy? Against that background, and also because many supermarkets, including Tesco, are now introducing this food labelelling, does she recognise that there is a need for the utmost dispatch in introducing labelling proposals?

Mrs. Fenner: I agree with my hon. Friend, which is why we are currently considering proposals for legislation that will provide a statutory requirement to indicate on labels the fat content in food. We are also looking at a format for nutrition labelling. We are aware that although COMA did not recommend that, a great deal of interest is being displayed both by consumers and manufacturers. If nutrition labelling is taken up, we want it to be in a form that will help rather than confuse the consumer.

Mr. Ashley: Is the Minister aware that even when additives are considered generally to be safe, some individuals suffer adverse reactions to them? Are those people not entitled to protection like everyone else? Therefore, should not all main additives be shown on the label?

Mrs. Fenner: Indeed, and the Food Act 1984 requires that. The lead-in time means that by 1 July 1986 all additives must be shown on labels, whether in number, description, or both.

There is no proof that there is a connection between allergenicity and food additives. My Department has commissioned research into connections between adverse reactions and food and food additives.

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith: Does my hon. Friend agree that it might be a sensible step, which would benefit housewives and other shoppers, if the major food stores explained the meaning of the E number on labels?

Mrs. Fenner: My Ministry produces a book which, if we were not giving it away, would be counted as its best seller. It is entitled "Look at the Label" and sets out all the E numbers. We are considering what other systems of educational information should be provided.

Mr. John: I hope the Minister accepts that people do not want to go shopping with a ready reckoner to discover what additives are in food. Will she confirm that when regulations are made they will not be two-tier—one, the statutory labelling of fat content, and the other an optional requirement to show added sugar, salt and fibre?

Mrs. Fenner: COMA recommended statutory labelling of fat content. We have responded to that and proposals will be put before the House. COMA did not recommend statutory nutrition labelling. If we introduced that, we might have some difficulty within the EEC because of distortion of trade.

Mr. Gregory: Will my hon. Friend confirm that we are fully behind the EEC Commission's proposal to include in the revision of the 1973 chocolate directive a vegetable content of up to 5 per cent.? Will she bear in mind that for almost half a century the United Kingdom confectionery trade has included that content and ensure that we do not follow the French and Belgian Members of the European Assembly in the spirit of the fruit-and-nut case in going along that line, which would reduce jobs, reduce choice and reduce United Kingdom confectionery in the EEC market?

Mrs. Fenner: Yes. I give my hon. Friend that assurance.

Cereals

8. Mr. Deakins asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when the European Economic Community Council will next consider the level of cereal prices for the current year; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: The Council took no decisions earlier this year on cereals prices for the current marketing year, although discussions continue, and the Commission has now laid before the Council further proposals.

Mr. Deakins: When the Council comes to consider cereal prices for next year, will it take as its base figure the level of cereal prices for the current year as determined by the Council following the German veto, or the level of cereal prices as determined by the Commission?

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Gentleman knows that the proposals before the Council will have to be considered by all the members of the Council. The Government have made it clear that we welcome the fall of 3·5 per cent. in real terms in the price given to cereals and that we intend to have that and to pull the price down still further.

Mr. Harris: Is my right hon. Friend aware of two pieces of evidence given to the Select Committee on Agriculture? The first piece is that the amount of grain in intervention stores is virtually bound to increase still further. The second piece is that farms have now reached the ridiculous point of growing purely for intervention rather than for the market. Although my right hon. Friend is right to put his faith in price restraint, if it can be achieved, the fact is that that will not be achieved because of the view of our partners in Europe. Will he be prepared for what I reckon will be the inevitable consequence of the introduction of quotas so that we do not get them introduced overnight?

Mr. Gummer: I am sure my hon. Friend is right in saying that we should be prepared for a package that will include a range of measures. That is always true and it would be wrong to think otherwise, but unless the Government stand firmly by the fact that we need to have a major part of the package based upon price discipline, price discipline will not be achieved, and it is essential for success.

Mr. Geraint Howells: Will the Minister agree with me and others that if we lower the price of grain by 5 per cent., production will increase by 10 per cent. within the next two years?

Mr. Gummer: I do not agree with that.

Mr. Bill Walker: My right hon. Friend will be aware that we had a drought last year and that this year has been particularly wet. Does he recommend to farmers in Scotland that in future they should go into warehousing? It is obvious that there is more money in that than in growing cereals or keeping livestock.

Mr. Gummer: No, Sir, I do not so recommend.

Mr. Strang: Will the Government oppose root and branch the proposal for a co-responsibility levy for cereals?

Mr. Gummer: For the many reasons that we have put forward previously we do not like the concept of the co-responsibility levy. We do not enter these discussions on the basis that we oppose root and branch any of the proposals put forward. We shall consider, discuss and argue them and try to come to a solution that fits the whole of Europe, for the Conservative party is an internationalist party.

Mr. Budgen: May I remind my right hon. Friend that when there were proposals to reduce the production of milk, our Government said that the quotas would be bureaucratic and impracticable? Is there any guarantee that when there are proposals in Europe to reduce the production of cereals the Government will not once again go along with a solution which they know to be wrong and against the interests of the British people?

Mr. Gummer: We do not believe that quotas are the way to solve the problem. We have said that clearly. We believe that the way to solve the problem is by price restraint. We shall continue to press that. That seems to be a solution that will be good for Britain and for the rest of the European Community, to which we belong.

Mr. Home Robertson: As the Minister keeps saying that price restraint is the right way to control surpluses, will he give an estimate of the percentage price cut that would be necessary to bring supply into line with demand? What would be the effect of such a cut on smaller producers? Will the right hon. Gentleman accept that such a solution would be intolerable? We need a comprehensive package, which must include quotas.

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Gentleman always asks for a comprehensive package without indicating what would be in it. Whatever the results we come to, and whatever the period during which cuts are obtained, it is necessary for cereal prices to come down.

Agricultural Land

9. Mr. Chapman asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is his latest estimate of the annual loss of agricultural land to other forms of development.

Mrs. Fenner: For England, the average annual loss of agricultural land to other forms of development for the five-year period ending June 1984 is estimated to be 13,000 hectares, or 32,000 acres.

Mr. Chapman: The answer to that identical question last year was 35,000 acres. Will my hon. Friend confirm that there is a welcome trend downwards in loss of agricultural land to other developments? Will she confirm that the proportion of agricultural land last year to building and other urban developments this year—about half—is also about the same proportion as last year?

Mrs. Fenner: I confirm that the net reduction in the rate of loss of agricultural land in recent years confirms that trend. In the preceding five-year period ending 1979, the average annual loss was approximately 21,000 hectares, or 52,000 acres. About 10,000 hectares of that were known to be for urban and industrial use. During the last five-year period, about 4,000 hectares, or 10,000 acres, per annum have been lost to urban development and industrial use.

Sir Dudley Smith: I draw my hon. Friend's attention to the fact that Warwickshire county council is hell bent on taking a large slice of superior agricultural land to develop a technology park when non-agricultural land is available for the purpose. Will my hon. Friend and her colleagues consult the Department of the Environment to ensure that such a difficulty does not arise in future?

Mrs. Fenner: I shall have to look into that matter. We are consulted at all stages in the preparation of structure and local plans and on all planning applications affecting more than 4 hectares of agricultural land that do not conform to an agreed development plan.

Ewes

10. Mr. Colin Shepherd asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the future arrangements for the export of ewes to France.

Mr. Gummer: Under a European Commission regulation which came into effect on 9 December, we are required to charge clawback—at the rate of 50 per cent. of that applicable to lambs—on ewemeat exported to France. Though we remain opposed to this approach, we have introduced the necessary arrangements. The French have now removed the import restrictions they were operating on our exports of ewemeat.

Mr. Shepherd: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the concept of imposing what is, in effect, a tax on any form of export of agricultural produce from the United Kingdom to the Community is unacceptable? Will my right hon. Friend ensure that the practice is never allowed to stick and that it is never accepted in default? Will he take all the steps at his command to ensure that this kind of penalty is not accepted in future?

Mr. Gummer: My hon. Friend is absolutely right in saying that it is unacceptable to claw back that which one has given in the first place. That does not make sense and we have opposed it wholly. It is also wholly unacceptable and against any kind of international order when a country decides to take the law into its own hands and act in a way that we would consider to be entirely illegal.

Mr. Livsey: What will the right hon. Gentleman do to remove claw back by next spring, when a great number of cull ewes will come on to the market? It is essential to remove this claw back by then.

Mr. Gummer: I said clearly in answering the last question that we believe this to be entirely wrong. We have obeyed the law because it is our business to be law-abiding. We shall do everything in our power to change what is obviously nonsense.

Sir Hector Monro: Will my right hon. Friend accept that his endeavours on behalf of sheep farmers are highly commendable, but as this matter has been dragging on since last September we must try to get it resolved as soon as possible because it is having a very serious impact on the sheepmeat market between this country and the Continent?

Mr. Gummer: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. I believe that it is necessary to stand up in the Community for the rights of British farmers, and it is not proper that their reasonable export demands should be stopped, first, illegally and, secondly, by a system that is clearly nonsense.

Mr. John: Will the Minister confirm the amount of disruption caused by French interference and the loss therefrom to the British farmer? Will he also confirm that the effect of the 50 per cent. levy will be a reduction in the variable premium by 30p a kilo?

Mr. Gummer: I think that the hon. Gentleman is right to say that there has been considerable disruption as a result of the action by the French. That is why we opposed it so strongly, apart from the principle concerned. At the same time, obviously it would be for the trade to take any course of action which it felt was available to it. As to the hon. Gentleman's assertions, I will give him a detailed table of what seem to me to be the direct effects.

Southall Horse Market

11. Mr. Greenway asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he has any plans to visit the Southall horse market; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Fenner: I have no plans at present to visit the market. My veterinary staff attend the market and are able to monitor and encourage compliance with the voluntary code of practice on horse markets.

Mr. Greenway: Does my hon. Friend accept that the voluntary code of practice does not seem to work at Southall, and that inspectors of the Horses and Ponies Protection Association, I and many other people regard the state of affairs there as wholly cruel? Horses and ponies are abused by being left unfed and unwatered for long periods of time. They are not properly presented for sale and they are not properly loaded into boxes when they are removed from Southall. Is it not now time to do something to stop such serious animal abuse?

Mrs. Fenner: There have been considerable improvements of facilities and conditions generally in that market, as my hon. Friend was good enough to acknowledge when he last raised the matter on 16 May. He will know that the Farm Animal Welfare Council is studying the whole question of horses' welfare in markets, and we believe that it is right to await its recommendations for any further action.

Milk Co-responsibility Levy

12. Mr. Knox asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement about the Government's attitude towards the milk co-responsibility levy.

Mr. Gummer: Funds raised by the co-responsibility levy make an important contribution to the cost of supporting the milk sector, particularly to the cost of disposal of the milk surplus.

Mr. Knox: Does my right hon. Friend think there is any prospect of getting rid of this levy in the forthcoming negotiations, as it has achieved little or nothing, and has merely added to the cost of British dairy farming?

Mr. Gummer: It is clearly important that this is taken into account in discussing the price of milk. I understand my hon. Friend's concern, because what started as a levy to do something totally different has now been overtaken by the quota system.

Common Agricultural Policy

13. Mr. Colvin asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the European Commission Green Paper on "Reform of the Common Agricultural Policy."

Mr. Gummer: The Government welcomed the Green Paper and the stress it laid on the importance of price policy in securing a better market balance. We now look to the Commission to make specific proposals adequate to deal with the problems identified.

Mr. Colvin: As a farmer, I congratulate my right hon. Friend on his continued belief in the price mechanism as the best way of controlling surplus output. Has he seen the package of proposals on cereals produced by the Commission since its Green Paper, which in my view discriminates against United Kingdom cereal producers? What changes to those proposals has he in mind to ensure greater equality?

Mr. Gummer: A large number of proposals are obviously not acceptable to us because they discriminate against the pattern of farming in this country and the nature of the cereals that we produce. There is a whole series of items that we would like to see changed. Moreover, we do not believe that the package is adequate to solve the problem, and that has to be done.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: Will the Minister accept that the Green Paper ought to have contained some reference to the problem of food additives, given the real dangers that some people claim are caused to consumers, and particularly to those working in the food sector, who may be exposed to very high levels of food additives?

Mr. Speaker: Order. That question is rather wide of the mark.

Mr. Gummer: If the hon. Gentleman had been present earlier he would have heard our particular discussion on food additives, which do not come under this question.

Mr. Jackson: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that if there were to be quotas in the cereal sector, it would still be necessary to maintain sharp price discipline?

Mr. Gummer: My hon. Friend is right, and only Britain is determined to see that price restraints play a major part in any package of measures. If we do not continue to press for that, we shall have a package that does not work.

Outgoers' Scheme

14. Mr. Cockeram asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received from interested organisations on European Economic Community proposals to set up a Community-wide outgoers' scheme.

Mr. Gummer: I have received representations on the proposed Community outgoers' scheme from hon. Members, interested organisations, and individual farmers. These have reflected a number of concerns, including the position of tenant farmers and landlords. The proposals are still being discussed at official level and are unlikely to come to the Council of Ministers before January.

Mr. Cockeram: Is my right hon. Friend aware that agriculture accepts the need for an outgoers' scheme for the milk industry, but nevertheless there is a legitimate complaint from the landlord and the tenant, each of whom has invested his resources in developing the industry to its present state?

Mr. Gummer: An outgoers' scheme should recognise that in most cases both the landlord and the tenant have contributed to the ability of the land to produce milk. Therefore, it would be wrong to ignore either side in the outgoers' scheme, and we shall ensure that that does not happen.

Mr. John: Does the right hon. Gentleman recognise that if there is a voluntary outgoers' scheme on all agricultural products, that may lead to the withdrawal of the most efficient farmers in some counties and the perpetuation of high-cost inefficient farmers in others?

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Gentleman is right, and we are concerned about this factor. To achieve our purpose we shall look carefully at the scheme and seek to ensure that it is fair as between countries and farmers and as between tenants and landlords.

Falkland Islands

15. Dr. Godman asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what percentage of the total fish catch in a 200-mile zone around the Falkland Islands was made by British distant water vessels in the last year.

Mr. Gummer: I am not aware of any catches made by British distant water vessels in the last year in the waters around the Falklands Islands.

Dr. Godman: Is it not astounding that these rich fishing grounds should be subjected to such ruthless exploitation by the fishing vessels of foreign nations? Should we not be moving towards a more effective system of harvesting, with the direct involvement of British fishing interests and those of the Falklands'?

Mr. Gummer: I am sure the hon. Gentleman knows that British fishing interests have every right to take part in fishing in this area if they so wish. Setting up a different regime there is a matter for my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign and Commonwealth Secretary.

Mr. McQuarrie: Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is ridiculous that Britain has become the laughing-stock of the Community when £50 million worth of fish are being picked up within the 200-mile limit of the Falklands? When do the Government propose to do something about the report by Dr. Beddington of Imperial College?

Mr. Gummer: The general response to the Beddington report is based on advice given by the Minstry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food to the Foreign Office, in whose hands this matter continues to be. As to the first question, I am not aware of any British fishing interest that has been prevented from fishing around the Falklands. If it wishes so to do, it can.

Mr. Randall: Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that an early agreement on the best way to exploit and manage this rich fishery is important to Britain and the fishing industry, especially if one takes into account the rumoured cuts in quotas, about which we expect to hear later this afternoon?

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Gentleman need not be too concerned about that. We are pleased that the Food and Agriculture Organisation has launched its study. When we have the details we shall be able to make a sensible basis for the future fishery potential in this area.

Salmon

27. Sir Hector Monro asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is his estimate of the probable increase in salmon entering British rivers following his announcement on drift netting off the English coast.

Mr. Gummer: The measures which I announced on 7 November will tighten the rules under which the English north-east coast salmon drift net fishery operates. They should produce a significant reduction in the catch of that fishery. Because various natural causes influence the level from season to season, I cannot give a specific forecast of the extent of the increase in salmon entering British rivers.

Sir Hector Monro: Does my right hon. Friend accept that the resolution of the problem of drift netting off the north-east coast of England is crucial to the survival of salmon in the United Kingdom? Will he watch the matter closely and take further action if there are no significant improvements in salmon stocks in Scotland?

Mr. Gummer: I undertake to do that, but I remind my hon. Friend that the arrangements which we have made this year will restrict fishing there, in that there will be no weekend fishing, no night fishing, and licences will not be transferable. Major steps have been taken, but we shall continue to examine the matter.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Mr. Spencer asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 19 December.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Mr. Spencer: In view of the announcement by the board of Westland Helicopters that it intends to enter into an agreement with Sikorsky-Fiat, will my right hon. Friend confirm that the position of the Government is as set out in the statement of my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry on Monday?

The Prime Minister: Yes, Sir. The future of Westland is a matter for the company to decide. The company's decision is a matter of commercial judgment for its directors and shareholders. That was the position set out by my right hon. and learned Friend, and that was the position reaffirmed by the Cabinet this morning.

Mr. Kinnock: It is something of a change for this matter to go before the Cabinet, or so it appears. Given the patently obvious views stated publicly by the Secretary of State for Defence and the Select Committee on Defence, does the Prime Minister really believe that the subjective preferences of a company are an adequate basis on which to determine important national defence interests?

The Prime Minister: Westland is a private sector public limited company. Its future is a matter for the company to decide, and the company's decision is a matter of commercial judgment for its directors and, ultimately, its shareholders. That is the position, and it was reaffirmed by the Cabinet this morning.

Mr. Kinnock: The Prime Minister said that the company was responsible to its shareholders. Is she not, as Prime Minister, responsible to the nation and for the proper welfare of the nation? Why is she not taking that into proper account, as the Secretary of State for Defence clearly believes she should? When the strategic, considered judgment of the Secretary of State for Defence is contrary to the view of a private company, why is she backing the company, not him?

The Prime Minister: I have informed the House of the position of the Cabinet this morning. The position of the Cabinet is the position of the whole Government.

Mr. Churchill: Has my right hon. Friend heard of a farce that is playing on the South Bank entitled "Robin Ratepayer and his Merry Ratepayers"? Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is entirely appropriate that the leader of the Greater London council should play the star role in this production, for he and the other Marxist city henchmen of the Leader of the Opposition have been robbing ratepayers for years? Will she accept that the ratepayers of the metropolitan counties will be delighted when she rings down the curtain on this over-expensive production next March?

The Prime Minister: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I agree with his broad analysis. I believe that the GLC has taken in far more rates than it needs. There should therefore be a goodly amount to be returned to the district councils when the GLC is extinguished.

Mr. Tony Banks: At least there is still a sense of humour on the South Bank. Does the Prime Minister care that the Christmas present to 6,000 loyal GLC staff this Christmas will be their redundancy notices? In view of the misery and unhappiness that the right hon. Lady is causing to these people and to the 3.5 million people who are on the dole, does she think that she deserves a happy Christmas this year?

The Prime Minister: The decision to abolish the GLC was taken by Parliament. I did not hear the hon. Gentleman mention whether Labour councils will be prepared to take on those extra people. The hon. Gentleman ought to remember that there were two years under a Labour Government when all pensioners received no Christmas bonus.

Sir Fergus Montgomery: During her busy day, will my right hon. Friend find time to consult the relevant Ministers about the disgraceful way in which the chief constable of Greater Manchester is being treated? Is she aware that yesterday the Labour party used its built-in majority on the police committee to censure this man for merely telling the truth? Is this not yet another example of the Fascist Left in this country pillorying decent public servants who refuse to kowtow to them?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend makes his point very cogently. I am sure he will understand that I cannot comment while that investigation is in progress.

Q4. Mr. Madden asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 19 December.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Madden: Will the Prime Minister confirm that the city of Bradford has been earmarked to receive extra resources for urban renewal? Will she also confirm that the key to urban renewal lies in providing more money for new council housing and more money for home improvement grants? Finally, will she confirm that any new money will be given to the local councils concerned and not to a new range of unelected and unaccountable quangos?

The Prime Minister: I do not agree with the hon. Gentleman that the key to urban renewal lies solely with urban housing. The amount of money that has been spent on urban housing and the way in which it has been spent are two of the factors that have led to many of the problems.

Sir John Biggs-Davison: When Ulster is told that it may be rid of the Intergovernmental Conference when it accepts devolution, is legislative devolution and devolved government meant by devolution, or what is meant? Why do a Unionist Government pursue policies that tend to detach Northern Ireland from Great Britain?

The Prime Minister: I cannot accept the latter part of my hon. Friend's question. As he knows, I believe that Union will certainly continue under the Agreement, so long as there is a majority and the majority expresses that wish. Devolved government has to be in accordance with the agreement, which is one that is acceptable to the two traditions in Northern Ireland. As my hon. Friend is aware, there was, in legislation about the Assembly, a possible means of securing much more decision-taking through the Assembly, through the two communities, than is at present the case.

Dr. Owen: In view of the widespread disquiet in the country and in the City about the situation affecting Lloyd's, and in the light of what has happened to its chief executive, how do the Government justify not placing Lloyd's under the new market investing board? Will the Prime Minister consider this issue again and also the need for a full-time chairman of considerable independence and stature to supervise this aspect of the City's behaviour, which many people feel the present legislation is inadequate to cover?

The Prime Minister: I should have thought that the right hon. Gentleman would be aware that Lloyd's had its own regulatory system and Act of Parliament, the Lloyd's Act 1982. It is too early to pass judgment on the effectiveness of the new regime. We believe that events at Lloyd's to which publicity had been given originated before the Act was passed, but we are keeping a close watch on events there and if it becomes necessary to take action or to legislate we shall not hesitate to do so.

Sir Peter Hordern (Horsham): Will my right hon. Friend make it clear to the chairman of ICI and others who are calling for a lower exchange rate that if industry insists on raising wages so that its products become uncompetitive, the Government will not bail them out by reducing the exchange rate?

The Prime Minister: Yes, I shall make that very clear. That way does not lie increased and improved competitiveness. The only way is to have efficiency in the company, in costs, in design and in quality. No company should look to the exchange rate to secure competitiveness which it cannot itself produce.

Q5. Mr. Dobson asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 19 December.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Dobson: The Prime Minister told the House on Tuesday that there had to be losers in the social security review. Will she now say how many there will be, who they will be and how much they will lose?

The Prime Minister: If we were to bring in what the Labour party has plans for—[Interruption.]—the burden on the working population would be colossal. We reckon that national insurance contributions for people on average earnings would rise by £9 a week, so that about 20 million people would lose under Labour's plans.

Q6. Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 19 December.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Taylor: If the Sikorsky deal goes through, as I hope it does, will the Prime Minister ensure that there will be no question of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence discriminating against the Westland company or any of its excellent products?

Will she convey to my right hon. Friend the Secretaryof State for the Environment the thanks of Southend borough council for the most favourable rate support grant settlement — [Interruption.] — which its efficiency deserves?

The Prime Minister: In respect of both parts of my hon. Friend's supplementary question I indicated the Cabinet's decision this morning, and I wish to make it clear that major procurement decisions are a matter for the collective decision of the Government as a whole. I thank my hon. Friend for what he said about the rate support grant. Any authority that spends efficiently and keeps its budget in line with assessed need gets its full grant, and its ratepayers may be very grateful.

Q7. Mr. Gould asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 19 December.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Gould: Will the Prime Minister now answer the question that was put by my hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson)? How many losers will there be under the social security review, who will they be and how much will they lose?

The Prime Minister: This Government have protected those most in need—[HON. MEMBERS: "Answer."]—and have increased, over and above prices, the retirement pension, supplementary benefit rates and benefits for the sick and the disabled—[Interruption.] They have all risen by considerably more than prices. The social security review must be taken as a whole. It is fair both to beneficiaries and the working population. As I said earlier, under arrangements that have been proposed by the Opposition, about 20 million of the working population would stand to lose through national insurance contribution increases.

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: Does my right hon. Friend agree that whatever decision may ultimately be taken by the shareholders of Westland, it has at least flushed out the Labour party Front Bench into appearing to support the defence of this country?

The Prime Minister: The Labour party is supporting NATO and the defence of Britain. That is worth while, and a change of policy for some.

Mr. John Morris: In view of the recent track record of the Department of Health and Social Security and the Department of Transport in the courts, will the Prime Minister say whether the Attorney-General's Department was consulted? To save taxpayers' money in future, will she co-ordinate the activities of the legal officers of those Departments and the Attorney-General's office?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. and learned Gentleman is correct. Yes, the Government have been before the courts and have abided by the decisions of the courts. That is what the rule of law is all about.

Mr. Kinnock: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I wish to raise this matter while the Prime Minister is still present. During Prime Minister's Question Time we heard that the Cabinet had taken a decision regarding Westlands. Since this is a vital matter, may we have a further statement from the Government? Can the Prime Minister tell us whether such a statement will be made by the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, or by the Secretary of State for Defence?

Mr. Speaker: I cannot answer that.

Mr. Dykes: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. My point arises directly from Question Time, when you called hon. Members for agriculture questions, shortly before the change of subject. The old custom was that you would be notified if hon. Members were not to be present. I know that it is just before Christmas, but, in one go, an unprecedented list of 10 hon. Members were not present. Do you have any observations on that?

Mr. Speaker: Only that that is the present custom also.

Mr. Madden: On a point of order Mr. Speaker. You will have heard, with the rest of us, the Prime Minister's dismissive view of the importance of housing. Does that attitude explain why the Secretary of State is today issuing by written answer the details of the housing investment programme rather than coming to the Dispatch Box to make a statement?

Mr. Speaker: That is a continuation of Question Time. It is not a matter for me.

Cervical Cancer (Screening)

3.32 pm

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras) (by private notice) asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the current state of the cervical cancer screening programme.

The Minister for Health (Mr. Barney Hayhoe): The Government's plans for further improvements to health authority arrangements for cervical cancer screening were announced by my right hon. and learned Friend the then Minister of Health on 29 April 1985. As I told the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson), health authorities are being asked to give priority to improving their cervical cancer screening programme. I expect arrangements to be made with family practitioner committees to implement computerised call and recall systems with the necessary laboratory service to meet the related demand and to avoid backlog. We are consulting the medical profession on better follow-up arrangements. Those measures should help to increase the number of women at risk who are screened, to provide for the processing of cervical smears taken from them and the necessary follow up.

The number of deaths from cervical cancer has fallen by about 13 per cent. during the past decade. Provisional 1984 figures suggest a further 3 per cent. fall. More can be achieved and to do that we need more women, especially those who have never been screened, to join the programme. The most effective way to achieve that is by personal invitations from women's general practitioners. Computerised systems will aid the identification of the women who are due for screening. That is the right way forward.

Mr. Dobson: Does the Minister expect anyone to be satisfied with that statement? Does he recall that on 18 March the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke), the former Minister for Health, told the House that the Government were soon to issue a questionnaire asking all health authorities for full details of local screening services. Yesterday, nine months and 1,500 deaths later, the Minister could not tell me when the survey was sent out, when the replies were received or whether it would be published. I ask him those questions again today.

Perhaps I should ask whether the questionnaire has been sent out at all. In the statement on 29 April to which the Minister has referred, the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe told the House that the Government intended to improve the effectiveness of laboratory facilities for processing cervical smears and would be discussing with health authorities how best to achieve that.

On 9 December, the Minister said that he could not list the authorities which had asked clinics or doctors to suspend taking smears because of backlogs in laboratories. On 11 December he said that he did not know the average time taken to process a smear through a laboratory. Also on 11 December, rather astonishingly, the Minister told me that he would not expect health authorities to express concern to him about delays in processing cervical smears. I wondered what had happened to the discussions announced with much publicity in April. Yesterday, the Minister told me that no specific discussions on that issue are now proposed.

The statements made in March and April were intended to convince people, in particular women, that something was being done to improve on the earlier shambles. Last night's "Newsnight Special" and the recent parliamentary answers show that nothing much is happening. So in addition to the specific questions that I have already asked I now demand the answer to the fundamental question: when will the Government commit themselves to finding the resources to introduce and operate computerised call and recall schemes to cover every woman at risk in Britain as recommended to them by their expert advisers in 1981? Nothing less than that will satisfy the women of Britain.

Mr. Hayhoe: As I have explained, district health authorities are being asked to give priority to those programmes. More computerised call and recall systems are coming on stream the whole time. At the moment, 50 per cent. of the family practitioner committees have the computer capability to operate the call and recall system. As I have said, district health authorities are under instruction from the centre to give priority to that work.

I made it clear yesterday that the questionnaire to which the hon. Gentleman referred was a checklist which was intended to enable health authorities to review their cervical screening programmes and that was issued on 29 April. We asked to have results back by 14 June. As I explained to the hon. Gentleman, the results and answers have come back and the information that was received was not designed for summary and publication but to help the centre in its work in that area.

The health authorities are being asked to give, and are giving, priority to providing the appropriate back-up so as to remove the backlog that regrettably exists in some areas and also to improve facilities for the future.

Mr. Robert McCrindle (Brentwood and Ongar): Is it not a fact that the only effective method of tracing women in high risk categories is through the computerised systems operated by district health authorities? If that is so, does my right hon. Friend not share with me some concern that the rate of progress between one district health authority and another shows a considerable variation? Does he have any plans to intervene to try to expedite the progress among those health authorities who seem to have slipped far behind in their programme? Is he satisfied that the financing of the computerised systems and the financial division between his Department and district health authorities is satisfactory and leads most efficiently to the operation of the system to which I suspect most hon. Members would wish to subscribe?

Mr. Hayhoe: On the matter of finance, my hon. Friend will know that the health authorities have, on average, 6·7 per cent. more cash plus the resources made available by cost improvement programmes. That is £650 million extra cash, plus a considerable sum, certainly exceeding £150 million a year, of cost improvement. Out of those extra resources cervical cancer screening is one of the priority claims.

I share the concern expressed by my hon. Friend about the difference in the provision of service for one part of the country and another. I assure him that is one of the matters dealt with in the reviews that my colleagues and I carry out. On the matter of health authorities, I believe that we shall be making considerable progress in implementing the call and recall system which, I agree with my hon. Friend, is the best way to deal with the problem. Regular screening every five years is highly desirable. Personal invitation from the women's general practitioner is much more likely to be effective than a national advertising campaign, which I know is advocated in other areas.

Mrs. Renée Short (Wolverhampton, North-East): I am sure that the Minister will appreciate that, if the necessary cervical cancer screening programme is intensified, it will inevitably produce more patients who need treatment by radiology, radiotherapy or surgery. How does the Minister expect those additional patients to be treated when hospital resources are being reduced all over the country and most of the London teaching hospitals, which are in the front line of research in this area, are having to close their beds? Will he look at that issue and find out what resources the London teaching hospitals need?

Mr. Hayhoe: I accept the hon. Lady's comment about the increase of patients coming forward for treatment if the coverage of the screening programme becomes more widespread and effective. I hope that it will lead to more patients coming forward for early treatment which requires fewer resources than if the condition is not found early enough by the screening programme that we are now trying to encourage women to use more extensively.

I repudiate the hon. Lady's suggestion that resources are being cut. Under this Government, the resources made available for the Health Service have increased in real terms by 20 per cent. There is no way in which that can be described as a cut.

Mr. Peter Viggers (Gosport): Does my right hon. Friend agree that, contrary to the statement made by the hon. Lady, the pressure on the National Health Service is not caused by cuts in Government programmes but by the advances in medical science that make so much more possible for the population? Within that growing demand, does he recognise the need in the allied field of screening for breast cancer in women where there is an increasing awareness of the risk that women run and a need for the availability of screening that can save so many lives?

Mr. Hayhoe: I agree with my hon. Friend's remark about the pressures on the Health Service. As we all know, the demand for health care is practically unlimited, yet the resources that can be made available to it must, of their nature, be limited. We are seeking to have an increase in real terms in resources going to the Health Service and an increasing cost improvement programme so that more resources are available for patient care. The statistics show that that is being fulfilled as we compare one year with another. I agree with my hon. Friend about the need for screening and preventive action across the whole spectrum of medicine.

Mr. David Alton (Liverpool, Mossley Hill): In view of what the Minister has said about resources, will he tell the House how much it costs per person to carry out a cervical screening test? Will he also tell the House whether he has read the recent criticisms of the accuracy of the test so that he can give an assurance about how accurate it really is?

Mr. Hayhoe: I do not know the precise cost of the test, but I shall write to the hon. Gentleman. I know that it is relatively small. It is not the cost of the test that is at issue. We are seeking to persuade the women concerned, particularly the priority group, the over-35s, to come forward to have the test. As I said, by far the best way to do that is for the invitation to come from the GP. That is why the computerised system of call and recall operated by the family practitioner committees is the best and most effective way of achieving that result.

Mrs. Ann Clwyd (Cynon Valley): The Minister plainly has greater faith in the efficiency of GPs' surgeries than the rest of us have. Can he say in which Welsh area health authority areas backlogs exist?

I note that the Secretary of State for Wales is not here this afternoon. As the Minister will be aware, the Health Service in Wales is less democratic than it is in England or Scotland because there are no regional health authorities to plan overall health services. Can he give us detailed answers of where in Wales the backlog exists? Will he support the well woman clinics and give the necessary resources so that we can have more of them. That would help if he genuinely wants to track down cervical cancer in women.

Mr. Hayhoe: I agree with the hon. Lady that GPs play a crucial role in the call and recall programme for those tests. GPs' co-operation and involvement in those programmes is of the highest importance. I am not competent to reply about the position in Wales, but I shall draw the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales to the point made by the hon. Lady.

Business of the House

3.46 pm

Mr. Neil Kinnock (Islwyn): Will the Leader of the House state the business for the first week after the Christmas Adjournment?

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): Yes, Sir. The business for the first week after the Christmas Adjournment will be as follows:

MONDAY 13 JANUARY—Second Reading of the Public Order Bill.

There will be a debate on a motion on seat belt regulations.

TUESDAY 14 JANUARY — Second Reading of the Financial Services Bill.

There will be a debate on a motion to take note of EC document 7283/85 relating to vehicle gaseous emissions.

WEDNESDAY 15 JANUARY — Opposition Day (Third Allotted day). There will be a debate on an Opposition motion, the subject for debate to be announced.

Motion on the Statutory Sick Pay Up-rating Order.

THURSDAY 16 JANUARY—Until about seven o'clock there will be a debate on a motion to take note of EC documents relating to European fisheries policy. Details of the documents concerned will be given in the Official Report.

There will be a debate on the draft Hong Kong Nationality Order in Council (Cmnd. 9367) on a motion for the Adjournment of the House.

Afterwards, motions on the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1978 (Continuance) (No. 3) Order and the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1978 (Amendment) Order.

FRIDAY 17 JANUARY—Private Members' Bills.

[Debate on Tuesday 14 December
Relevant Documents

(a) 7283/85	Vehicle gaseous emissions

Relevant Report of European Legislation Committee
(a) HC 5-xxx (1984-85) paragraph 6

Debate on Thursday 16 January
Relevant Documents

(b) 9284/85	Fishing controls
(c) 8662/85	Allocation of certain fishing possibilities to Spain
(d) 10047/85	Fish Guide Prices 1986
(e) 10015/84	Reduction of Spanish fishing capacity
(f) Unnumbered	Fisheries: Total Allowable Catches (TACs) and quotas 1986
(g) Unnumbered	Fisheries: amended TACs and quotas 1986
(h) Unnumbered	Fisheries agreement with Norway 1986

Relevant Report of European Legislation Committee
(b) HC 5-xxxi (1984-85) paragraph 2
(c) HC 5-xxx (1984-85) paragraph 12
(d) HC 21-i (1985-86) paragraph 3
(e) HC 5-vii (1984-85) paragraph 1
(f) HC 21-v (1985-86) paragraph 2
(g) HC 21-v (1985-86) paragraph 3
(h) HC 21-v (1985-86) paragraph 4]

Mr. Kinnock: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman. As the Prime Minister did not find herself able to respond to the point of order that I raised earlier——

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Crawley): It was not a point of order.

Mr. Kinnock: You, Mr. Speaker, will be the judge of that. [HON. MEMBERS: "He was."] In view of the decision apparently taken by today's Cabinet, will the right hon. Gentleman arrange for a statement to be made to the House before we rise tomorrow by either the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry or the Secretary of State for Defence, or both, about the Government's current attitude towards the Westland deal and whether the Government are willing to accept the clear obligations of national interest which arise in that case?

On Tuesday, the Prime Minister said that the Roskill report on fraud trials, which contains 117 recommendations, was in the Government's possession. Will it be published in good time for the debate on the Financial Services Bill on 14 January? Why can it not be published now, or at least during the recess? It is clearly in a form which would enable it to be printed and published for the general consideration of hon. Members.

Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the Secretary of State for Scotland has today written to the stewards at Gartcosh, effectively tearing up the Select Committee report and glibly accepting British Steel's rather unconvincing view that the future of Ravenscraig is unaffected by the closure of Gartcosh? Does not the Secretary of State for Scotland owe the House an explanation of the way in which he is abandoning—[AN HON. MEMBER: "Cynically."] — indeed, cynically abandoning — steel workers and steel communities in Scotland? Can the right hon. Gentleman at least arrange for a statement to be made to the House tomorrow, before we rise for the Christmas recess?

In view of the Government's continuing failure to undertake any productive initiative in settling the teachers' pay dispute, will the right hon. Gentleman agree to a debate, in Government time, early in the new Session so that the House can ask the Secretary of State to account for his hapless attitude towards the profession, towards parents and, most of all, towards the pupils who are suffering as a result of the Government's intransigence and their lack of interest in the education system?

Now that the White Paper on the reform of social security has been published, when will legislation to implement those proposals be introduced? Are there any draft proposals to phase out heating additions for claimants, especially the elderly, on supplementary benefit?

Mr. Biffen: I shall respond to the right hon. Gentleman's questions in the sequence in which they were presented.

First, on the right hon. Gentleman's remarks about the Prime Minister confirming the statement made earlier this week on Westland by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, I can confirm that that statement was confirmed at a Cabinet meeting this morning. I do not think that there is anything devastatingly novel about such a revelation, but I shall have the matter considered further through the usual channels to see whether it is to feature in our business before we retire for the Christmas recess. I say in all sincerity to the right hon. Gentleman — [Interruption.] It gets better as we go along. I shall do my utmost to ensure that the House has the advantage of possessing the Roskill report before the Second Reading of the Financial Services Bill. It is a fairly formidable document, but I do not think that it is in quite the advanced stage suggested in the right hon. Gentleman's question. As to the right hon. Gentleman's interpretation of my right hon. Friend's remarks, I think that that covers the full spectrum, but of course I shall look into the matter.

On the question of Gartcosh, I must confess that I was not entirely able to recognise from the right hon. Gentleman's comments the position of and the role being played by my right hon. Friend th Secretary of State for Scotland. However, I know that in this, as in all matters, one should proceed charitably. I shall look into the matter about the Select Committee report and, through the usual channels, consider whether an early statement, is appropriate.

I am sure that we all recognise the very serious position that is developing through the protracted industrial action being undertaken by the teaching profession. Perhaps we could look at the question of a debate through the usual channels.

I assure the right hon. Gentleman that legislation will be introduced setting out the proposals of the White Paper on the social services reasonably soon after we reassemble following the Christmas recess."

Sir Dudley Smith (Warwick and Leamington): My right hon. Friend will be aware that there is considerable interest in the Shops Bill and the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Bill. I appreciate that they are now in their final stages in another place. Will he give some rough indication of when they are likely to arrive here for their Second Reading—sooner or later?

Mr. Biffen: There are some lively competitors for our time and affection in the period from mid-January onwards. I cannot answer my hon. Friend in the specific terms that he desires, but if he presses the matter when we return perhaps I can then give him a more forthcoming reply.

Mr. Alfred Morris (Manchester, Wythenshawe): The Leader of the House knows from last night's debate on the motion for the Christmas Adjournment that there is very deep concern in the north-west about the future control and operation of Manchester international airport. The right hon. Gentleman agreed to communicate urgently to the Secretary of State for Transport the call for an oral statement today about the airport's future. How did the right hon. Gentleman get on? Would it not be grossly contemptuous of the House for the airport's future to be decided without any opportunity for hon. Members to question the Government's decision?

Mr. Biffen: I undertook, as the right hon. Gentleman says, to communicate to my right hon. Friend the sense of the first of the debates on the Adjournment motion. I take note of his remarks about the importance of the House taking a view before the decision is taken. I shall convey that observation to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport.

Mr. Roger Sims (Chislehurst): Has my right hon. Friend noticed the increasing pressure from many reputable organisations and from all quarters of the House for the establishment of family courts? Can my right hon. Friend provide an opportunity to debate the matter early in the new year?

Mr. Biffen: I shall certainly take note of my hon. Friend's observation. I cannot be very forthcoming about guaranteeing such time, although I recognise the importance of the issue.

Mr. Michael Foot (Blaenau Gwent): May I take the right hon. Gentleman back to his first reply on whether there should be a statement tomorrow on Westland? The right hon. Gentleman has great mollifying qualities but he must understand that an intolerable state of affairs exists. Is the Secretary of State for Defence holding a press conference at this moment to repudiate what has been said by a Minister in the House? Will the right hon. Gentleman give us on his own account, and without the wisdom of the usual channels, an absolute assurance that there will be a statement on the matter tomorrow?

Mr. Biffen: The right hon. Gentleman, for so many years of his distinguished career, was part of the usual channels. He knows that there is no wisdom superior to that of the usual channels.

Sir Fergus Montgomery (Altrincham and Sale): I should like to draw my right hon. Friend's attention to early-day motion No. 277, which raises the matter of the chief constable of Greater Manchester.

[That this House views with grave disquiet the outrageous treatment of the Chief Constable of Greater Manchester by the politically-motivated action of the Greater Manchester Police Committee in seeking to censure him for exercising his right of free speech.]

May I impress upon my right hon. Friend that any inquiry into that matter is unlikely to report before Greater Manchester county goes out of existence? Such an inquiry would be a total waste of ratepayers' money and there are some who feel that it would be a cynical way in which to promote the chairman of the Manchester police committee, Mrs. Gabriella Cox, in her search for a safe Labour seat on Manchester city council. In view of the great public concern in the area and the anger that has been aroused by the treatment of the chief constable, can there be an early debate on the matter?

Mr. Biffen: I shall certainly draw the attention of my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary to the arguments advanced by my hon. Friend.

Mr. Jack Ashley (Stoke-on-Trent, South): Will the Leader of the House not agree that it is both deplorable and regrettable that the family of a child that was deafened and brain-damaged in a medical accident should have to spend nine years fighting in a court of law for compensation for that child? In Britain we need a no-fault compensation scheme, as they have in other countries. Can we have a debate on that matter as soon as possible?

Mr. Biffen: I join at once with the right hon. Gentleman in acknowledging the poignancy of the case that he quoted and I shall consider his request. I cannot guarantee that Government time will be available for such a debate in the new year, but doubtless there are other opportunities available to the right hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Fred Silvester (Manchester, Withington): May I urge my right hon. Friend not to let his natural good will and Christmas spirit lead him to pay too much attention to the siren voice of the right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris), as the matter of Manchester airport is now properly in the hands of the districts of Greater Manchester council. It would be most improper to have any statement or debate while decisions are being made.

Mr. Biffen: I had the advantage of listening to the problems as they were rehearsed last night by the right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris). When listening to him, I thought that there was possibly a degree of controversy. The remarks which I have addressed to the right hon. Gentleman must stand.

Mr. James Hamilton (Motherwell, North): The Leader of the House is aware that serious redundancies in the British Steel Corporation in my constituency are imminent, and he will recall that I raised the matter with him last week. Bearing in mind that the right hon. Gentleman has been asked that a statement should be made by the Secretary of State for Scotland on the situation which has arisen over Gartcosh and Ravenscraig, and that the Secretary of State has conveniently washed his hands of responsibility, is it not incumbent on the Secretary of State to make a statement tomorrow against the background of chaos in the Scottish steel industry?

Mr. Biffen: I think that the hon. Gentleman will have heard me say that it is a matter which could be pursued through the usual channels, and by those remarks I stand. The Department of Trade and Industry will be available for questions on Wednesday 15 January and the hon. Gentleman will have a chance to make some of his points then.

Mr. James Hill (Southampton, Test): Is my right hon. Friend aware that, after the signing of the research programme by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence and Caspar Weinberger a short time ago, we are fully committed to involving ourselves in the research programme? Is there not a case to be made for a debate on this subject? Practically every other Parliament in Europe has had a debate on the strategic defence initiative and many of the myths need to be cleared from this subject.

Mr. Biffen: I join my hon. Friend in underlining the significance of the decision on SDI. I cannot offer the prospect of an early debate in Government time after we return, but doubtless my hon. Friend will have other opportunities that he can pursue.

Mr. David Alton (Liverpool, Mossley Hill): The Leader of the House has given an assurance over the past three weeks that he will try to provide time to debate the creation of an Anglo-Irish parliamentary tier. How long will it be before we have a chance to have that debate?

Mr. Biffen: No, I cannot. This is a matter which will require a fairly thoughtful approach. Perhaps some discussions can proceed initially through the usual channels. I shall be in touch with the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. David Sumberg (Bury, South): May I refer my right hon. Friend again to the question of my hon. Friend the Member for Altrincham and Sale (Sir F. Montgomery) about the disgraceful attempt by the Left-wing loonies of Greater Manchester to attack the chief constable of that area? Will my right hon. Friend confirm that the chief constable has a fine record of service to the police force? Is it not appropriate that the House should have an opportunity of debating the matter at a very early date?

Mr. Biffen: I think that the record and integrity of the chief constable is so self-evident that it hardly needs debating in the Chamber.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Does the Leader of the House recall that it was October when the Select Committee on Privileges published its report on the confidentiality of deliberations of Select Committees of the House? Does he not think that it is about time that we had a debate on this issue? Is he not aware of the most recent complaints that have been made concerning the Select Committee on the Environment? Is not a debate required urgently?

Mr. Biffen: I am not sure that there is an urgency which is comparable with the pressures which exist for many other subjects to be debated. As I was the Chairman of the Select Committee which produced the report, I have all the pride of paternity, but that does not mean that I think it has to exclude other items that should be debated. [Interruption.] I think that the right hon. Gentleman was about the only Privy Councillor who was not a member of the Select Committee. Therefore, I think that his remark is wholly appropriate.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): My right hon. Friend will be aware of the concern that is felt in Scotland over the outcome of the inquiry of the Select Committee on Scottish Affairs into the proposed closure of Gartcosh. Is he aware of the final sentence in the Committee's report, which asks the Secretary of State to review the situation in the light of the evidence presented to the Committee? Anyone who cares to study the evidence—there is a substantial amount of it—will realise that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland came up clearly with the correct answer in view of the evidence which the Select Committee accepted.

Mr. Biffen: I am most grateful to have my hon. Friend's interpretation of the findings of the departmental Select Committee. Probably, this last week before Christmas is the only occasion on which he might get away with it. I shall leave it at that.

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): Is the Leader of the House aware of the strength of feeling in Scotland about the threat to the future of its integrated steel industry? Is he aware especially of the massive public support for the resistance of the work force at Gartcosh? Now that even the Select Committee on Scottish Affairs, with its distorted representation, has come out in favour of the retention of Gartcosh, can we have an assurance that there will be a statement from the Secretary of State for Scotland?

Mr. Biffen: Obviously, the hon. Gentleman is anxious to place upon the record a rather different interpretation of the Select Committee's report from that of my hon. Friend the Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker). I take account of the serious nature of the problem for the Scottish economy and the deep feelings that are engaged by it. I have said that the matter could be considered through the usual channels, and I think that I must stand by that.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): Will my right hon. Friend consider giving the House an opportunity to debate prisons and prison buildings? Is he aware that there are 46,900 people in prison and that, although there is some overcrowding, the Government, through the Home Office, have come up with the idea of super-prisons whereby Milton Keynes and Doncaster prisoners will be given the opportunity to have their own individual separate rooms with en suite bathrooms? Does he agree with me that prisons should deter and that they should not be regarded as luxury holiday homes?

Mr. Biffen: I suspect that my hon. Friend, like myself, had the advantage of listening to the "Today" programme. I think that that programme brought home the fact that the issue which he has raised is highly topical. I must confess that I can hold out no immediate prospect of a debate upon it in Government time. I recommend that my hon. Friend seeks to pursue the matter through the various other opportunities that are available to a Back-Bench Member.

Mr. Roland Boyes (Houghton and Washington): Has the Leader of the House had an opportunity to note early-day motion 262, which I and a number of my hon. Friends bring to the attention of the House?

[That this House regrets that the United States of America now has congressional authority to develop new chemical weapons in 1987; notes that this approval is dependent upon the agreement of North Atlantic Treaty Organisation allies; calls upon the Secretary of State for Defence to withhold his agreement and demands that he encourages his counterparts in other North Atlantic Treaty Organisation countries to do likewise.]

The motion brings to the attention of the House that the President of the United States of America has Congressional authority to develop a new range of chemical weapons commencing in 1987. This is dependent upon the support of the NATO allies. Will the right hon. Gentleman make time available to debate this important issue in view of the widespread public abhorrence of these obscene weapons?

Mr. Biffen: I shall, of course, draw the attention of my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs to the point that the hon. Gentleman makes, which I know is one of considerable general interest.

Mr. Spencer Batiste (Elmet): Is my right hon. Friend aware that the attacks on the chief constable of Manchester are but symptomatic of attacks elsewhere by Left-wing authorities which are seeking to undermine the independence of the police and public confidence in them? Will he take an opportunity at an early stage for the House to assert its full support for the police and their operational independence in future?

Mr. Biffen: I acknowledge what my hon. Friend has said and share his deep regard for the work and integrity of our police forces. I do not think that I can add to the answers which I have already given on this subject.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Did the Leader of the House notice that, when he read out the business for the week when we return after Christmas, no members of the Social Democratic party were present? Bearing in mind the difficulties of the Christmas post and the sending of the Whip to SDP members, would it not be a good idea if the right hon. Gentleman made a special effort to ensure that they know of the business that will be before the House when we return?

Will the right hon. Gentleman ensure also that the hon. Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Wrigglesworth), who has recently taken on a paid parliamentary consultancy with Barclays Bank—the bank operates in South Africa, which Social Democrats regard as a repugnant regime—is made aware that the House will be debating the Second Reading of the Financial Services Bill on Tuesday 14 January, and that he can come and explain what he is doing? When the leader of the Liberal party, the right hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Mr. Steel), was talking about Members taking other jobs and moonlighting, his mate in the SDP, the hon. Member for Stockton, South, was picking up several thousand pounds for a moonlighting job for Barclays. We would like to hear explanations from the right hon. Gentleman and the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Biffen: The hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) is in grave danger of becoming a matinée idol. He has made some shrewd and constructive observations about the gap between the smug rhetoric of the leaders of the Liberal party and the Social Democratic party and the rather lacklustre performance in the Division during the debate on Members' interests. I understand that many of my hon. Friends do not know whether those right hon. Gentlemen were in the television studios or on the ballroom floor, but, in either place, that is no way to lead a great political campaign.

Mr. Bruce Millan (Glasgow, Govan): Returning to the question of Gartcosh, has the Leader of the House seen the letter that the Secretary of State for Scotland wrote to the convener of the shop stewards, which was written on the same day as the Select Committee on Scottish Affairs reported and which repudiated that report? Since when have Select Committee reports been dealt with in that way by the Government? Is this not a disgraceful way in which to behave?

Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the Secretary of State for Scotland has said over recent months that, if he were presented with evidence, he would carefully consider it? Was not the behaviour of the Secretary of State yesterday a demonstration that that was a complete sham? The right hon. Gentleman has not considered the evidence. He has gone against the overwhelming evidence to the Select Committee which was brought out in its endorsement of the evidence in its recommendations. It is no good the Leader of the House saying that we can wait until 15 January to ask questions of the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. Decisions may have been taken by that time. Will the Leader of the House give an absolute assurance that we shall have a statement and a debate before the Government take any final decision on Gartcosh? There is overwhelming support in Scotland for the retention of Gartcosh. We want it to be retained. We do not want anything to happen by default through Government decisions taken while the House is in recess.

Mr. Biffen: In my experience, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland is a courteous and most fair-minded man. I cannot conceive that he fits the description that is sought to be applied to him. This matter can be pursued through the usual channels.

Mr. George Robertson (Hamilton): Will the right hon. Gentleman reflect on the Prime Minister's words during Prime Minister's questions this afternoon when she said that the three years between the passing of the Lloyd's Bill and the scandals of today were not long enough to judge the effectiveness of that legislation? Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that this contrasts with the fact that yesterday at 3.30 pm the all-party Select Committee on Scottish Affairs concluded that there was a link between the future of Gartcosh and Ravenscraig; yet, on the same day, the Secretary of State for Scotland chose to pre-empt the evidence and the Select Committee's conclusions by rejecting them in advance?

Does the right hon. Gentleman recognise that this will be seen in Scotland as a betrayal of everything that the Secretary of State has said about considering all the evidence on its merits? Will he ensure that the British Steel Corporation makes no irreversible decision before the House has had a chance to debate the conclusions of a very fair-minded report from the Select Committee?

Mr. Biffen: The observations of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister on the Lloyd's legislation were grounded in monumental common sense. I note what the hon. Gentleman has said about the Gartcosh closure and the Select Committee's report. I can only repeat what I have said in respect of the matter being considered through the usual channels.

Mr. Greville Janner (Leicester, West): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware of the return to the United Kingdom of Mr. Bob Astles, who was the right-hand man of that odious murderer Idi Amin? He has been allowed — apparently without much question — to return to this country. Is it correct that he has applied for renewal of his British citizenship? If so, will the right hon. Gentleman assure the House that that will not be granted without the House having the opportunity to debate the request? Many hon. Members on both sides of the House would regard Mr. Astles as a most unwelcome member of our citizenry.

Mr. Biffen: There is little that I can say in my capacity as Leader of the House about Mr. Bob Astles. I note the hon. and learned Gentleman's observations and will ensure that his remarks are put to my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary.

Mr. Barry Henderson (Fife, North-East): Is my right hon. Friend aware that the otherwise excellent report by the Select Committee on Scottish Affairs was marred by its concluding paragraph, which did not flow from an objective view of the evidence? Will my right hon. Friend make arrangements whereby hon. Members may be encouraged to read not only the report but the evidence to the Committee? If that were done, we would not hear the kind of remarks made by the right hon. Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Millan) and the hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson).

Mr. Biffen: I well understand my hon. Friend's point. It puts many of the Opposition's remarks into context. Clearly, this is a matter of great concern in Scotland. It is a matter of controversy. It can be considered through the usual channels.

Mr. Tom Clarke (Monklands, West): May I thank the Leader of the House for the kind words he uttered——

Mr. Campbell-Savours: The hon. Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Henderson) has breached privilege.

Mr. Henderson: No—it has been published.

Mr. Clarke: I do not often get the chance to speak, and I would be grateful if my hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) would be quiet.

I thank the Leader of the House for the kind words he uttered to my constituents last week. Notwithstanding that, they are still confused. They cannot understand why a Select Committee could present, with an overwhelming majority, a recommendation to the House and why that recommendation has not been debated. In spite of that, the Secretary of State for Scotland has issued a letter. Is it not normal practice for a Select Committee to receive a formal response from the Secretary of State? Does that letter not therefore pre-empt the rights of the House? Is this not a serious matter?

Mr. Biffen: In no sense does it pre-empt the rights of the House. I must ask the hon. Gentleman to observe just what are the relationships between Select Committees and the Executive. The matter can of course be considered through the usual channels. I made that remark very early on in response to the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): Will the right hon. Gentleman turn up the Daily Telegraph of 3 December in which he can find an article written by Blake Baker headlined which is stacked with information compiled by the immigration service management and members of the private office of the Minister of State, Home Office? Will the right hon. Gentleman note that I have tabled a question to the Home Secretary asking him to refer that article to the Director of Public Prosecutions with a view to ascertaining whether it breaches the Official Secrets Act?

"MPs ready to greet dubious immigrants"

Will the right hon. Gentleman note that it is now six weeks since the Minister of State, Home Office, made serious allegations against a number of hon. Members with regard to representations to the Home Office? Will he note also that the Home Secretary is now talking about preparing a code of practice for Members making such representations? Is it not high time that we had an opportunity for a debate so that this important matter could be discussed by all hon. Members of all parties who are concerned about the issue behind these serious allegations?

Mr. Biffen: I note that a question to my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary has been tabled, and doubtless the hon. Gentleman will receive the answer in due course. It would be improper for me to try to anticipate that answer. I have noted what the hon. Gentleman has said. I cannot hold out the hope of an early debate, but the hon. Gentleman will have seen that a written answer was tabled on this topic earlier this week.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): As the Secretary of State for Defence has contradicted everything that was said on Monday about Westland by the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, and as the Secretary of State for Defence has argued his case publicly at every opportunity, including yesterday to the Select Committee on Defence, will the Leader of the House recognise the importance of a further statement on Westland being made before we break for the recess? As the only opportunity is tomorrow, will the right hon. Gentleman give serious consideration to the requests by hon. Members, including myself, for such a statement to be made?

Mr. Biffen: The hon. Gentleman portrays a total caricature of the remarks made by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence on this matter and the collective statement on behalf of the Government by my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and by the Prime Minister. But, of course, he will have noted how I responded to the Leader of the Opposition, and he would not expect me to respond in a more forthcoming manner to him than I would to his leader.

Fisheries Council

4.20 pm

The Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. John Selwyn Gummer): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement about the Fisheries Council which I attended with my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and my right hon. Friend the Minister of State, Scottish Office, on 16 and 17 December.

I have already given the House my right hon. Friend's apologies for his absence. He is attending a Council meeting in Brussels.

I am delighted to be able to report that, for the second year in succession, the Council was able to reach political agreement before the start of the year on a package of total allowable catches and quotas for the Ten in 1986. This was subject only to a waiting reserve by Ireland. As last year, we agreed to the package on a temporary basis pending a debate in this House, which I hope can be arranged shortly after the Christmas recess.

The agreement covers all the stocks for which TACs and quotas are currently set and we were able to achieve a package which is highly satisfactory for the United Kingdom. The TACs had to be based for the joint stocks on the agreement which the European Commission had reached with Norway and I was critical of some aspects of that agreement, notably on herring. But in general, the package of TACs, quotas and third country arrangements which we negotiated offers a particularly attractive range of fishing opportunities for United Kingdom fishermen. On North sea whitefish stocks, the package contains significant increases in our haddock and saithe quotas and improvements in the quotas originally proposed for cod, plaice and sole. We successfully resisted Danish pressure for continuation of the special allocation of cod to Denmark outside the TAC. On North sea pelagic species, we obtained from the agreed proposals and some further bilateral exchanges an increase of nearly one third in our herring quotas in the important northern and central North sea areas and a very useful increased mackerel quota in the North sea.

In the case of the western pelagic stocks, the original quotas for mackerel and herring were increased, but in the outcome were still, as they should be in view of the scientific advice, below last year's levels. Sole and plaice stocks are of particular importance in the south-west. I am glad to say that, as a result of the package negotiated and the associated quota exchanges, we were able to secure increases of about one third in the availability of sole in area VII and about 10 per cent. for plaice. We also obtained an immediate increase in our current quota for plaice in the Bristol channel which will allow the fishery to be reopened for the rest of the year.

This adds up to a very satisfactory settlement indeed, but it was all overshadowed by the danger of the Commission proposal for an increase in the Norway pout by-catch derogation which could have done immense damage to our industry and to conservation. We have fought against this for the past six months and I am relieved and delighted to report that this proposal was excluded from the package and the Commission has now withdrawn it.

Lastly, the Council also agreed a series of improvements to the regulation on the control of fishing activities which should provide for better enforcement of logbooks and landing declarations as well as better control of transhipments to receiving vessels. This is further evidence of the importance which all Fisheries Ministers are now attaching to more effective control of the fisheries.

[Mr. John Selwyn Gummer]

I hope that the House will have an opportunity to debate this settlement very shortly after the Christmas recess. I have no hesitation in commending this package to the House.

Mr. Stuart Randall (Kingston upon Hull, West): May I first thank the Minister for coming to the House and giving his statement on the Fisheries Council. We on the Opposition Benches are pleased that an agreement on TACs and on quotas has been reached at the beginning of the year. We also accept the notion to which the Minister referred in his statement, that determination of the size of quotas and TACs should be based on scientific advice. We accept, therefore, that from time to time restrictions for genuine conservation purposes are necessary.

Is the Minister not aware that many British people, especially those who work in the fishing industry, regard the way in which other EEC countries have over-fished certain stocks as grotesque and totally unacceptable to British fishermen? Will the Minister give some assurances that these unfair practices will be discontinued? We believe it is vital to discuss new quotas, especially limitations, in combination with measures on protection, inspection and enforcement.

I believe that the Minister's statement was inadequate as far as protection and enforcement is concerned. I invite the Minister to attempt to convince the House that we shall not continue the same old routine of the other EEC countries ripping off our fishing industry while the Government are unable to deliver any satisfactory solution. Is he aware that many people in the industry believe that the Community and the British Government have failed to keep their policy on enforcement intact? The Opposition are disappointed that the Minister has been unable to say anything substantial on the matter at this important time of announcing the 1986 quotas.

Will the Minister tell the House specifically whether the illegal over-fishing by the Dutch has been stamped out? Will he give the House and the British fishing industry a categoric assurance that this illegal over-fishing has been stopped? If it has not been stopped, will the Minister tell the House exactly what he intends to do about it?

Will the Minister also tell us how we can be sure that British fishermen will not lose out to other EEC fishermen in 1986 when it can be argued that member states do not have the political will to carry out in full their responsibilities for applying and enforcing Community law? Is it not time that the Government did more to protect the British fishing industry?

The Minister will be aware, I am sure, that certain parts of the industry that operate in the North sea fishery catch appreciably less haddock and are much more reliant on the cod quota. Does he not realise that these new cod quotas will produce considerable hardship for fishermen in these areas? What does the Minister have to say to the people in these areas because it is a matter of great concern?

Will the Minister accept that much tougher protection, enforcement and inspection procedures are vital if the Community conservation policy is to remain intact? Does he not agree that the accession of Spain and Portugal will increase pressures on our existing enforcement resources? Will he further accept that this is not the time to reduce the function of our fisheries protection service by phasing out the Nimrods? Would it not have been preferable to establish better enforcement before taking this step? What steps is the Minister taking to compensate British industry for the cuts in some quotas by taking advantage on a Community basis of the agreements that Spain and Portugal already have with other countries outside the EEC? What scope is there for providing new fishing opportunities for British fishermen in this way?

Finally, is the Minister aware that the British fishing industry is very angry at the way in which the EEC Commission has agreed to give Norway, which is not a member of the EEC, 40 per cent. of the North sea herring stocks? Does he not agree that this is very unfair, especially at a time when British fishermen are having to cope with cuts in certain quotas? Can this not be thought of as a sell-out to Norway?

Mr. Gummer: It was a little less than generous of the hon. Gentleman to pose so many questions without starting off by admitting that this is a remarkably good result in the negotiations for the United Kingdom. I was also surprised that he did not say that we actually won the battle over Norway pout, something the Opposition always believed we could not do and would not stand by. He went on to complain about protection when, indeed, I said in the statement that at yet another meeting the Council has moved forward on the protection and control arrangements of the common fisheries policy.

The British Government have got the Inspectorate of Inspectors, have extended that inspectorate so that it will have 21 soon and have pressed upon other nations the need for control. We can look with satisfaction at the way in which, for example, the Dutch Government have so tightened up their policies that the Dutch fishermen are busy chasing their Government to complain about the strictness of the new regulations. The story of Britain's campaign for a better system of control in the European Community fisheries policies is a remarkably good story for the Government and one on which the hon. Gentleman should congratulate us.

It is not fair to suggest that we have not been concerned about enforcement. I can give the House the news, which will interest the hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Penhaligon), that from 1 January, in the south-western approaches, there will be two fishery protection vessels and some extra Nimrod runs, increasing direct control of our protection. We have computerised the new monthly list of the Spanish boats that come to the area and we shall be able to check automatically and rapidly on any boat that comes in.

We now have a common arrangement with the Irish and French Governments to see that the protection arrangement is enforced together, so that we can give each other information about the movements of Spanish boats within the area. I am sure that that will help the House if it has any concern about the control of this part of the common fisheries policy.

As to the accession of Spain and Portugal, there will be further discussions of the arrangement for the fishing policy for the Twelve. One of the issues that will be discussed will be the results of the special arrangements that come about because of previous agreements between Spain and such countries as Mauritania and Morocco. Those are very much in the hands of the Commission, which is looking at how best such arrangements can be applied.

No one can be more concerned about enforcement than we. I mentioned the measures that the British Government have taken and the strong measures taken by the Danish Government. A number of other Governments have taken measures to ensure that their fishermen abide by the common fisheries policy. If they do not, we shall continue the policy of pressing hard to make the policy work, a course of action that has been successful up to now.

Mr. Barry Henderson (Fife, North-East): Is my right hon. Friend aware that of the many things that are helpful to fishermen in the statement, the one that Scottish fishermen will most particularly welcome is that concerning the pout box, which is helpful to many Scottish fishermen in the North sea? What can my right hon. Friend do to stiffen the back of the European Community in its negotiations with Norway, which are of great importance to fishermen on the east coast of Scotland? There is a growing feeling that, although we are getting satisfactory arrangements within the EC on fishing matters, there is some weakness in the Community in facing up to getting satisfactory arrangements with the Norwegians, although there is a wide basis on which there could be a more satisfactory agreement with Norway.

Mr. Gummer: I am sure that my hon. Friend puts the case properly when he suggests that the agreement with Norway is not as good as it could or should have been. It is easy to criticise negotiations that are not carried out by ourselves, but the agreement should have been better. We have managed, within the Community agreement and the swaps that we have arranged, to ensure that our fishermen have a proper amount of herring to go after. However, there is no doubt that they feel hard done by because the Norwegians appear to have had a better deal than was necessary, and we believe that the deal should not have been carried out in the way that it was. We have made this position clear and have been joined in that by other countries. I assure my hon. Friend that I shall do everything that I can to make sure that in future negotiations those points are borne strongly in mind.

Mr. David Penhaligon (Truro): In the past 10 or 11 years I have listened to various Ministers of various Governments use various descriptions, all of which included something along the lines of, "the importance that all fishery Ministers are now attaching to more effective control of fisheries". However, throughout that time, with the single exception of herring, the position on most types of fish has become worse.

Although on first examination this statement seems a little more acceptable, does the Minister agree that, if factory boats from Russia, Bulgaria and Egypt are still allowed to go to the east coast of Scotland, as they were allowed to go the coast of Cornwall, the mackerel of Scotland will be as rare as it is in my part of the world, and the stock will inevitable be annihilated? Is not the answer in the long term European negotiations to the effect that the people who rely on the fishing from their own ports are made primarily responsible for the conservation measures of their area? Does he agree that the pressure from those who wish to maintain a long-term income for their community and family is the pressure most likely to solve this problem?

Mr. Gummer: There have been major improvements in the control service in the past couple of years, and the hon. Gentleman will agree that there have been encouraging actions from a number of Governments, so much so that a number of Governments are under considerable pressure from fishing fleets because of the toughness of the action that they have taken. We are pleased about that because it shows that they are acting as we intend them to act and as they are now bound to act because of the inspectorate and the way in which the system works.

In Holland, Denmark and other countries there has been a major improvement. During this negotiation, we have added to what we did last time and the time before and insisted on further ways to ensure that the Community imposes its will, particularly in conservation. We have been tough in supporting conservation measures and as a result have ensured the removal, for example, of the Commission's proposal of the Norway pout bycatch, entirely because of the conservation reason that we put forward. It meant that, although we started off isolated as the only country that did not want an extension of the derogation, we ended up by having the support of a large number of other countries which saw our conservation case. This is one sector of the European Community in which there have been significant advances in the way in which the Community can operate successfully.

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): The right hon. Gentleman is full of praise for his Department's cleverness, but he omitted to mention the disastrous fact that the allocation of North sea cod is 17 per cent. down on our catch this year and 30 per cent. down on our quota this year. This has serious, if not disastrous, consequences for Grimsby, which is a cod port whose vessels are overwhelmingly suited for catching cod. If the reduction is inevitable, what proposals does the Minister have for the Grimsby fishermen who are struggling, are not making a return adequate to provide new investment and will face horrendous financial difficulties if the catches go down? The Department allocated £16·9 million compensation for hill farmers for the sopping summer that we had earlier this year, but what compensation will be given to fishermen for the reduction in the cod quota?

What attempt did the Minister make to get Britain a bigger allowance within the total allowable catch if that is to be reduced? We provide most of the fishing area. What proposals has the Minister, if there is to be this reduction, for conservation measures that will rebuild the cod stocks in the North sea? Does he have proposals for closure for spawning, or for the increased mesh sizes, or for increased landing sizes to safeguard the stock and allow it to be built up to a safe level again?

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Gentleman would do his constituents more good if he started by saying that the future of the cod fishing industry depends on the protection of the stock and that the reduction of Britain's quota is to give the fishermen of Grimsby a future for themselves and their children. If he were to support what the Government have done, and the fact that they have gained from the arrangement a fairly creditable amount of the available stock, that would be better. We have all had to take a cut because it is necessary to protect the hon. Gentleman's constituents. It would do the hon. Gentleman and his constituents more good to fight for an understanding by fishermen of the need for conservation and thus for smaller quotas this year. [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) spent much time asking the question and I shall answer. If he is not satisfied, he will ask me about the matter again. If we are to help his constituents, we must protect the cod for the future, and that means a low quota this year.

[Mr. Gummer]

I know that this causes great difficulty in Grimsby and the other cod fishing ports. We have managed to find alternative fish in the share-out, especially haddock. I know that this is not what the fishermen of Grimsby would wish. In the circumstances, however, it is the best deal that we can get and still protect the cod for the future. I am sure that, in those terms, the hon. Gentleman's constituents, if not the hon. Gentleman, will support what we are trying to do.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): May I point out to the Minister that the presence of Russian and other east European factory fishing vessels in Scottish waters, as mentioned by the hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Penhaligon), is welcomed by the Scottish fishing industry? Those vessels do not fish but rather buy the fish caught by Scottish fishing vessels. I am glad that the hon. Member for Truro now agrees with that. Several Opposition Members have actively supported the need to reduce the bycatch in industrial fishing. I have argued and will continue to argue that industrial fishing must be severely reduced in the North sea and elsewhere.

The deregulation news is good news. I am not sure that the expansion of the inspectorate to 21 members is good enough, considering the expansion of the fishing effort by EEC vessels with the accession of Spain.

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Gentleman is right in his assessment of what is happening in Scottish waters. I agree that he has a distinguished record in pushing for the reduction in the bycatch and for giving credit where it is due.

We are talking about the Inspectorate of Inspectors. One does not need a vast army of inspectors. One needs enough to ensure that the national inspectorates work, and, in Britain as in other countries, ensure that foreign nations fish properly within our traditional waters. I do not think that sheer numbers are the problem. We have had a major increase, and we shall have to see how that works.

As to the accession of Spain and Portugal, of their 300 ships, only 150 will be allowed to fish at any one time in the waters with which we are most concerned. The hon. Gentleman will see that that is not a substantial expansion of Spanish efforts—it is an expansion of the methods of control of that effort. The Spanish will have to work within the regime of the Community. Spain will have to give a monthly list of ships to the United Kingdom beforehand, as well as to France and Ireland. We will have notification of every ship as it reaches the point where it will start fishing. We will be able to keep close control and the vessels will have to adhere to all the logbook arrangements, which are increasingly tough in the Community. The hon. Gentleman should be able to tell his fishing constituents that we can control the Spanish to an extent which has never been possible before.

Gartcosh

4.43 pm

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. My point of order arises from the exchanges between my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) and the Leader of the House relating to the closure of Gartcosh.

In those exchanges, we learnt that a letter had been sent from the office of the Secretary of State for Scotland, signed by the private secretary, to the convener of the trade union committee at Gartcosh. That letter referred to the report of the Select Committee and in paragraph 2 stated that the shop stewards put their view to the committee that "the link between Gartcosh and Ravenscraig was such that if the British Steel Corporation went ahead with their intention to close Gartcosh, then the closure of Ravenscraig would inevitably follow. You gave Mr. Younger papers in support of the arguments which you and your colleagues had developed at the meeting."

Part of paragraph 6 states:

"The overriding factor in persuading Mr. Younger to come to his decision has been the clear and firm statements by the Corporation that Ravenscraig's future is not prejudiced by the intended closure of Gartcosh, particularly in evidence to the Select Committee."

The Secretary of State and his private secretary had referred to the impending reply by the Government to that Select Committee. Mr. Speaker knows, as does the rest of the House, that such replies are Command Papers. Select Committees expect and usually get from the Government the respect that is due to them. My point is that the terms of this letter pre-empt any considered reply by the Government to that Select Committee. The fact that the letter is dated the day of that report downgrades and pre-empts the report and, in some respects, shows discourtesy not only to the Committee but to the House, which allocated duties to that Committee. Does that not require a comment from you, Mr. Speaker, as upholder of the rights of Back-Bench Members and the House and later, perhaps at an appropriate time, comment from the Leader of the House?

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North) rose——

Mr. Speaker: Is it on the same point of order?

Mr. Walker: Yes, Sir. I draw attention to the problems of the members of the Select Committee on Scottish Affairs and the uncertainties created by the activities of its Chairman. The hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) advised the House on the Wednesday evening that the Chairman and the Labour members of the Committee had asked to be removed from it. Further to that, the Chairman put forward proposals on Scottish radio and television—I did not see the television programme—and in the press. The Chairman proposed to call a meeting of the Select Committee—he did so on a radio programme in which I took part.

Mr. Speaker: I cannot answer for radio programmes.

Mr. Walker: It followed that the Committee had received only 48 hours' notice of this meeting. Consequently some members of the Committee were unable to be present. I wish your guidance, Mr. Speaker, on how hon. Members serving on Select Committees and other Members of this House can be protected from such uncertainty. We did not know whether the Committee was going, running or existing. Those of us who take our duties seriously, particularly our duties on Select Committees, are worried about what happened. It is not surprising that the Secretary of State was equally uncertain what was happening.

Mr. Speaker: May I answer both questions, but separately. I say to the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing), who raised this matter on behalf of his hon. Friend, that if, as he is alleging, the Secretary of State for Scotland has been discourteous to the Committee, that is a matter for the Committee to take up with the Secretary of State. It is not a matter for me.

The hon. Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) will know, as he has been in the House for a long time, that this Select Committee was appointed on the recommendation of the Committee of Selection and that only it can recommend that an hon. Gentleman be taken off a Committee. It is not a matter for me.

Royal Assent

Mr. Speaker: I have to notify the House, in accordance with the Royal Assent Act 1967, that the Queen has signified her Royal Assent to the following Acts:

1. Consolidated Fund (No. 3) Act 1985.
2. European Communities (Spanish and Portuguese Accession) Act 1985.
3. Northern Ireland (Loans) Act 1985.
4. Fraserburgh Harbour Order Confirmation Act 1985.
5. Fraserburgh Harbour (No. 2) Order Confirmation Act 1985.
6. Fraserburgh Harbour (No. 3) Order Confirmation Act 1985.
7. Okehampton Bypass (Confirmation of Orders) Act 1985.

BILL PRESENTED

DRUG TRAFFICKING OFFENCES

Mr. Secretary Hurd, supported by the Prime Minister, Secretary Sir Geoffrey Howe, Secretary Sir Keith Joseph, Mr. Secretary Fowler, Mr. Peter Brooke and Mr. David Mellor, presented a Bill to make provision for the recovery of the proceeds of drug trafficking and other provision in connection with drug trafficking and to increase the number of assistant commissioners of police for the metropolis: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time tomorrow and to be printed. [Bill 54.]

Orders of the Day

Building Societies Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

Mr. Speaker: Before I call the Minister to move the Second Reading, I must announce to the House that I have selected the reasoned amendment in the names of the Leader of the Opposition and his right hon. and hon. Friends.

4.49 pm

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Ian Stewart): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

The story of British building societies has been one of success and of national achievement over many generations. They have helped millions of people to buy their homes. Currently more than 25 million of our fellow citizens use the societies for their savings. Indeed, at the outset I should declare that I have a share account and a building society mortgage, and I suspect that the same is true of the majority of hon. Members. The societies have promoted their traditional purposes of thrift and home ownership for nearly 200 years. The main purpose of the legislation before the House today is to enable them to continue to develop and prosper in a world which has changed a great deal since the societies came into being at the end of the 18th century.

The Bill is the most far-reaching legislation on building societies for more than 100 years, since the Building Societies Act 1874. There has been amending legislation since, notably in 1894, 1939 and 1960, but the fundamental structure of the 1874 Act has survived until now, and the consolidated Act of 1962, which is now in force, still bears a clear similarity to it.

But time has moved on, and as the societies themselves have changed since their humble beginnings, so has the market place in which they operate. Individually, the largest societies are now among the great institutions of our land. Collectively, the societies represent a major influence not only on the housing market but in the financial system as a whole.

In today's fast-changing markets, societies need to be able to offer a wide range of facilities to an increasingly sophisticated public if they are to continue to compete effectively. New technology and greater customer awareness are posing a new challenge for all financial institutions, but I believe that, by allowing the societies more scope, we will not only enable them to develop their business but will bring extra healthy competition into housing and finance.

Seen from today's perspective, the existing legislation contains restrictions that no longer make sense either in commercial or in prudential terms. For example, although societies can arrange insurance on a borrower's garage, they cannot obtain cover for his car. They can supply him with a valuation report by a staff valuer, but it cannot be extended to a full structural survey. There are many other such limitations which, as time has passed, have come to seem increasingly illogical.

Many technical provisions of the old legislation have simply become out-of-date, reflecting neither the sort of institutions that societies now are, nor the corresponding legislation for companies that has been passed in recent years. Some provisions are entirely anachronistic. It is safe to say that we no longer need a prohibition on balloting for mortgages to see which member will be lucky enough to get the next advance. Nor need an officer any more put up personal security for the funds in his charge, rather as though he were treasurer of the Christmas club.

[Mr. Ian Stewart]

Such considerations have led us to conclude that completely new legislation is needed, not just another in the long line of amending Bills. Therefore, I do not apologise for the fact that the new Bill is large. Beside providing new powers for the societies, it thoroughly modernises their legislative framework, and incorporates many of the provisions which have already been enacted for companies in the Companies Acts of the past 25 years. Before embarking on such a fundamental revision, we thought it right that there should be a full process of consultation. Since the Government's Green Paper was published nearly 18 months ago, we have received and considered a wide range of comments which have been of great assistance in formulating our proposals. On some matters, consultation was not completed in time for inclusion of the necessary provisions in the Bill, and one or two are still under consideration, and on these I propose to bring forward amendments in Committee.

Although the Bill marks a fresh start in terms of building society legislation, I should at once say that its primary theme is continuity based on a successful formula. So the basic function of providing loans for house purchase from the savings of members will continue to form the core of building society business. But the Bill is designed to allow considerable diversification around that central theme. Societies will be able to provide a much greater range of services, but the emphasis will still be on their primary function.

Some flexibility has been deliberately included in the Bill. As time goes by and in the light of experience, the specific powers and the quantified limits placed on them may need revision. Therefore, the Bill provides for some of those aspects to be amended, within limits, by statutory instrument, so that necessary changes need not be shelved until a place for primary legislation can be found in the busy parliamentary timetable.

The new powers that societies will have fall broadly into two groups—those that involve the balance sheet, mainly in the form of new types of lending and other assets, and those that involve the provision of new sorts of services.

The commercial assets of a society are defined as all its assets other than fixed assets and its liquid funds, and they are divided into three classes. Each class is subject to quantified limits, which will be variable so as to provide for some further evolution; but again only within limits, since there comes a point when extension of the permissible proportion of the new types of assets would no longer be consistent with the basic purpose of societies, and where fresh primary legislation would be appropriate if further change was proposed.

Class assets correspond to the principal existing mortgage business of societies. They consist of loans secured on first mortgage of property for the borrower's residential use. Such loans account for about 99 per cent. or more of present building society lending. So the requirement that at least 90 per cent. of a society's total commercial assets should fall within class 1 allows ample scope for developing other business. But the 90 per cent. requirement will ensure that the great bulk of building society lending continues to be of the sort traditionally done by the societies. I should add that the Government still intend that class 1 should include loans secured on shared premises such as houses split into two flats, one of which is occupied by the owner, or corner shops with flats above them.

Mr. Peter Viggers (Gosport): I apologise for challenging my hon. Friend on what may appear to be a detailed point, but can he give us any idea of how the Government will interpret the division between the part of a premises occupied by the proprietor and the part not occupied by him? Do the Government expect that there will be a restriction on lending on business premises only 40 per cent. of which are occupied by the person who seeks the loan? Do the Government have a percentage in mind?

Mr. Stewart: We have in mind a figure of 40 per cent., which should allow for shared property between domestic uses, allowing for part of the premises to be in common use. A similar percentage would apply to commercial uses.

The balance of up to 10 per cent. of a society's commercial assets will be available for other purposes. In principle, the whole of that figure may be used for what are defined as class 2 assets, but no more than half of it —or 5 per cent. of total commercial assets—may be devoted to the essentially riskier type of assets which fall within class 3.

Class 2 will consist of other lending secured on mortgage. Some such lending is open to societies now —for example, lending to housing associations or other bodies corporate. But it will also cater for lending on second mortgage. The ability to participate fully in shared ownership schemes and the greater scope for index-linked loans will enable the societies to contribute more effectively to the development of new forms of finance for housing and home ownership.

Class 3 includes the remaining assets which it will be permissible for societies to hold, including the share capital of subsidiary or associate companies, lending without mortgage security and the ownership of residential land and buildings. The last of these represents an important extension of the capacity of societies to participate more actively in the provision and rehabilitation of housing and in projects involving housing associations and local authorities. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment will have more to say about that when he replies to the debate.

The new power to lend without the security of first or second mortgage will allow people to borrow from their building society for other purposes, for example, to meet the expenses that inevitably go with buying a new home, such as carpets, curtains and furniture. It will also enable the societies to offer a more comprehensive banking service. To encourage societies to spread their business and their risk in this new area of lending there will be a limit of £5,000 on class 3 loans to any individual. Because of the need to ensure that a society has sufficient depth of management to undertake class 3 lending or the ownership of land, these powers will be exercisable only by societies with at least £100 million of commercial assets.

The 1962 Act did not address itself to the need for societies to maintain adequate liquidity, merely referring to the investment of what is called "surplus funds". In the more competitive market conditions of the present day the legislation needs to be more explicit about the function of liquid assets. At the same time it provides that the proportion of total assets that may be held in liquid form should be limited to one third, the purpose of this being to ensure that the balance sheet of a society reflects its principal purpose and that its capital should not be used to support the conduct of a money market business for its own sake.

For a similar reason a limit is also placed on the other side of the balance sheet in respect of the proportion of liabilities that can be raised from wholesale sources. The 20 per cent. limit on such funds should allow societies adequate scope to increase their wholesale borrowing, but it means that they must continue to raise money primarily from individual members. Not only is this in tune with their own traditions, but experience shows that a solid funding base is essential for the prudent management of deposit taking institutions.

I have already alluded to the anomalies and inconsistencies in the range of services which building societies can offer under the present law. The Bill includes a new and specific list of what they may do, enlarging their scope to compete in the provision of services related to both finance and housing. In addition to more comprehensive money transmission and banking services, they will be able to handle a wider range of insurance and investment matters. New opportunities will also be open to them in the housing market to own estate agencies and to provide structural surveys as well as valuations. The existing prohibition on conveyancing will be lifted, although, like other institutions, societies will have to comply with rules to be laid down by the Lord Chancellor.

With more institutions expressing interest in entering the housing market, it makes sense for the societies to be able to offer other lenders the benefit of their own skill and experience as managers. The societies will thus be able to engage in property management and to manage mortgages. And as more people now move home from one country to another in Europe, it is right that societies should no longer be prohibited from operating elsewhere in the European Community.

The use of the further powers contained in this Bill will clearly expose building societies to new risks with which they will be unfamiliar. While the prime responsibility for protecting their reputation for soundness will continue to rest with the boards of the societies themselves, we certainly need to strengthen and modernise the arrangements for their prudential supervision as their business becomes less restricted. Although the problems that have arisen in relation to building societies in recent years have not been unduly serious, we must not neglect the need for their proper supervision. And the supervisory system for the societies must reflect and respond to developments elsewhere. The Government are committed to providing for the first time a comprehensive framework of regulation that maintains confidence in the financial sector as a whole. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer published his White Paper on banking supervision earlier this week, and the Financial Services Bill is published today. The prudential provisions in the Building Societies Bill are therefore part of the Government's approach to the supervision of financial businesses in general.

Mr. John Fraser (Norwood): My understanding of the Bill is that building societies will be able to establish subsidiaries that will operate in other member states. Will the Economic Secretary to the Treasury confirm that the class 1 asset restriction—lending on first mortgages for houses in the United Kingdom—will not be affected? If money is to be raised for lending overseas, will it have to be raised overseas as well as disbursed overseas?

Mr. Stewart: The subsidiary that is operating will need to raise foreign currency in order to lend in foreign currency. Except for a marginal mismatch, that matter would be taken into account by the prudential supervisor.

Accordingly, under this legislation we propose to establish a Building Societies Commission to exercise and extend the functions at present carried out by the Chief Registrar of Friendly Societies. The Chief Registrar himself will become the first chairman of the new commission, which will include people with suitable experience outside the public service, and the supervisory staff of the registry will be strengthened. In parallel with this, the commission will have new powers, based on the Community requirement for prior authorisation of deposit taking institutions.

The main power of the supervisor will rest in the granting and revocation of authorisation and in the imposition of conditions on it. The Bill sets out criteria for prudent management, against which the commission will be able to measure the performance of a society's board. There will also be statutory powers for the commission to obtain from societies the information necessary for supervision, which will be treated as confidential and may be shared with other supervisory authorities only in strictly defined circumstances. And in line with what my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced on Tuesday in the case of the banks, we are proposing to make it a criminal offence to provide false or misleading information to the supervisor.

Mr. Jim Craigen (Glasgow, Maryhill): The Economic Secretary to the Treasury has referred to the new commission. What will be the residual position regarding industrial or corporate societies and friendly societies?

Mr. Stewart: I shall be pleased to clarify that point. The Registry of Friendly Societies will continue in being for all of its other existing purposes. The commission will be established only for the purpose of supervising building societies.

New provisions relating to the preparation of the accounts of building societies and the duties of auditors are also included in the Bill. Following the issue of a consultative paper in the summer by the Registry of Friendly Societies, the accounting and control provisions have been brought up to date, and the Government will bring forward appropriate amendments in due course covering a number of further changes which have now been decided. Each year the auditors of a society will have to make a report to the commission, sent in the first instance to the board, on whether the society has complied with the statutory requirements for accounting and control systems. Communication between auditors and supervisor has long taken place, but we shall be introducing measures to permit dialogue between the two on a similar basis to that envisaged for the banking sector.

Since many of the supervisory provisions in the present Bill have been drawn up in parallel with the proposals on banking supervision and financial services, amendment will be necessary on certain points to reflect the development of policy. For example, detailed provisions will be introduced for appeal against the supervisor's decisions on authorisation to reflect the system as it will in future apply to banks; and adjustments will be made to the provisions governing disclosure of confidential information between supervisors in line with the Financial Services Bill.

[Mr. Stewart]

Mr. Tim Smith (Beaconsfield): My hon. Friend referred to the position of auditors, which is dealt with in clause 76(6). It says:

"The auditors . . . shall be entitled".

Does my hon. Friend intend to amend the subsection to read:

"The auditors . . . shall be required" in certain circumstances to communicate with the supervisor?

Mr. Stewart: My hon. Friend draws attention to a point to which I have already referred. The Bill's provisions do not entirely coincide with what has now been announced in relation to banks, where, in certain circumstances, there will be communication both ways between auditor and supervisor. We propose to bring the two into line.

Effective management subject to appropriate supervision is the best means of providing for the integrity and soundness of the societies. But the Bill contains further measures to protect the interests of investors and to ensure that the societies give proper public account of themselves, and compete fairly and openly in the market.

As part of the comprehensive reform of the constitution of the societies, directors will have to make full disclosure of any personal interest in the business of their societies, and there will be new restrictions on loans to directors and their families in line with provisions already enacted for banks.

We propose to put building societies and banks on an equal footing in respect of exemption from the Consumer Credit Act. At present, the societies enjoy exemption from that Act in respect of all their mortgage lending, but under this Bill such exemption will be limited to first mortgage loans for the purchase, improvement or repair of property, and an early opportunity will be taken to enact a similar provision for the banks.

Anxieties have also been expressed about the way in which building societies might exploit their huge share of the housing market in the use of their new powers. We have therefore decided that they should not be permitted to make offers of mortgage conditional on the use of their other services and that the cross-subsidisation of one service by another should be brought above board by a requirement to quote separate prices for each of them.

Mr. Robert McCrindle (Brentwood and Ongar): Will the Minister explain, in relation to what he just said, why, if that was considered necessary, it was not also considered necessary to remove the conditionality, as I understand it is called, in relation to some of the additional services in which the building societies are now to be allowed to participate, in particular lending on unsecured loans?

Mr. Stewart: The provision of services relating to housing is so closely related to the main function of building societies, in which they have such a huge market share, that it puts that consideration in a much higher relief than the point which my hon. Friend raises about the rather limited provision that would apply to other sorts of lending.

At present, the building societies operate a voluntary scheme to protect investors, in which not all societies fully participate. The Banking Act, on the other hand, includes a statutory scheme covering up to 75 per cent. of the first £10,000 of any investment, and we have felt it right that the societies should also be required to provide a similar level of protection by statute. They will, in addition, be given the power to provide a higher level of protection by entering into voluntary arrangements, if they so wish.

Throughout their existence, the constitution of building societies has been based on mutual ownership. This Bill is based on the principle that, as long as the members of a society so wish, its mutual status should continue. But mutuality in the conditions of today is not without its problems. It can, in particular, cause difficulties of accountability when applied to institutions as large as some of the major societies are today.

The Bill therefore contains a series of measures designed to enhance the opportunities for member participation and to make the mutual system work more efficiently. The rights of members to vote on resolutions have been overhauled and the extent to which voting rights can be restricted is limited. The election of directors by members is made mandatory, and members wishing to stand for election will be able to circulate statements in support of their candidature. The rules for co-option and proxy voting will be tightened.

Mr. Richard Ottaway (Nottingham, North): While I welcome the protection envisaged in the Bill for investors in and members of building societies, the measure makes little reference to protecting building society borrowers. What does my hon. Friend propose to do about abuses by building societies, say, of the introduction or use of penalty clauses in mortgages, the portability of mortgages and the way in which building societies set their interest rates? Does he propose to introduce any regulations or to amend the Bill in those respects?

Mr. Stewart: I do not have such amendments or regulations in mind. With increasing competition within the building society movement and between building societies and banks, those building societies which seek to impose unacceptable conditions on the lending they make are not likely to get the business of my hon. Friend and those who think like him.

Mr. Christopher Hawkins (High Peak): Building society borrowers need a guarantee that they will be charged the market rate of interest on their mortgages after they have become locked into them. The Halifax has cut its interest rate for new borrowers but not for existing borrowers.

Mr. Stewart: I appreciate my hon. Friend's point, but I do not think it would be proper to set out in legislation for any group of companies or institutions the precise way in which they should set the terms of their lending, and we have no plans to do so in this measure.

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley): The question of protection and proxy voting will be vitally important should a building society ultimately move forward to incorporation.

There is fear that there will be abuses of the present proxy voting system. Will the safeguards to which the Minister referred ensure that on any of those matters the members will take the decisions and the decisions will not be taken for them?

Mr. Stewart: We are anxious that all decisions are properly taken by the members on mergers, conversion or any other matters to do with the ordinary routine business of the society. The measures that we are suggesting for proxy voting will tighten up the procedure and make it less open to any abuse of the kind about which the hon. Gentleman is concerned. I hope that that will be the result of the provisions that we are bringing forward.

Two important constitutional issues which have attracted much comment are those of mergers and conversion to companies. Again, we are providing for increased participation by members before any such change can be implemented. In addition to the 75 per cent. majority of investors voting, any proposal for merger or conversion will also require the approval of a majority of borrowing members voting so as to protect the interests of those with mortgages. When a merger involves a society being absorbed in a much larger one, there is to be a minimum vote required of 20 per cent. of all its members.

Despite these safeguards, some directors of smaller societies have expressed misgivings about the plan to allow a society which sees advantage in a merger with another to put its case directly to the latter's members, even if its board does not agree. I recognise their worries and we are considering some detailed amendments to the procedure, including tying it more closely to annual general meetings rather than to special meetings. But I am sure that it would be wrong to allow an unresponsive board to insulate itself entirely from commercial pressures against the wishes of the shareholders.

Equally, I am convinced that it would be wrong to forbid the members of a society to make a decision that it should incorporate, if that is their clear wish. Along with the Bill, we published a consultation document on the procedure for conversion, since the technicalities involved are complex. But the principles are clear and simple. We need to prevent the movement of speculative funds from one society to another in search of easy profits, and to protect the rights of members in societies undergoing conversion without giving them an incentive to convert purely to capitalise on their stake in the reserves.

Furthermore, during the first five years of a former society's existence as a company, no single shareholder will be able to hold more than 15 per cent. of its capital. The provisions we propose should ensure that a society is converted into a company only if its members clearly wish it to evolve beyond the constraints of the building society legislation, and that, if it does so, it would be able to convert in a manner which does not involve surrendering its independence.

The Bill gives the building societies important new opportunities to respond to the needs of their customers today and to plan for the future. Our purpose has been to provide a framework in which each of them can develop in the way it judges best, while always retaining the essential characteristics on which their reputation has been based.

Of one thing I am sure, and that is that there will still be room for societies of all sort — large and small, national, regional and local — so long as they provide the services that the public want. Indeed, the Bill should not diminish but enhance the diversity of the building society movement, which has been one of its greatest strengths.

The societies have given outstanding service to the community since the time of our grandfathers' grandfathers, and this legislation will enable them to continue to do so for many years to come. I commend the Bill to the House.

5.19 pm

Dr. Oonagh McDonald (Thurrock): I beg to move, to leave out from "That" to the end of the Question and to add instead thereof:

"this House declines to give a Second Reading to a Bill which extends to building societies powers to engage in unsecured lending and commercial investment which may lead to their failure to maintain their commitment and responsibility for increased housing finance; weakens this commitment by the facility for societies to become public limited companies with only a commercial interest in housing finance; creates the risk of United Kingdom and foreign financial institutions taking over smaller societies; increases financial risks without substantially new statutory means of control; and reduces public accountability."

When appearing on a television chat show in May 1983, Clive Thornton, the then chief general manager of the Abbey National, described the building societies as the highest form of Socialism. If that were wholly true, we could understand the Government's enthusiasm to introduce a Bill which, over a period of time, could fundamentally change the nature and status of the building societies. We do not totally accept that description of building societies, but, as the Minister has said, the societies have performed an important service for a long time by providing a stable system of housing finance.

The fact that mutual organisations are non-profit making has enabled them to fulfil social and housing needs, as well as maximise their profits. That feature differentiates building societies from profit-making companies. We may come to regret the fact that within five or 10 years building societies, as a mutual sector focusing on housing needs, could slowly disappear.

The Bill has been introduced in response to pressure from some members of the building societies movement, especially the large building societies, in particular, the Halifax and the Abbey National. Some of the changes proposed in the Bill are unnecessary and could detract from the main purpose of fulfilling the housing need. We do not oppose the principle, but we are concerned about the possibility of building societies being converted into public limited companies.

I said earlier that we were anxious about the publication of the consultation paper. The Minister has said that the process of conversion from a mutual to a public limited company is complex. His recent experience in that area has not been entirely happy. Therefore, the consultation document should have been published earlier and we should not have to wait until the end of the proceedings on the Bill to analyse and debate the clauses that will allow building societies to be converted.

I emphasise that the Opposition are opposed to allowing building societies to convert from mutuals into public limited companies. We do not consider that that move is necessary. We believe that it would bring about enormous changes in the building society movement.

In the City the proposed legislation has stimulated great interest in building societies. The reasons are obvious.

[Dr. Oonagh McDonald]

Building societies have 26 million customers and 7,000 branches. Interest has been shown by various financial institutions, to the surprise of the deputy secretary general, Mr. Mark Boleat, who, in the Financial Times of 7 December 1985, admitted:

"It is clear that there are many predators around who want to get their hands on building societies and their branches."

It is perhaps a little late in the day for the Building Societies Association to recognise the implications of the big bang that will occur in 1986.

I am aware that the Minister has tried to build safeguards into the process of conversion, but it could lead to mergers. Building societies could become even more dominated by a few large societies, which may then convert into public limited companies. One or two societies have already expressed the wish to become public limited companies. They could be then taken over by other financial institutions, and the result would be large financial conglomerates whose main business would no longer be housing finance.

If societies become large financial institutions, they may be anxious to retain a higher cash ratio, which could have implications for foreclosures on mortgages. The House will know that the building societies have an excellent record; the number of foreclosures is small. As constituency Members, we are aware that building society managers are often anxious to assist mortgagees to retain their mortgage, despite difficult financial circumstances or a family crisis. I hope that the Government have properly considered the long-term future.

Mr. Tim Smith: Is there any evidence that the clearing banks, which are now quite big in that market, foreclose more often than the building societies?

Dr. McDonald: The Minister should be able to answer that. We want to know whether that has been considered in the formulation of the Bill. Both sides of the House are anxious for a stable system of housing finance to continue, and no one would wish for an increase in foreclosures. We wish to know whether the Minister has made any comparison and what the future possibilities are.

The changes in the building society movement could lead to an increase in the market for secondary mortgages. Those are not so attractive in Britain as they are in America, where there is a fixed rate of interest on mortgages. However, there could be an attractive market here, because it is a safe method of lending. If that market increases, what protection will there be in the legislation for the borrower? Have the Government considered that eventuality, which is important for the future of housing in Britain?

Mr. Ian Stewart: It would be for the borrower to ensure that the terms of a second mortgage were suitable. That applies whether it is offered by a building society or by any other lender.

The hon. Lady also mentioned that there might be more foreclosures or a different attitude to borrowers if there were a merger or a conversion into a public limited company. I emphasise that the new provision means that at least 50 per cent. of borrowing members would have to vote to approve any change, such as a merger or a conversion. That would place the onus on those proposing a different corporate structure or ownership to satisfy the borrowers that they would not be placed in a worse position. That could be a difficult task. The borrowers would have a new power, through their votes, to exercise their judgment as to whether they wanted such a change. They would not be going in with their eyes closed.

Dr. McDonald: I appreciate the Minister's remarks about that provision. However, we wish to be reassured that the onus is on the societies to make clear to the borrowers the implications of any change in structure.

I believe that the Minister misunderstood my point about secondary mortgages. The hon. Gentleman referred to second mortgages. A secondary mortgage is when a parcel of loans is sold off to another company. Perhaps the Minister could reply on that point.

There are two or three points to be made about unsecured lending. First, Labour Members do not see the necessity for another source of unsecured credit. As anyone who walks down the high street knows full well, there are already many sources of unsecured credit. It is not necessary for building societies to provide it as well. In fact, the Consumer Association said that only a quarter of building society members whom it surveyed were interested in that particular facility being provided.

Mr. John Watts (Slough): The hon. Lady says that in a survey only 25 per cent. of building society members were interested in taking advantage of that new facility. Would she concede the possibility that a wider range of services being made available by building societies might well make them more attractive to a wider investing public and that that would increase the flow of funds into building societies for the purpose of their major objective, which is lending for house purchase?

Dr. McDonald: That is possible, but I do not think that that is the main reason for people choosing to invest in a building society as opposed to some other form of organisation.

There has been a growth in consumer credit under this Government. It is interesting to note now much that has grown. After allowing for inflation, the amount of debt outstanding in terms of consumer credit rose by about 60 per cent. between 1979 and 1984, and it now stands at over £22 billion—an enormous growth in consumer credit. The Bank of England has estimated that if building societies put half of what was allowed into consumer credit that would add another £2 billion to the outstanding debt and give them a market share of about 10 per cent.

The Minister's proposals in the Bill have been described as modest. That is a fair comment so far as it goes. However, he is no doubt aware that some of the societies are already pressing for an increase in the limits. The Abbey National's view, which was given to us this week, suggests that instead of 5 per cent. of their total assets being used for unsecured lending, building societies should be allowed to start at 10 per cent. He will also be aware that, although his proposals might be described as modest, they can be changed by parliamentary order. That means that the amount of unsecured credit offered by building societies could increase fairly rapidly over the next few years, once the Bill takes effect.

The building societies claim that they want to become public limited companies because of the necessity for raising capital which they might not otherwise be able to do, so that they can extend their services in a variety of ways. It is interesting that the building societies should put forward such an argument when, in fact, in the Building Societies Association's October bulletin an article is devoted to describing the success of the building societies movement in raising money on the wholesale market having been given the necessary tax changes and permission to do so by the Government during the 1980s.

It is especially interesting that it should be argued that building societies must become public limited companies in order to raise sufficient capital when not only the wholesale market but the Eurobond market proved attractive for societies. The reason for that is that the unique security which building societies as mutual institutions offer means that those looking for sterling floating rate assets will find building societies' floating rate notes particularly attractive. In other words, building societies have not found that they have suffered particularly great difficulties in raising funds over recent years; and they appear to have every opportunity to continue in that way. Therefore, we reject the argument that some building societies have put forward for wanting to become a public limited company, and we do not consider that to be necessary. We would rather that they remained in the housing sector as mutual organisations.

Let me deal with some of the issues which will affect the small building societies and investors. I am concerned that the investor protection scheme proposed in the Bill falls short of the level of protection currently available to most building society investors. I cannot see that there is any reason, particularly as building societies are entering into more risky ventures, for reducing that level of protection. I hope that the Minister will consider amendments to that in Committee. If not, the Opposition will certainly stress the need for that.

The Building Societies Commission is obviously an area at which we shall look closely since we are concerned that building societies should be properly regulated. One of the issues that the Minister must make plain in the course of our debates on the Bill is that the commission will have adequate resources. Secondly, we shall want to know a great deal more about the relationships between the commission and the other self-regulatory bodies and the proposals to regulate banking activities. In so far as building societies engage in those activities, they should come under banking regulations.

The Minister referred to the anxieties of small and medium-sized societies which fear the prospect of hostile takeovers. I am glad that he intends to respond to some of that pressure. I have received a number of such letters and I must mention one from the Essex Equitable building society which operates in my constituency. It is the fifth oldest in the country and, as it says, has grown steadily if slowly. It is a small society, but I have a particular interest in ensuring that it is protected from any hostile takeover bid; and that applies to other societies which have made their views clear. Many of the small to medium-sized societies offer either a specialist service or a service to a particular area. There is no reason why the minnows should be swallowed up by the whales. I hope that the Minister will ensure that they are properly protected.

We are glad to see some of the other services being offered by building societies in connection with house building, but we shall want to ensure that the consumer —the borrower—is properly protected against conflicts of interest while at the same time making sure that the legal profession does not have it all its own way.

The Opposition feel that the Bill contains proposals which in the long term could mean that the building societies movement as we know it will disappear from the scene. Its loss is something that we could well live to regret. It has served us well. It has provided for many people's housing needs throughout the country. We want to make quite sure that it will continue to do so. We are not certain that the proposals in the Bill will ensure that that will happen.

5.40 pm

Mr. Christopher Hawkins (High Peak): I am grateful to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for the chance to speak about this important Bill.

I, too, have certain misgivings. I would prefer building societies to stick to their last and to remain as mutual societies, friendly societies, which were set up to help people to buy their own home. What better aim could they have? I do not want to see them lending money for people to buy motor cycles or holidays abroad. I do not want to see them become banks and put up charges to make profits for shareholders.

I ask the Minister to assure me that he will carefully monitor the effects of the Bill, and will be prepared to come back with new legislation if the fears of some of us are realised and if changes occur which are not in the public interest—and in particular not in the interest of home owners.

To some, the Bill may appear merely to tidy up the current law relating to building societies. To others, its importance will lie in the extension of powers given to building societies so that they may, if they wish, become full-blown banks or may extend into providing services such as insurance, estate agency, conveyancing and valuation. Those aspects of the Bill merely allow building societies to do what others are already doing. They will not radically change people's lives.

There is, however, one clause in the Bill which will allow building societies to do something which is radical and different. It is clause 10(4)(a) in part III, which gives building societies the power to make advances in which "the amount due to the society may be adjusted from time to time by reference to such public index of prices as is specified in the mortgage".

Although it may seem an insignificant clause, it would be possible to write a book on what it implies. In fact, I wrote a book on what it implies, in early 1983. I would not normally seek to plug a product in this House but, as many other hon. Members wish to speak, instead of saying all that I should like to say on this complex topic, I will merely say that the book is called "Britain's Economic Future" and is available in the Library for those who would like to see it. Having campaigned for several years for index-linked mortgages to be widely available, I am naturally delighted to see clause 10 in the Bill.

The problem with the conventional mortgage is that the money payments are constant over the life of the mortgage. Therefore, in real terms they are very high to begin with and decline over time as inflation erodes their value. To buy even a £20,000 house at recent interest rates costs from £40 to £45 per week, even after allowing for tax relief. With the addition of the cost of rates, water rates, repairs, maintenance and so on, it creates a real burden for a young married couple on average earnings or less.

[Mr. Christopher Hawkins]

In the early years of marriage, the burden is especially high because of the need to furnish the home and because many will be raising a young family. Later, the burden will become far lighter, partly because commitments will have declined but mainly because inflation will have eroded the value of the payments that need to be made, and the couple will have had a major growth in their real living standards as the economy grows.

The present mortgage may be fine for those who can afford it, but for many the burdens are the wrong way round. The burden is greatest when they can least afford it in real terms; the burden is least when they can most afford it. Index-linked mortgages solve that problem by having low payments in the early years, which rise over time as incomes and prices rise. Under those schemes it will be cheaper to buy a council house than to rent one. It will be cheaper to buy a £20,000 private sector house than to rent the average council house. That will radically affect many people's lives.

It is true that the mortgage payments will rise over time in line with inflation, but so do rents. It is better to have a smaller mortgage payment rising with inflation than to have a larger rent which also rises with inflation. As a result of introducing such mortgages on a widely available basis we could well see, by the end of the century, over 80 per cent. of families owning, or in process of buying, their own home.

We have given people the right to buy. In the Bill we can now offer them the means to buy. Together, the changes will create a property-owning democracy on a scale never dreamt of before. In doing that, we shall have created one of the biggest social revolutions of the century. For those reasons, I commend this radical and important Bill to the House.

5.44 pm

Mr. Gordon Oakes (Halton): Like the Minister, I must begin by declaring an interest, in that I have a mortgage and a building society account. I am also an honorary—I stress the word "honorary" — vice-president of the Building Societies Association. I assure hon. Members that I get no fees and have no directorships. I attend an annual vice-presidents' dinner, but I do not think that my mind is too much swayed as a result of that.

I am very proud to be a vice-president of the Building Societies Association because the origins of building societies spring from working class people. At the beginning of the 19th century, working class people banded together for their own protection from rapacious landlords or employers who wanted not only to own their souls at work but their homes. Therefore, working class people banded together in a mutual institution to buy their own homes.

The origins of building societies are closely linked with my part of the world, the north of England. Among the greatest and oldest societies are the Halifax, the Burnley, and the Bradford and Bingley. They are northern names of northern societies set up by northern working people many years ago. As a result, building societies are steeped in the principles and practice of mutual aid. I am glad that the Bill preserves that characteristic, while at the same time bringing societies out of a straitjacket of an Act which is 111 years old this year. The Act of 1874 is the principal Act. There was an Act in 1962 but it was merely a consolidating measure; it did nothing new. Building societies have been constrained by the conditions of 1874 since that time.

I welcome the Bill and I assure the House that the Building Societies Association welcomes it. I think that for once the Government have got the balance right. That is the result of three years of extensive consultation with the Building Societies Association, with building societies and with others. It is essential that we get it right, because it may well be another century or half-century at least before we have another comprehensive Act.

In the commercial climate, in competition with other financial institutions, building societies at present have one hand tied behind their back. Despite that, they have enormous popularity with the public. We are not talking simply about building societies or about the association; we are talking about people——constituents.

I have some facts and figures which may astound some hon. Members. Over 60 per cent. of all adults in Britain have building society accounts. That means about 28 million individuals. Societies have been particularly successful in attracting business from the younger age groups. A research survey in 1983 showed that no fewer than 52 per cent. of those in the 16 to 19 age range had building society accounts, compared with only 29 per cent. who had bank accounts. Well over 60 per cent. of all adults in the 20 to 30 range are building society investors. Societies have helped considerably to spread the habit of saving and efficient money management among the young. It may astound the House to know that over a third of all children now have building society accounts, although individually the amounts are small.

The popularity of building societies arises from their friendliness and the sense of belonging. People feel that they are wanted by the societies in the 7,000 outlets at which they can do their business with the societies. Those outlets are usually in the high street where the shops are. They are easily reachable. One principal reason is that they are open when people need them whereas banks are not, for example, on a Saturday, at tea time or after 3.30 pm.

The Bill brings many improvements. I shall deal with clause 14 and unsecured advances. I do not agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald) in her anxiety on that matter. It is only a small proportion of building society funds that can be used in that way. It is right to enable a borrower to buy furniture or to pay for home improvements or essential repairs when it would be meaningless and costly to add those to the mortgage.

The Bill gives power to the building society for cash dispensing facilities. They are a doubtful legality at present, although some building societies do have cash dispensers. Most importantly, it gives power to the building society to issue cheque guarantee cards. At the moment if a building society were to give a cheque book it would be of little use without a guarantee card. To do that would almost certainly be illegal under the Building Societies Act 1874.

Clause 15 of the Bill gives building societies the power to own land for residential purposes. That is important in inner cities and it enables building societies to become what their name implies, a "building society" rather than a mere loan club. That is even more important in the concept of shared ownership. I agree with much that the hon. Member for High Peak (Mr. Hawkins) said about the burden of the mortgage being at a time when the borrower can least afford it. One answer to that is shared ownership.

At the moment, it would be illegal for a building society to own the rented part of that shared ownership. That would have to be avoided by various legal devices. The Bill will enable the building society to own the rented part.

I know that the Bill cannot do anything about our land tenure system but I believe that it is ludicrous. If one was to buy a back-to-back, small terraced house, or even a flat, the mechanism and the law involved in buying it is the same as if one were buying a baronial medieval estate. It is time that some Government—I hope that it is my Government—brought the whole issue of land tenure in Britain kicking and screaming out of the 14th century and put it in the 20th and 21st centuries. The power of ownership under clause 15 allows some flexibility. I want to see that, as I know from his speech does the hon. Member for High Peak.

The Bill gives power in clause 16 for the major societies to operate in the EEC. That is important today because many working people retire to Spain or Portugal and buy a villa. It is important that while buying that villa they have the help of their own building society, the one that they are used to, especially when they are operating under foreign law and in foreign climes. Such people are not tax exiles; they are rain exiles. They go away after a summer such as we have just had and they want to live abroad in order to buy sunshine. Why confine clause 16 to the EEC? Why not make it a worldwide power instead of just a European geographical area in which building societies can operate that clause?

There is also the important provision of new services. It is right that a building society investor can use his account to pay gas or electricity bills. The building society can also operate insurance facilities, foreign exchange, valuation and estate agency facilities. For example, the Leicester building society introduced a scheme a couple of years ago called Home Link. It is a pioneer scheme using computers in one's home. With the aid of a television set and telephone, one can pay bills and deal with many matters. That is a boon to disabled people because they do not even have to leave their houses in order to pay bills. That is the sort of innovation and experiment that the enabling power will encourage.

My first major criticism of the Bill is that it does not deal with conveyancing. My hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) was let down by the Government in that matter because he withdrew his private Member's Bill on an undertaken that the Government would do something. However, on the day that the Bill was published, 6 December, the Solicitor-General told the House:

"the Government have concluded that there is no difficulty in principle in such institutions providing conveyancing to persons to whom they are not also offering a loan. However, the Government are not satisfied that lending institutions could safely be permitted to offer both conveyancing and a loan in the same transaction. It is therefore proposed to prohibit lending institutions from providing conveyancing, either directly or through a subsidiary company in which they hold a majority stake, to those who are also borrowing from them."—[Official Report, 6 December 1985; Vol. 88, c. 354.]

That is arrant nonsense. What conflict of interest can there possibly be? The building society is obviously just as worried and entitled to ensure that the purchaser has a good title as the purchaser himself. It is lending its money to the purchaser, so there is no conflict of interest.

When I was a solicitor the practice was that the purchaser's solicitor invariably acted for the building society as well. I believe that that still happens today. The building society instructs the purchaser's solicitor. I can see that there could be difficulties if, for example, a building society had foreclosed and was selling the house through a loan to another purchaser, but rules can be made and drawn up to deal with that matter. It is nonsense to say that building societies should not have the power to provide conveyancing services.

My hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby was temporarily out of the Chamber, but as he has now returned I shall repeat that I feel he was let down by the Government on the undertaking that they gave him. I was convinced that the Bill was the vehicle by which that undertaking could be carried through. It is obvious from the Solicitor-General's statement that that is not the case. No doubt, my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby will deal with that at greater length.

I am worried about building societies becoming limited companies. I do not think that many will want to do that. There may be a need for the odd experiment in that direction but, given the constraints that the Government have rightly put in the Bill, there will be few building societies which will have a sufficient percentage of investors who will want to convert the society to a limited company.

Clauses 84 and 85 worry me. They deal with the matter of unagreed mergers. I think that I know what the Government are worrying about. Their object is to protect members from directors blocking the merger for their own ends. I stress to the Government that a building society is a mutual institution. It is not a company. Therefore, I cannot see how one can have an unagreed merger of a mutual institution of that nature.

My second worry about those clauses is that the membership list could be subject to abuse. I know about the Data Protection Act 1984, but people could obtain that membership list and use it for many purposes. It is a valuable commodity. It identifies the amount of money that people have at their disposal. That is something that commercial companies would give their right arms for. It would enable them to check the credit of particular individuals. I think that in Committee something should be done about safeguards against abuse.

The third matter that worries me is building societies' staff. If an unagreed merger is possible, there should be some way of consulting the staff. The Bill provides for the society members to be consulted, but the staff should have some say in the matter. That must be put right in the Bill.

On the subject of agreed mergers, there is no doubt that societies will continue to merge. In 1974, there were 416 building societies, and at the end of last year there were 190. In 10 years, there has been a considerable merging of building societies, and that will continue.

The smaller building societies do not have a great deal to worry about from the Bill because, as my hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock correctly said, they offer specialised services. Some offer those services geographically. They give more favourable treatment to people within their own counties. That is commendable. Other building societies look not so much to the geography of an area but to the characteristics of the residential property upon which they are lending. They might, for example, look more favourably on thatched houses than most building societies. Some building societies will not touch them. They may look more favourably on houses with a cellar. It has always intrigued me that a house with a cellar is almost unmortgageable in many parts of the country. I do not know whether the building societies fear for the structure of the house or fear that the existence of the cellar will lead the purchaser to drink so much that he will be unable to afford his mortgage. Cellars are anathema to all but one or two building societies which say that there is nothing wrong with them.

[Mr. Gordon Oakes]

Thirdly, a small society might specialise in a particular class of person. Some societies favoured policemen when they were in police housing. When their service was complete they needed to buy a house. That does not apply so much now, because many policemen live in their own houses during their service. Another example is that of public house tenants. They suddenly find when they are in their fifties and wish to retire that they need other accommodation and a mortgage. Some of the smaller societies specialise in that category of borrower.

In Committee, where I hope to serve, there will be other i's to be dotted and t's to be crossed, but this is a most useful Bill which will be to the benefit of many millions of borrowers and investors. It preserves the nature of the building societies but brings the law up to date for present and future needs. It has the broad support of the Building Societies Association and it certainly has mine.

6.2 pm

Mr. Michael Latham (Rutland and Melton): The right hon. Member for Halton (Mr. Oakes) has talked himself into a job with his last remarks about the Committee stage. I am sure that he will make a distinguished contribution to it. I wish to begin by echoing the same interest as he did. It is an entirely non-financial one. Like him, I am a vice-president of the Building Societies Association and also of the Midland Association of Building Societies. They are both honorary, unpaid positions.

I have been involved directly in the building industry for 18 years. I have been a director or employee of a large building company for nearly 11 years. That company has recently combined with two large building societies to assist urban renewal in decaying inner city areas.

My general attitude to the Bill is one of cautious welcome. I was never especially enthusiastic for new legislation in this sphere. The British building society movement is the envy of the world for the efficient and economic manner in which it helps millions of people to buy homes of their own. It has a special place in the affections of our people. They see it as a completely safe investment. I shall say more about that, as the Bill contains some disappointing provisions in that regard.

The public do not regard building societies as a dodgy speculation, run by smart Alicks or City whiz kids. They see their local manager as a pillar of his community, utterly respectable and safe, cautious perhaps, and dull, even in the view of the media or the publicity conscious business entrepreneur. That reputation is to be treasured. Building societies have brought home ownership and completely safe investments to vast numbers of our fellow citizens. They have rarely been troubled by the squalid scandals which have sometimes disfigured the City of London. When building societies have fallen into the hands of crooks or incompetents, the other societies have immediately rallied round to give complete protection to the investing or borrowing public.

Mr. Conal Gregory (York): My hon. Friend used the phrase "complete protection", but will he confirm that that is not the case and that building societies that have got into difficulties, such as Grays building society, did not give a 100 per cent. return to their investors? It is only marginal protection.

Mr. Latham: I shall deal with that point in a moment.

As a good friend of the movement, I should like to sound a firm word of warning. Yes, let us have cash dispensers, as the right hon. Member for Halton said, improve the savings schemes and compete over interest rates and terms offered to the public, provided that the high street is not filled with too many identical branches. Those changes may be necessary in 1985-86, but we should never forget that the societies' real job is to help people to buy homes. We should never forget that people expect building societies to be cautious, conservative, and even dull. There is nothing but honour in the course that has been followed for the past 150 years. Smart dealing should be left to the whiz kids. The societies do not need that type of business, and they should not be looking for the type of director or general manager who will urge it on them.

I hope that clause 14 business will be the exception rather than the rule for societies. If they have spare money, I hope that they will prefer to use it for residential or other kinds of development in inner city areas under clause 15 rather than to make too many unsecured loans for general consumer credit or activities in the Common Market.

I doubt whether it is necessary for societies to have the powers in clause 14 which enable them to offer loans to the public to buy cars or summer holidays. Surely those things can be left to banks, Barclaycard, Access, or finance companies. But if that concession is to be made to the societies, why should it be restricted to those with assets worth more than £100 million? If the power is acceptable in principle—it is limited to 5 per cent. of assets — there is no clear reason why the smaller societies should be denied it, subject, of course, to the control of the new Building Societies Commission, which will replace the registrar.

A smaller, but completely respectable and greatly respected local society, such as the Melton Mowbray building society, whose assets last year were £72·6 million and which has been helping my constituents since 1875, is as capable of using such a power sensibly and cautiously as a society with assets of £130 million. Either the power is desirable in principle or it is not. I find it difficult to believe that Conservative policy is that big societies can be trusted to behave sensibly but that smaller ones are beyond the pale. That clause will need further consideration in Committee.

There is one power in the Bill that I find utterly regrettable and that I believe should be struck out. It is in clause 84(2) and schedule 13. It has been mentioned by the right hon. Member for Halton and the hon. Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald). For the first time, a Conservative Government are offering us the prospect of contested takeovers for building societies. Do we not have enough bids for public companies going on at the moment? Are we returning to the 1960s syndrome of large is beautiful?

I remember the first time that, as a new vice-president, I went to the annual lunch given by the Building Societies

Association for its vice-presidents. The then chairman, Mr. Alan Cumming—he is with the Woolwich—started his speech to his startled audience by saying:

"One thing is quite certain. When we meet again in 12 months' time, there will be fewer of us."

He did not mean death, the grim reaper of us all. He meant the flood of voluntary society mergers. Of course, he was correct. Whereas in Leicestershire we had a Leicester Permanent and a Leicester Temperance and then a merged Leicester, we now have an Alliance-Leicester. The Midland Association of Building Societies has lost a leading permanent member. That, at least, was a voluntary arrangement.

The Bill will allow largish authorities seeking growth at all costs to circularise the members of smaller local societies and to offer them "bonuses" to vote for a forced merger. That is not my idea of building society practice.

The Melton Mowbray building society, with branches in Melton Mowbray, Oakham and Grantham, has regularly to rebuff larger societies wishing to absorb it voluntarily. It has an excellent management team, and I wish to see it getting on with the job of granting mortgages to my constituents, not directing management effort to fighting off unwelcome embraces from larger societies.

Under the Bill, if a contested merger is unsuccessful, the same society cannot try again for another three years. But there is nothing to stop another society from doing so the next day. That means that the management of the smaller, locally based, perfectly well run society will be continually looking over its shoulder for takeover bids. That is not a proper expenditure of time for non-profit making, mutual organisations. There is no need for tooth and claw City practices in the building society movement. There are already clear and well used systems for voluntary mergers.

Several societies, other than the Melton Mowbray building society, have written to me and many other hon. Members on that matter. Indeed, the Building Societies Association is opposed to those provisions. I shall certainly seek to have them deleted at a later stage.

Of course, if a society decided to go for company status, as is foreshadowed in the Bill, that would be a wholly different matter. Obviously, the normal rules for takeovers would then apply. I find the concept of contested takeovers of mutual organisations in the interests of growth to be quite abhorrent. Surely no Conservative Member can instinctively feel that it is right for large societies to be given an effective carte blanche, sweetened by cash inducements, to harass the smaller local societies. It does not seem right that that should come from a Conservative Government. It is not my idea of Conservatism. If change is not better—to coin a phrase—it is better not to change.

My final point concerns the investors' protection scheme in clauses 22 to 28, but especially clause 25. I am disappointed with the Government's proposals and with what the building societies have agreed—that in the event of the failure of a society, investors shall be protected only up to 75 per cent. of their investment, or a maximum of £10,000.

In the past, when societies have been in trouble—my hon. Friend the Member for York (Mr. Gregory) referred to the Grays building society — or have been compulsorily transferred by the registrar because of irregularities, investors have been protected because another large society has stepped in to take over the assets and the mortgage book. I believe that nothing less than 100 per cent. protection is acceptable. That can be done. Indeed, I believe that that has always been done in the past.

Money in a building society should be like a house built upon rock — safe and solid. The voluntary scheme currently operated by societies involves 90 per cent. protection, although in practice it has been 100 per cent. protection. It has worked satisfactorily, and I cannot see any reason to change it. I hope that those provisions will be altered at a later stage of the Bill's progress through the House.

The societies called for this legislation some years ago with the Spalding report and other subsequent documents. I was never enthusiastic about going to any Government for new legislation. I warned them that once the Pandora's box of legislation was opened, all sorts of gremlins and evil spirits might jump out, as in the ancient myth. In fact, the Minister's box has been mainly benign.

Building societies realise that there is some pressure for change from their consumers, and they want to meet that. They have a major and honourable role to perform in combating urban decay. The Bill certainly deserves a Second Reading, but some of us hope that it will be somewhat changed in Committee before it returns on Report. Indeed, some of us will do rather more than hope, and will seek to bring about changes.

6.13 pm

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): I suppose that, like other hon. Members, I should declare an interest because, in a sense, I own the Halifax building society. I happen to share that ownership with several million other people, and at times I feel as though the society owns me, given the size of my mortgage.

Like other hon. Members, I welcome the Bill. The building societies have served the people well and have encouraged home ownership. They have made home ownership more widely available to a constantly widening circle of people. They have a long tradition of service to the public — some of us might call it Socialism in action, others might call it people's capitalism. We can quibble about the label, but the fact is that building societies have mobilised the savings of the people to serve the community and to advance the cause of home ownership. They can be proud of their record.

However, that record needs to be updated, because the societies face new competition from the banks, there are the problems of new techniques and methods, and new requirements need to be served. Therefore, there is a need for a flexible arrangement that is adequately regulated and supervised. I believe that the Bill provides exactly that.

In common with most hon. Members, I want to look at the Bill from the point of view of the problems and difficulties that it poses. Several hon. Members have pointed to the same problems. The first is the safeguarding of deposits. Through the voluntary scheme that has operated until now, deposits have been adequately safeguarded—up to 100 per cent. in most cases. It is wrong that that protection should be scaled down to bring it into line with the level of safeguarding practised by banks. That will mean less protection, which cannot be right. The current level should have been confirmed, with the banks brought up to that level, rather than the societies being scaled down to the level of banks.

[Mr. Austin Mitchell]

My second reservation is much more substantial. The Bill, together with the regulations that will come from the Lord Chancellor's Department, restricts the ability of building societies to provide the integrated house buying service which they want to provide, and which is a logical and important extension of their role in encouraging home ownership. It is important to have the full ability to provide an integrated house buying service—one-stop shopping, call it what we will — to the consumer. A new generation of people and groups are buying houses who do not have the same middle-class skill of building up an orchestra of a solicitor, a building society, a surveyor and so on, and then conducting the orchestra to provide the full symphony of home ownership.

If organisations compete to provide an integrated service, that is better for the consumer. That competition can come from estate agents employing conveyancers, from solicitors running property shops — they are increasing in number, following the pattern of Scottish solicitors—or from the building societies.

To provide that integrated service was the intention behind my House Buyers' Bill of two years ago. In an attempt to divert support for that Bill from the Conservative Benches—it was striking a popular chord and was obviously a necessary measure — the Government proposed, of their own volition, that building societies, like banks, should carry out conveyancing.

On 20 December 1983, exactly two years ago, the Prime Minister told the House that the Government had decided "to introduce a Bill to enable solicitors employed by institutions such as building societies and banks also to convey houses." —[Official Report, 20 December 1983; Vol. 51, c. 270]

The Prime Minister must have believed what she was saying because she repeated it in January on the television programme "Weekend World".

In the negotiations about the withdrawal of my Bill, I asked the Government firmly to state their commitment to the promise that they had given, and they did so. On 12 January 1984, the Solicitor-General said in a letter:

"We are committed to legislation to enable solicitors employed by organisations such as building societies and banks to undertake conveyancing."

There was no equivocation or reservation—the Solicitor-General said that the Government were committed.

The agreement which formed the basis of my withdrawing the Bill was confirmed in a written answer on 17 February 1984 from the Solicitor-General, who talked of the time

"when solicitors employed by banks, building societies and other organisations are permitted to undertake conveyancing for their employers' customers."—[Official Report, 17 February 1984; Vol. 54, c. 347.]

He said for "employers' customers", not anybody else's customers or some remote organisation that the building societies do not own. That is an absolutely clear and unequivocal commitment.

The Prime Minister must have had time to consult the Lord Chancellor—the fount of all Government policy and wisdom, especially on these matters. They were honourable commitments, honourably given, on the basis of which I withdrew my Bill in February 1984. The commitments were confirmed by the Green Paper on building societies. The building societies were promised in that document and on other occasions the ability to offer their customers a full, integrated house-buying service. Since then, the Law Society has roused itself into a paroxysm of fury about the prospects of building societies undertaking conveyancing. The Law Society fears the competition and the loss of revenue and money that that competition might cause.

Conveyancing has provided over two fifths of the revenue of solicitors' practices. I did not fear the Law Society's anger, because the Government clearly were not going to give way to a sectional interest, however powerful. The Government are the custodian of the general interest and do not want to give way to sectional interests. I did not fear the Law Society's anger because competition is integral and central to the Government's policy and the proposal allowed competition.

The proposal allowed a necessary form of competition because house buying and selling is an increasingly rich market. The circles of home ownership are widening and approximately 64 per cent. of the population now own their own homes. More housing is owned by occupiers and occupiers are moving house more often. House prices are increasing, and the fees are based on percentages of purchase price.

There is a rich market, in which there must be increasing competition. There is a lot of loot to share out, if I may put it that crudely, between the interested parties, and an increasing total of revenue to be shared among that competition. It is essential that the Government allow that competition.

The Lord Chancellor began to act in his capacity as the provisional wing, the political arm, of the Law Society, and started to make demurring noises. We now find that the Bill allows building societies to do conveyancing, but only under the regulations which the Lord Chancellor has rushed to announce.

Why has the Chancellor rushed to make that announcement? Does he want to assure the Law Society that all is well and that he will hold the line until the bitter end? There is no other conceivable reason for rushing out the announcement at this stage. The effect of the announcement is that building societies will be able to undertake conveyancing for other people's customers, and that is absolutely ludicrous. Is a customer of the Halifax to be told, "Well, we can do everything else for you, but we would like you to go across the road and have your conveyancing done by the Bradford and Bingley"? There can be nothing more comic that that. Alternatively, conveyancing may be done by a company which the building society does not control. That is just plain silly.

Why should there be a hands-off operation in connection with conveyancing when other aspects of the integrated service are not so restricted? The pretext for that is that there is a conflict of interest, but I stress that that is only a pretext. That is a last-minute argument dredged up by the Law Society and it has no great validity. If ever there was a profession qualified to cope with conflicts of interest, it must surely be the legal profession. Solicitors handle such matters every day and they know how to deal with them. Indeed, conflict of interest does not stop solicitors from setting up property centres. I welcome that as competition, but solicitors do not feel that there is a conflict of interest in property centres; that is for their benefit and therefore acceptable.

Where conflicts of interest do arise they can be coped with by regulations of the Office of Fair Trading. There can be proper safeguards and even prohibitions for handling certain cases. There can be proper warnings, and no difficulties should arise in coping with the problem of conflicts of interest.

If by conflict of interest we mean that people should have independent financial advice, solicitors are not qualified to give that advice or legally responsible for it. Indeed, many solicitors have a vested interest in recommending clients to building societies with which they have a connection and a financial relationship. That cannot be independent financial advice. It is interesting that both Sir Gordon Borrie and Professor Farron, the chairman of the Farron conveyancing committee, have said that the pretext of conflict of interest is ludicrous. That restriction is therefore not fulfilling an honourable promise honourably given, on the basis of which I withdrew my Bill in February 1984. That makes the Prime Minister and the Law Officers look dishonourable.

I would not have thought that the Prime Minister, with her roll of honour which includes Orgreave, the head of Arthur Scargill, Liverpool and all her other triumphs over sectional interests, would want to be seen to be succumbing to the Law Society, however powerful the society and the legal profession may be on the Tory Benches and in Cabinet. The indecent spectacle of the Prime Minister giving way to such interests should not be foisted on the right hon. Lady by any party that has a real concern about her public interest and standing.

The Law Officers are also made to look deceitful. There is now a cloud of corruption hanging over the City, Lloyd's and other financial institutions and over the country as a whole, which resembles an offshore tax fiddle in many financial markets. Do we want that cloud of corruption hanging over the Government because they betray honourable promises, honourably given to an Opposition Back Bencher to persuade him to withdraw his Bill? The Government cannot want that spectacle, but that is exactly what will happen if the Government persist in the restriction proposed by the Lord Chancellor.

Competition by the building societies is necessary to maintain pressure on conveyancing prices to keep the prices coming down, to keep the market covered and to provide better service for the consumer. That provision will come with the same Lord Chancellor. What we are seeing now is a rearguard action and nothing more. Lord Hailsham is not eternal. [Interruption.] My speech might be eternal but Lord Hailsham cannot be.

I should like to make the final point about the selling on of mortgages. It is an innovation from America which is used by local government and which may well be used by financial institutions. Some financial institutions have already displayed interest in the selling on of mortgages as that provides access to capital which, in difficult times of mortgage famine, might be a useful way for building societies to raise money. It is interesting that Barclays bank and the Trustee Savings bank are considering that for their mortgages. The Chemical bank has shown an interest in buying the Alliance or the Bristol and West. I am not sure how it can do that, but there has been interest by American institutions to move into that market.

The Government have stepped in to stop local authorities selling on mortgages in that fashion without the permission of the person who took out the mortgage. That provision is made in the Local Government Bill that will come into effect in two stages, part this year and part next year. That protects people and prevents local authorities from carrying out that practice. It should offer the same protection to mortgagors with building societies that is offered to local authority customers. One would not want a mortgage shunted off, without consent or consultation, over one's head in the superior cattle trading that goes on in financial institutions.

I do not echo the fears of my right hon. Friend the Member for Halton (Mr. Oakes) about unsecured credit. There is no great harm in more unsecured credit, particularly when that comes from institutions we can trust like the building societies. That is competition and is therefore desirable. That form of unsecured credit is preferable to people falling into the hands of loan sharks or hire-purchase contracts with huge rates of interest. I welcome the Bill because the building societies have done a good job in protecting people and encouraging house purchase. The Bill will allow them to do that in ways relevant to a more modern and dynamic society.

6.30 pm

Mr. Eric Cockeram (Ludlow): First, I must declare an interest. I am the parliamentary adviser to the Midshires building society, a society with strong regional links in the west midlands and the north-west. I was a director of the society some years before being returned to this place.

I welcome the Bill, although it does not do everything that one would expect or that building societies want from it. I welcome the Bill because of the contribution that I believe it will make to the nation's housing. I felt that my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary to the Treasury was not as generous as he might have been in his tribute to the building societies movement. It has been one of our great successes since the war. If only other industries had been as successful as the building societies movement. The movement has about 6 million borrowers and 25 million depositors. Building societies overtook the banks long ago as the bankers for the people's savings. Men, women and schoolchildren use the building societies. The societies have been extremely successful, and one of the reasons for their success is that they have proved to be such a safe place for people's savings.

When a building society runs into trouble—happily, that does not happen very often but it has happened enough times to cause us concern — the Chief Registrar of Friendly Societies is called in. He is rather like a fireman, who sits in his fire station waiting for the telephone to ring. If someone telephones the fire station because his house is on fire, the fireman will go out to deal with the emergency. That is the role of the registrar. When he receives a telephone call saying that the Puddlecum-on-the-Marsh building society is in trouble, he reaches for his Bradshaw, packs his bag, and goes to Puddlecum-on-the-Marsh.

Who saves the society? Who puts his money where his mouth is? Who looks after the depositors? The answer is the building societies movement, through the Building Societies Association. The association moves in staff and they reorganise the crashed society, whatever the cause may have been, and look after the depositors. There is criticism about the time that it takes to do that, but the building societies movement has always looked after the savings of the nation in those circumstances. I am by no means convinced that the Building Societies Commission will be any better than, if as good as, the present system in protecting the savings of people in societies where something goes wrong.

[Mr. Eric Cockeram]

There is a second aspect of the Bill which disturbs me. It is expensive for a building society to print, envelope, dispatch and post annual reports to hundreds and thousands of its members. The Bill proposes that a depositor with a holding of £100 or upwards shall be entitled to receive an annual report. I think that the sum chosen is too low and that it should be £250. A depositor who puts money into a bank does not receive a copy of the bank's annual report. A depositor can take his money out at any time. I see no reason why building societies should be under an obligation to send reports to depositors with comparatively small deposits. Of course, any depositor is entitled to demand a copy of the annual report, which should be available in any branch of the society.

I fear that the Bill could lead us into a phase where we see many people being proposed for directorships of building societies and a substantial number of contests. The qualifications required for a director of a building society are experience and ability. I do not want to see what may be likened to political canvassing. I refer not to canvassing by politicians but to canvassing for seats on a building society's board. The public, including depositors, want people with experience and ability; they want people in whom they have confidence. I hope that the limited personal details which have to be circulated, and of which I approve, are limited to that which is proposed. I believe that the Bill goes a little too far in the scale of the details that are enabled to be circulated.

Finally, I support the comments of those who have addressed themselves to the proposals for unagreed mergers. The proposals do not amount to the sort of legislation that I would expect from a Conservative Government. The number of building societies has contracted substantially since the end of the war. About 80 per cent. of them have been subject to merger, and some no longer exist. For every five societies that we had at the end of the war, there is only one left now, and that contraction has been accelerating of late. I do not see that there is any cause to provide a further catalyst to encourage the swallowing up of the smaller regional societies, but that seems to be the purpose of the Bill.

The principle of unagreed mergers in mutual institutions is unprecedented. I do not believe that the Government have made out a case for it. The obligation of societies to make available their register of members to outside inquirers is an abuse of confidentiality and will be seen to be so shortly after the Bill, if it reaches the statute book in its present form, is enacted. Insurance companies and other financial institutions would be glad to get their hands on a list of registered members of a building society. They would use it to canvass those who are known depositors in a society. That is not to be encouraged. I do not believe that depositors wish that role to be undertaken by societies.

We should not permit steps to be taken that will encourage the takeover of the smaller regional society by the larger society. The consumer has a wide choice. The individual can make his deposit in a large national society or in his own regional society. Many people make deposits in more than one society. It is not necessary for us to provide a catalyst for further mergers. It should not be made easier to distribute the reserves of a society after an unagreed merger than would be the case with a corporate conversion, but that will be one of the effects of the Bill.

I support Second Reading. Like others, I hope to be a member of the Committee which considers the Bill. I give notice to my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary that there are parts of the Bill that I should like to see amended in Committee.

6.38 pm

Mr. David Penhaligon (Truro): I do not know how many Second Reading debates I have heard introduced by various Ministers over the past 11 or 12 years. I listened to the speech of the Economic Secretary to the Treasury and it was clear. The Minister was articulate, and it was obvious that he had given much thought to the Bill. However, when he resumed his place I was unaware of the Government's aim in introducing the Bill. I have heard Ministers introduce Bills with aims with which I agreed and there have been Bills introduced with aims with which I have disagreed. In this instance, the Minister seemed to have no real aim. He was not claiming that reform was required to retain building societies in our nation.

The Economic Secretary advanced a number of reasons for the Bill, some of which were amusing. Many Members smiled when he talked about balloting for mortgages. That did not seem to be a strong enough reason for introducing such an enormous Bill. The reasons that he gave for changes being required are hardly ever heard mentioned, or are never mentioned, by the societies.

During the time that I have been in this place I have rarely found myself more in accord with the speech of the Opposition spokesman. The hon. Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald) seemed to share my feeling about the Bill. The building societies movement is working extraordinarily well. There may be a case for some changes, but are we not digging up the roots, which have provided life for so long, to see whether we can make the plant grow quicker when we probably cannot achieve that end?

Of all the institutions that are of real value to our constituents—let us declare that they are of interest to us—it is difficult to think of one that has served us better individually, collectively and on a constituency basis than the building societies movement. The building societies have done a superb job, and it is right to put that on record. In considering the details of the Bill, I shall look with a jaundiced eye on anything that casts even a shadow of doubt on the building societies' successful role.

Some hon. Members have referred to the takeover system which, to put it mildly, seems to be rather peculiar. Clearly, there is a case for allowing building socities to merge if they wish. I do not want mergers to continue until all the small societies have been eradicated. Some of the building societies serve a useful purpose in their local communities, as at least two hon. Members have said I do not see why we should make this compulsory unless building societies are or are likely to be in financial difficulty. As I understand it, a small building society which is doing no one any great harm can be taken over against its will by one of the massive building societies, with all of its capacity to advertise and argue. That small building society can be forced to hand over a list of all its members and depositors to enable a ballot and direct mailing to take place. With some limitations, details of which I find difficult to interpret, the large building societies would be able to offer a bonus to the depositors in the small building societies to obtain their votes. Some years ago, Parliament outlawed the practice of offering financial inducements to obtain votes. I have honest doubts about this measure, but I shall listen to the detailed arguments before I condemn it absolutely.

My sole criticism of the building societies is their endless desire to increase the size of their empires and set up offices in every town. It is not uncommon when travelling to any part of the country in a political or other role and talking to local people about their town to hear people say that everything has been taken over by the building societies. That is not unique to Cornwall or to Northumberland. There is a general feeling that the building societies have been a little too anxious to increase their empires and to think, for prestige reasons, that they must have branches everywhere.

The Bill could provide a new method by which the building societies could expand their empires. That might be done even more cheaply. I suspect that the capital value of the properties owned by the smaller societies is much more, in terms of hard cash, when placed under the auctioneer's hammer than the book value. I remain unconvinced, although I am not paranoid about this issue.

Hon. Members have received a brief from Abbey National stating that the society believes that it should be able immediately to start lending up to 10 per cent. of the money deposited with it and that the amount should be increased to 20 per cent. "in due course." I suspect that "in due course" means "quickly" if the Bill is passed by the House.

I can see that there is some advantage in having another avenue through which people can obtain credit by way of competition. They would be able to obtain the best deal they could find. I wonder about the thoughts behind this proposal, when a building society the size of Abbey National tells us that it wants one fifth of the hundreds of millions of pounds in its care to be used for the purchase of refrigerators, washing machines, beds, Japanese television sets, and so on. The building societies claim that that will allow them greater freedom, but they do not say that there will be a great economic advantage to the country. I can go along with the idea that extra freedom will be provided, but I am worried about the proposal to increase the proportion to 20 per cent.

Mr. Tim Smith: The 20 per cent. limit which Abbey National wants would cover not just unsecured lending, but all the other new activities envisaged by the building societies. If building societies are to invest in those activities, a considerable amount of capital will be tied up in them. I do not think that anyone is suggesting that the whole lot will be used for unsecured lending.

Mr. Penhaligon: I realise that. I have some time for the other activities in this category. I have found that the societies seem to be interested in the direct credit proposal. They will be in the fortunate position of being able to select with more skill than most the very best of credit-worthy customers to whom to lend money. One suspects that they will be able to gather unto themselves some of the best businesses in a particular area. I have gathered from my conversations with building societies that some see themselves going in for consumer credit in a big way. I do not know what the legal definition of "consumer credit" is. I am not arguing with the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) about what politicians would call "consumer credit."

I listened with interest to the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell). I recognise his valuable work, but I am not sure that he has reached the correct conclusion. I am an engineer by training, which perhaps makes me as independent as I can be. I am neither a lawyer nor a financier, which is perhaps an advantage in this debate. I am not a lawyer, so I just listen. The hon. Member for Great Grimsby argued for the general expansion of conveyancing, which I applaud. It is proposed that the building societies will offer a portfolio of services but will not be able to offer all the services themselves. They will, in effect, be forced to send a person who comes to borrow money for the purchase of a property elsewhere for conveyancing. The logic behind that argument is that people could obtain independent advice.

The hon. Member for Great Grimsby accurately said that one of the new phenomena resulting from 64 per cent. owner-occupation—a wonderful statistic—is that many of the people who buy houses are not prepared to do so by family tradition and advice and perhaps by what the hon. Gentleman calls "middle class expectations". In that case, it is important for the people who are buying a property for the first time—when there is little easily obtainable advice around them — to be able to obtain some genuinely independent advice. The hon. Gentleman's point was that some of the advice that they now obtain is not independent because of the unofficial link between building societies and solicitors. There may be some truth in that. Unless the Bill includes a clause to that effect, any hope that independent advice will be provided for the most vulnerable section of buyers will cease. The Government have a considerable amount of logic on their side.

In my community there is the phenomenon of Mundic block houses—concrete block houses built in the 1920s when tin mine waste as opposed to clay mine waste was used. That waste contains a chemical that attacks cement over 20, 30 or 40 years. The simple hard-nosed truth is that properties built with that product can fall down because it turns to dust. It is difficult to find anyone who will take responsibility for one of those properties. When a house is declared "Mundic", it is the kiss of death. If that label is put on a property, a zero can be knocked off the value.

I am well aware that independent advice is crucial to people who are making what is usually their biggest ever financial transaction. By all means let us have competition and freedom, but let us ensure that ordinary, honest people can obtain the best opportunity at the most opportune moment.

I believe that we will all receive many more briefs from the building societies during the Bill's passage. I should appreciate it if the Minister would again go through that part of his speech in which he outlined the aims behind this substantial piece of legislation. I hope that the Government are not going to contract the biggest of all parliamentary diseases — that because something has not been legislated on for a long time, now is the moment to do so. I look forward to a further description of the Government's aim.

6.49 pm

